The right of a foreign corporation organized to carry on a mining business and for other purposes not covered by the Michigan laws for incorporation of mining companies, to have a copy of its articles of association filed, under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 4098, was denied in Isle Royale Land Corp. v. Osmun, 70 Mich. 102, by a bare majority of the court, who did not agree in their reasons for the decision. See also infra, Grant v. Henry Clay Coal Co.

Exercise of eminent domain.

The right of a foreign corporation to exercise the power of eminent domain is not implied.

Dept. of New York v. Knoll, 70 N. Y. 536.

And so also the law was well settled before the passage of the Act of 1887 that corporations of sister states had the right to acquire real estate within this state illimitably if authorized by their charters, and to dispose of the same.

2 Kent, Com. p. 285; Ex parte Peru Iron Co. 7 Cow. 540; Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. 4 Abb. App. Dec. 237; Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547; American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352, 25 L. ed. 588.

Where a corporation acquires real estate without authority of law or in excess of the limitations of the law such real estate does not become liable to forfeiture by the people. The only right of the state is to claim a forfeiture of its franchises, and not a forfeiture of the property held by the corporation.

Re McGraw, 3 L. R. A. 387, 111 N. Y. 96.

This it may do against a foreign corporation carrying on business in this state as well as against a domestic corporation.

Assuming that section 17 of the General Corporation Law is to receive a narrow construction, the defendant was nevertheless authorized to acquire such real property in this state as might be necessary for its corporate purposes, and nothing appearing to indicate that the property in question was not, in fact, necessary for that purpose, it is to be presumed that the transaction whereby it acquired title to this property was consistent with its charter.

A corporation of another state has no power to condemn lands for railroad right of way, under Neb. Const. art. 11, § 8. State v. Scott, 22 Neb. 628; Trester v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 23 Neb. 242; Koenig v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 27 Neb. 669.

But a legislature may give the power of eminent domain to a foreign corporation. Re Townsend, 39 N. Y. 171; Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Townsend, 24 Barb. 668; New York & E. R. Co. v. Young, 38 Pa. 175.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 790, a foreign railroad corporation may obtain a right of way in Missouri by condemnation. Gray v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 81 Mo. 123.

General language may be sufficient to confer the power. Thus a foreign corporation is entitled to the benefits of the New York statute authorizing "any company owning, operating, or leasing" any steam railroad to take property by condemnation. Re Marks, 6 N. Y. Supp. 105.

And the assent of the legislature to the transfer of the power of eminent domain from a domestic railroad corporation to a foreign corporation which succeeds to its rights and powers may be gathered by implication from a series of legislative acts. Abbott v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 145 Mass. 450.

So a foreign waterworks company can exercise its powers under an ordinance including the right to condemn lands, where the legislature has given authority to the municipal corporation to confer such power on "individuals or corporations." Dodge v. Council Bluffs, 57 Iowa. 500.

And in Ohio the right of a foreign corporation to condemn lands for railroad purposes and operate a railroad in Ohio is upheld. The court finds an express grant of the power in the case in hand and says that there is no legislation against the right but abundant to the contrary. State v. Sherman, 23 Ohio St. 423.

Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Curtis, 7 N. Y. 466; Chautauque County Bank v. Risley, 19 N. Y. 369, 75 Am. Dec. 347; Ex parte Peru Iron Co. and Alward v. Holmes, supra; Yates v. Van De Bogert, 56 N. Y. 526; Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. supra.

But, assuming further that under the laws of this state a foreign corporation like the present has no right to hold real property for speculative purposes yet having acquired title thereto for a valuable consideration it nevertheless could convey a good and sufficient title to the plaintiff before divestiture of its title at the instance of the state.

Before office found, an alien may convey lands acquired by him by purchase, and if the conveyance be to one capable of taking and holding his title will be good and valid.

The policy of the law which prohibits aliens

When a foreign corporation has no power as such to condemn lands, a domestic corporation which is merely an auxiliary may do so. Lower v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 59 Iowa. 568.

A statute denying the right of eminent domain to corporations created under the laws of other states or of the United States does not apply to a corporation which by consolidation under state statutes has become a domestic corporation. State v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 564, 25 Neb. 156; Toledo, A. A. & G. T. R. Co. v. Dunlap, 47 Mich. 456.

That a foreign corporation cannot condemn land in a court of the United States and cannot remove to that court a condemnation proceeding in which it is defendant is declared in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, W. & K. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 314.

But in that case the corporation was held to be in fact a domestic one. Ibid.

As to mortgages.

Almost without exception, the right of a foreign corporation to take a mortgage on real property, except when expressly prohibited by statute, has been upheld.

In Bank of Louisville v. Young, 37 Mo. 306, the court construed the Missouri statute holding that a loan by a foreign corporation doing business in the state was prohibited, and that bonds, notes, and securities taken therefor were void, but in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Albert, 30 Mo. 181, it was held that a foreign corporation, not engaged in banking, might lawfully make such a loan, and that the words "foreign corporations" as used in the statute (Rev. Code 1835, § 14, p. 250), as shown by the connection, meant foreign banking corporations; and a later case holds that even foreign bankers, if they are not engaged in banking in Missouri, can make such loans. Long v. Long, 79 Mo. 652.

from holding title to land is to have the title in the hands of citizens who owe allegiance to the government and can be called upon to discharge the duties of citizenship.

Mars v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 376.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Before approaching the discussion of the principal question in this case, certain questions of subordinate importance may be disposed of, which have been raised upon the argument. One of them relates to the right of this corporation to recognition in our courts, as affected by the fact that the incorporators are, with one exception, citizens and residents of this state. Whatever inferences can be drawn as to the motives which took them into a foreign jurisdiction to organize a corporation under its laws, I agree with the general term that any such question has been once and for all settled by our recent decision in the case of Demarest v. Flack, 128 N. Y. 205, 18 L. R. A. 54. It appeared in that case that citizens of this state incorporated under the laws of West Virginia to carry on a certain business, with the principal office of the company in New York city, and where only it had been conducting its operations. It was claimed that these facts invalidated the corporation, and that there was a manifest evasion of and fraud upon the laws of the state. But it was held that they constituted no reason for refusing recognition to the corporation; that there was no essential difference between a corporation formed under the laws of a foreign state, the members of which were its own citizens, and one so formed, the members of which were citizens of our own state. If our citizens are attracted to other jurisdictions for purposes of incorporation, because of more favorable corporation or taxation laws, I cannot see in that fact, however, and in whatever sense to be deplored, any reason that they should be prevented from employing here the corporate capital in the various channels of trade or manufacture. That, as it seems to me, would be a rather hurtful policy and one not to be attributed to the state.

Another question relates to the regularity of the proceedings for the incorporation of the defendant company under the laws of the state of New Jersey. I am unable to perceive any defect therein. I should say there had been a compliance with its statutes. But if there could be pointed out some irregularity it could not be made the subject of an objection to the defendant's title. It was a corporation de facto. Its incorporators had filed their certificate of incorporation as required by the laws of New Jersey, and a certificate had been filed in the office of the secretary of state of this state, as required by our laws of a foreign corporation. It was exercising a franchise attempted to be conferred upon it by the laws of New Jersey, and any question affecting its right to transact business because of alleged irregularities in organization is a matter for the government of that state to inquire into. It was said in Methodist Episcopal Union Church v.

It is now established in that state that a foreign corporation may make a loan on mortgage security. Ferguson v. Boden, 111 Mo. 208.

In Louisiana an early case held that a branch bank owned by a foreign corporation might loan money and take mortgage security. Frazier v. Wilcox, 4 Rob. (La.) 517.

And in Mississippi, notes and mortgages taken by a foreign corporation are valid in the absence of any prohibition. Williams v. Creswell, 51 Miss. 817.

A foreign corporation which is not prohibited by its charter from taking a mortgage on lands outside the state may take such mortgage, at least when it takes it merely as additional security for a lawful investment which it finds in danger. National Trust Co. v. Murphy, 80 N. J. Eq. 408.

So in American Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Owen, 15 Gray, 491, it was held that a foreign corporation having a valid demand against a citizen can take a real estate mortgage to secure it.

So in Farmers' Loan & T. Co. of New York v. McKinney, 6 McLean, 4, it was held that a foreign corporation might take a mortgage on land, unless prohibited by statute or the policy of the state.

The power of a foreign insurance company to take mortgages on real estate in Illinois was declared in Hards v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 8 Biss. 236, to be not contrary to the public policy of the state.

A mortgage to a foreign corporation is assumed to be within its general capacity. Daly v. National L. Ins. Co. of U. S. A. 64 Ind. 1.

That a foreign bank may take a mortgage on making a loan is decided in Lebanon Sav. Bank v. Hollenbeck, 29 Minn. 322, in which it is said also that it can buy the property on foreclosure.

The same doctrine as to the right of a foreign corporation to take a real estate mortgage is upheld in Saltmarsh v. Spaulding, 147 Mass. 224; Ste-24 L. R. A.

vens v. Pratt, 101 Ill. 208; Commercial U. Assur. Co. v. Scammon, 102 Ill. 43, overruling United States Mortg. Co. v. Gross, 98 Ill. 488.

And in other cases which turn on the provisions of statutes restricting the business of foreign corporations and establishing conditions of such business the power of foreign corporations to take real estate mortgages unless prohibited by statute is assumed. Oregon & W. T. & I. Co. v. Rathbun, 5 Sawy. 82; Temple v. Bank of British Columbia, 1d. 83; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Overholt, 4 Dill. 287; Fritts v. Palmer, 122 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 817; Sherwood v. Alvir, 88 Ala. 115; Cradlock v. American Freehold Land Mort. Co. of London, 88 Ala. 281; Elston v. Piggott, 94 Ind. 14; Reeves v. Harper, 44 La. Ann. 516; Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 466; Mumford v. American L. Ins. & T. Co. 4 N. Y. 468; Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Sawyer, 44 Wis. 887.

The statutory prohibition against a foreign corporation acquiring or holding real property does not prevent such corporation from taking a real estate mortgage. Leasure v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 91 Pa. 491; American State Co. v. Phillipsburg Bldg. & L. Sav. Bank, 8 W. N. C. 430.

A pending suit in a federal court by a foreign corporation to foreclose a mortgage is not affected, even if the statute is valid, by a statute making it the cause of exclusion of a foreign corporation from the state, if it invokes the jurisdiction of a federal court, and the bringing of a subsequent suit will not prevent the corporation from purchasing the land on sale under such foreclosure suit. Elston v. Piggott, supra.

It is said in Elston v. Piggott, supra, that there is no statute in Indiana to prevent a foreign corporation from taking real estate in payment of debts on an execution sale.

Until office found, the title of a foreign corpora-

Pickett, 19 N. Y. 482, with respect to the capacity of corporations to act, that "the rule established by law, as well as by reason, is that parties recognizing the existence of corporations by dealing with them have no right to object to any irregularity in their organization, or any subsequent abuse of their powers, not connected with such dealing. As long as they are overlooked or tolerated by the state it is not for individuals to call them in question." That this principle is equally applicable to foreign corporations de facto was held in Bank of Toledo v. International Bank, 21 N. Y. 542.

With respect to the question of whether the laws of the state of New Jersey authorize the kind of business which this company was organized and proposes to transact, I think that the provisions of the statute for the formation of corporations, to which our attention is directed, are broad enough in their scope to comprehend the objects of this incorporation. They authorize incorporations for the purpose of the improvement and sale of lands. With such an authorization and, as a corporation, being vested under those laws with the authority to hold, purchase, and convey such real and personal estate, as the purposes of the corporation shall require, there is ample support for a construction that this company may deal in the purchase and sale of real estate. But, if any doubt might be entertained upon the correctness of our construction of this foreign statute, I do not think the doubt affects the question here. If to engage in the business of buying and of selling real property is to act in excess of the powers conferred upon the corporation by the statute of New Jersey, it is for that government to inquire into the exercise by its creature of corporate powers. It is not a question which the party dealing with it can raise. As a corporation de facto, possessing some capacity to acquire and convey real property, its conveyance is unimpeachable upon any ground of an excess or of an abuse of powers conferred, and unless in the laws of this state we are able to find a prohibition, expressed herein, or to be implied therefrom, which disabled this corporation from acquiring the land and from conveying it, the plaintiff would obtain a valid title to the premises conveyed.

The principal question for our consideration is one of great importance, for upon its decision not only depend large interests, but a judicial definition of state policy. That question may be thus succinctly stated: Under our laws, can a foreign corporation, incorporated for the purpose of dealing in the purchase and sale of real property, come into this state and transact here such kind of corporate business? The general term put the question in somewhat different form: Whether it may "purchase and hold lands within this state which are not necessary for its business and which have not been acquired in securing the payment of a debt due to it." That is hardly exact as applied to the case of this corporation. As I have tion to real property cannot be questioned on the ground that it has no right to own real property. Lathrop v. Commercial Bank of Scioto, 8 Dana 114, 33 Am. Dec. 481. See also Whitman M. & Min Co. v. Baker, 3 Nev. 386.

Under a statute declaring that no corporation of the state, or of any other state, can purchase lands without incurring forfeiture, unless authorized by the legislature, but can hold and retain them subject to be divested or disposed of by the commonwealth, a foreign corporation may purchase lands within the state subject to be divested by forfeiture, and until the government acts the title remains in the corporation. Runyan v. Coster, 30 U. S. 14 Pet. 122, 10 L. ed. 382.

Even if the title is acquired in violation of an express statutory prohibition, it is valid as against every one but the state. Myers v. McGavock (Neb.) March 22, 1894.

Thus the title of a foreign corporation to real estate purchased by it at a judicial sale is valid as against every one but the state, although the statutes expressly declare that a foreign corporation shall not "acquire or own, hold or possess by right of title or descent accruing hereafter any real estate in the state." Carlow v. Aultman, 28 Neb. 672.

An agent of such corporation certainly cannot question its power to own real property. Seymour v. Slide & Spur Gold Mines, 153 U. S. 524, 38 L. ed. —.

A conveyance of land to a foreign corporation is not void although a statute forbids it to acquire and hold real estate, but the deed passes the title and the corporation may hold the land subject to the right of escheat in proceedings by the state. Hlokory Farm Oil Co. v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 22.

Under the Pennsylvania Act of April 8, 1881, a conveyance of land by a foreign corporation, 24 L. R. A.

which is held subject to escheat, made before any inquisition taken to escheat the same, is made valid so as to prevent the escheat of the lands on account of the disability of the grantor. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 534, 132 Pa. 501.

Under the Georgia Act of February 8, 1877, providing that the state would not consent to foreign corporations owning 5,000 or more acres of land in that state, unless incorporated under its laws, the state alone can make the question as to the right of a foreign corporation to hold land against the state. American Mortg. Co. v. Tennille, 12 L. R. A. 529, 87 Ga. 28.

As to the subject of escheat generally, see note to American Mortg. Co. v. Tennille (Ga.), 12 L. R. A. 529.

An individual cannot question the power of a foreign corporation to acquire real estate, at least where it is clothed with power to hold real estate for some purposes. Barnes v. Suddard, 117 Ill. 237.

The right of a foreign corporation to own mining leases is held not open to question by a person who is sued for the price of coal sold him by the corporation. Grant v. Henry-Clay Coal Co. 80 Pa. 208.

Information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto was used for the escheat of lands alleged to have been purchased in trust for the foreign corporation, which could not legally hold them (Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 114 Pa. 340.) but this case was overruled on the subject of the right of the corporation by Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra.

A careful examination of all the cases on the subject shows a fairly clear agreement on the general doctrine that foreign corporations except as restricted by statute may acquire and own real property to the same extent that domestic corporations may do so.

shaped it, the question is certainly made broad enough.

The opinion of the general term was delivered by Mr. Justice Follett, whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect, and he negatives the prohibition embodied in the question, upon the ground, in substance, that from certain general statutes of this state, which relate to the right of foreign corporations to purchase or acquire, and to convey real property, and from numerous special acts, passed to authorize them to acquire lands, it is to be inferred that "it is contrary to the policy of this state to permit such corporations to take, hold, and convey lands in this state, without being specially authorized so to do." The general statutes to which he refers are chapter 158 of the Laws of 1877 and chapter 450 of the Laws of 1887, and he considers that to their declarations is to be referred, solely, the question of the right of foreign corporations, generally, to acquire, hold and convey lands, for they alone recognize their right in such respects. The Act of 1877 authorized a foreign corporation to purchase at a sale under the foreclosure of a mortgage or under a judgment held by it; to hold the land purchased for not exceeding five years, and to convey it, etc. The Act of 1887 authorized a foreign corporation, doing business in this state, to acquire such real property as might be necessary for its corporate purposes in the transaction of its business here. Both provisions were re-enacted into the "General Corporation Law of 1892" (Laws 1892, chap. 687), as sections 17 and 18.

In order to uphold the validity of the conveyance in question here, I think we might very safely rest our conclusions upon the enactment of 1887 if other grounds were lacking. We might, without doing violence to any rule of law, say that that act was such sufficient authority as to make the title to the land conveyed by the foreign corporation quite indefeasible in its grantee. The general term thought it was not broad enough; but there would not be much stress in reasoning that the foreign corporation being authorized to do business here, the authorization of the Act of 1887 "to acquire such real property as may be necessary for its corporate purposes in the transaction of its business in this state," even though we were disposed to define it as comprehending merely property for proposed use as an office, a warehouse or factory, etc., would, nevertheless, be sufficient to enable the corporation in possession of land by its conveyance to vest in the grantee a good title to it. It is not for the party contracting for the conveyance of its land to raise the question of how far his grantor may have exceeded the authority given by the statutes of this state, any more than he might with respect to an alleged abuse of the powers conferred by its home charter. Those are questions between the corporation and the government. The presumption militates in favor of the validity of the transaction, and the right of interference by the state does not extend to any forfeiture of the property held by the corporation Re McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66, 96, 2 L. R. A. 387.

In Correll v. Colorado Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547, the objection was that the National Land & Improvement Company, a Pennsylvania corporation which granted certain lands in Colorado to the springs company, was not empowered to acquire a right to the lands, for the reason that they were not necessary to enable it to carry on its business, to which extent corporations in Colorado were limited, because of restrictions upon the legislative power in the creation of corporations. It was held that "whether the particular premises in controversy are necessary for that business is not important; that is a matter between the government of the state and the corporation, and is no concern of the defendant."

But we are not confined to any such narrow ground as a construction of the particular acts referred to. Our general laws are such as to evidence a state policy, which makes no invidious distinction against foreign corporations coming within our boundaries to extend the area of their lawful operations. The answer to the question is not to be found in the acts to which the learned general term justices refer. If they have not overlooked they have failed, in my judgment, to give due weight and significance to other provisions upon our statute books.

The general corporation law, passed in 1892, contains these further provisions as to foreign corporations: "Section 15. No foreign stock corporation other than a moneyed corporation shall do business in this state without having first procured from the secretary of state a certificate that it has complied with all the requirements of law to authorize it to do business in this state, and that the business of the corporation to be carried on in this state is such as may be lawfully carried on by a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state for such or similar purposes. . . . The secretary of state shall deliver such certificate to every such corporation so complying with the requirements of law. No such corporation now doing business in this state shall do business herein after December 31, 1892, without having procured such certificate from the secretary of state. . . . No foreign stock corporation doing business in this state without such certificate shall maintain any action in this state upon any contract made by it in this state until it shall have procured such certificate."

"Section 16. Before granting such certificate the secretary of state shall require every such foreign corporation to file in his office a sworn copy of its charter or certificate of incorporation, and a statement under its corporate seal, particularly setting forth the business or objects of the corporation which it is engaged in carrying on, or which it proposes to carry on, within the state, and a place within the state which is to be its principal place of business, and designating, in the manner prescribed in the code of civil procedure, a person upon whom process against the corporation may be served within the state."

"The person so designated must have an office," etc.

The negative form of the legislative expression is pregnant with meaning. All foreign stock corporations are accorded the same right to transact their business here as domestic corporations have, if it be one which the latter may also lawfully transact, and provided there has been compliance with certain stated requirements. It is a recognition of the right of a foreign corporation to do business here, with the imposition of reasonable conditions. A certificate was granted by the secretary of state, in December, 1892, which certified a compliance with all the requirements of law, and that the business of the corporation to be carried on here was such as may be lawfully carried on by a corporation incorporated under our laws for such or similar business. By chapter 691 of the Laws of 1893, known as "The Business Corporations Law," what restrictions may have existed upon the organization of corporations in this state, previously, were done away with. Under that law "three or more persons may become a corporation for the purpose of carrying on any lawful business," by executing and filing a certificate, which shall contain the objects for which formed, including the nature and locality of the business. The effect of all recent legislation is, most clearly to remove all barriers to the transaction, through incorporation, of any lawful business in this state, and to recognize an equal right in the foreign corporation with that of the domestic corporation.

Presumably, in the opinion of the learned general term justices, it was not considered that sections 15 and 16 of the General Corporation Law include within their purview such a business as the acquisition of lands within this state by foreign corporations for purposes not connected with necessities for a corporate use. But I do not think we can so limit the meaning of these sections. It is true that they are followed by sections 17 and 18, to which the opinion below attaches such weight; but their presence is no warrant for ignoring the broad and general authority contained in the preceding provisions. Section 18 may still have an office to perform, in limiting the period of time for which a foreign corporation, without a certificate here, may hold land taken for a debt, or purchased at a sale under a judgment or decree; while the necessity for retaining section 17 is not readily perceived. The foreign corporation which desires to acquire real property, solely for use connected with the transaction of its business here, must, under section 15, procure the certificate of the secretary of state as a condition of being permitted to carry on business and, having the certificate, its right to do business as freely as a domestic corporation necessarily carries with it the recognition of the right to acquire and hold what real property may be necessary for that purpose. Both sections, possibly, were retained in the revision of corporation laws out of abundant caution. Neither section is a new enactment; but merely the continuation of an existing law. Whatever the reason to be assigned for retaining sections 17 and 18, the provisions of sections 15 and 16 contain an authoritative declaration by the legislature, and we neither can nor should attempt to refine away their comprehensive meaning. Nor am I able to perceive that it is, or that it ever was, the policy of this state to prevent foreign corporations from acquiring and holding real property here, if desired for the transaction of any lawful business. To discover the public policy of a state we are limited, as it was observed by Mr. Justice Story, in the Girard Will Case, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, to what "its constitution and laws and judicial decisions make known to us." I am aware of nothing in the Constitution upon the subject. There were no statutes passed upon the subject prior to the Act of 1877, referred to, and in their silence the principle of a general right in legally constituted corporations, with sufficient charter powers, and the principle of assent implied by the general law of comity between states, had a scope for operation in favor of the right of a foreign corporation to acquire and hold real property here. If special enabling acts have been procured, in particular cases, they do not, necessarily, disprove the general right. Prudence and cautious counsels may have dictated their procurement. While the enactment of the Statute of 1877 contained a limitation upon the right of the foreign corporation to hold real property, with respect to time, the subsequent Act of 1887 was in the direction of removing such, or any, limitation. Then came the General Statutes of 1893, which allowed all foreign corporations to do business here, upon compliance with conditions named, and which place them upon a similar footing with domestic corporations, as to transaction of a corporate business. If we turn only to the decisions of this court, in our investigation of what has been the public policy of this state towards foreign corporations we find them interpreting and applying the principle of state comity in the broadest spirit. In People v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 811, 44 Am. Rep. 380, it was observed that "where a state does not forbid, or its public policy, as evidenced by its laws, is not infringed, a foreign corporation may transact business within its boundaries and be entitled to the protection of its laws." In Hollis v. Drew Theological Seminary, 95 N. Y. 166, it was held that "unless the legislature forbids, they" (foreign corporations) "can come here as freely as natural persons and exercise here all the powers conferred upon them by their charter, subject to the limitation imposed upon natural persons, that is, they can do no acts in violation of our laws, or of our public policy. But, unless prohibited by law, they can do here, within the limits of their chartered powers, precisely what domestic corporations can do." This decision was in line with the early case in this court of Burd v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 495, in which the discussion turned upon the question of the right of a corporation of the state of Maryland to make loans secured by mortgages upon real estate within this state. Judge Denio said, in the opinion in that case, that "any of the states of the Union may, as this and several of the other states have done, interdict foreign corporations from performing certain single acts, or -conducting a particular description of business within its jurisdiction. But, in the absence of laws of that character, or in regard to transactions not within the purview of any prohibitory law and not inconsistent with the policy of the state as indicated by the general scope of its laws or constitution, corporations are permitted by the comity of nations to make contracts and transact business in other states than those by virtue of whose laws they were created, and to enforce those contracts, if need be, in the courts of such other states. It is, of course, implied that the contract must be one which the foreign corporation is permitted by its charter to make, and it must also be one which would be valid if made at the same place by a natural person, not a resident of that state."

It seems to me to be very clear, upon examination of our laws and by reference to such judicial opinions, that there never was a time in the history of the state when a foreign corporation was prevented from entering its boundaries to transact any lawful business which a nonresident natural person might have transacted here. What public policy is evaded, and what public interests are prejudiced, by extending to the foreign corporation for the transaction of its business, the privileges and protection of the laws of our own state, even when that business involves the acquisition of and dealing in real property? If we were to consider the question simply in the light of a sound or a good policy, there are abundant reasons for holding that it is to the public advantage that our borders should be as much open for all lawful purposes to foreign corporations as to natural persons. Their advent and lawful operation cannot but tend to some advancement of our commercial interests and must advantage the commonwealth. It is the policy of the state to encourage the employment of capital here by liberal laws; upon what reasonable ground shall we recognize the natural person who comes here and refuses recognition to the foreign corporation? And how is the matter affected if the capital is employed in dealing in the acquisition and barter of lands, and not in commerce, manufacturing or such like ways? What legal difference is there, which the state can recognize, if all the corporations happen to be residents of this state? The corporation is, nevertheless, a legal entity, endowed by a sister state with capacities and powers, and seeks our state as the field of its activity in the conduct of its business enterprise. Incorporations are, as a rule, advantageous to private and to public interests. As the business capacities of the general mass of mankind are constantly improving, associations of individuals, voluntarily combining their contributions, are able to perform works of various characters which no one person is able to accomplish. I believe that to be a well recognized principle in political economy. But we are not to consider the question as one simply of sound or of good policy, but whether there is any known public policy which is affected. What reason is there that the courts shall condemn the business proposed to be carried on by the defendant? What vice inheres in it? The case does not fall within those which the courts have decided to be against public policy. The business is not immoral in itself. That it is not prohibited by legislation I think I have been able to show.

In the opinion below it is suggested that if the defendant may legally acquire and convey land in this state at pleasure, there is no limitation upon the amount which a foreign corporation may hold, except in its ability to purchase and pay. As applied to the case of this corporation, it might be a sufficient answer to say that the chartered purpose of dealing in the purchase and sale of real property rather negatives the idea of an intended accumulation of real estate holding to any extraordinary extent. But a better answer would be that it is always within the power of the legislature to interfere and to regulate if, by the magnitude of the business, the public interests are affected and seem unduly threatened. Decisions of this court might be referred to to show how far the legislative power has been deemed capable of extending in the direction of controlling a private business, on the ground that its magnitude affected the public and justified such interference.

Without prolonging the discussion, I think the general term erred in their conclusions, and that the judgment should be reversed, and that judgment should be ordered for the defendant upon the submission, with costs.

All concur, except Bartlett, J., not sitting.

Judgment accordingly.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fond du Lac County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the alleged maintenance of a nuisance. Reversed.

Statement by Cassoday, J.:

This action was commenced September 27, 1892, to restrain the defendant from throwing out any of its waste matter, consisting of whey, buttermilk, washings, slops, or other foul matter, anywhere about its premises, so as to run upon the plaintiff's adjoining lands, and to abate the same as a nuisance, and for damages, with costs and disbursements. The complaint contains the usual allegations in such cases. The defendant answered by way of admissions, denials and counter allegations. At the close of the trial the court found as matters of fact to the effect that the plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of this action, and had for many years prior thereto been, the owner of a life estate, and in possession of the one-quarter section of land described; that the defendant owned and occupied the adjoining lands; that there is a highway on the line between; that the defendant built a creamery factory upon its land for the manufacture of butter from milk; that said factory is located about eight rods from the plaintiff's residence, and upon the opposite side of said highway; that before building said factory the plaintiff notified the defendant that he would hold it responsible for any damage he might sustain by reason of said factory; that in May, 1890, the defendant began the operation of said factory, and threw out its waste matter on its own premises, and also on the highway in close proximity to the plaintiff's residence; that soon after the defendant dug a well on its premises for the reception of all whey, washing, and other waste matter from said factory, but that before the commencement of this action the defendant ceased to use said well, or to throw out its waste matter on the highway or street near the said residence, and laid and connected iron pipes from its said factory along the highway to a point about 40 rods from the residence of the plaintiff, to a ditch that had been dug to carry off such waste, and the same ran across the plaintiff's lands; that said pipes were sufficiently large to carry, and actually did carry, away all the whey, washings, and other waste matter of said factory to the ditch so dug to carry off such surface water; that the plaintiff sustained no damage by reason of the washings and waste matter of the factory running upon or through his lands; that such whey and washings did not create a great stench near the residence of the plaintiff, nor did it contaminate the water or injure the wells of the plaintiff; that the illness of the plaintiff's wife was not caused by the operation of the factory, nor from the foulness of any waste matter connected therewith; that the actual rental value of the plaintiff's lands was not diminished by reason of the operation of the factory; that in August, 1892, the plaintiff served notice on the defendant to abate the alleged nuisance mentioned; that at the commencement of this action the running and operation of the defendant's factory was not a nuisance. And, as conclusions of law, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint, but that the same should be dismissed, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment accordingly, with costs and disbursements. From the judgment entered thereon accordingly the plaintiff brings this appeal.

Messrs. Colman & Sutherland, for appellants:

From the time of Queen Elizabeth to this decision, the continued running of water, though clear, upon another's land, and appliances constructed which so operate, have been held nuisances, to be redressed.

See Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 101; also cases cited in Wood on Nuisance, § 96, p. 103.

The question of amount of damage done by the defendant is not a material question upon that branch of the case. The private nuisance, the continuous encroachment upon the land, the deep ditch and iron pipe in use daily, is there. That is the nuisance to be abated, as much as overhanging eaves is a nuisance to be abated.

The pretended claim made, that the plaintiff might have dug a ditch through his farm and so carried the liquid across upon some other man's land, is upon a par with all other defenses in the case. The law of ownership and dominion over real estate must be reconstructed from its foundation if such defenses prevail.

Neither does the defense that the defendant could not care for this waste matter in any other way than to run it on plaintiff's farm, avail.

Cassoday, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's land runs along on the north side of the highway. His residence is on the southeast corner of his land. The defendant's creamery is situated just south of the highway, and nearly opposite the plaintiff's residence. Near the creamery the defendant constructed a well or cesspool, into which the waste matter from the creamery was caused to flow. The bed rock of that cesspool appears to have been more elevated than the bed rock of the plaintiff's well. The result was that the waste matter from the cesspool percolated through the soil, and passed into the plaintiff's well, and destroyed its usefulness. Upon complaint being made, the defendant ceased to use the cesspool, and caused such waste matter to flow eastward along the south side of the highway, for about 20 rods, through a tiling or iron tube; and from there caused the same to flow eastward along the south side of the highway, for about 20 rods further, in an open ditch to a depression in the ground, where the land descended northward, and from whence the waste was carried by a culvert under the highway, and then allowed to flow northward onto the plaintiff's pasture land for a distance of 18 or 20 rods. This waste matter from the creamery, not only in the plaintiff's well, but along the open ditch, and also in the plaintiff's pasture, would soon become thickened at the top, and of a grayish or greenish color, emitting a stench more or less disagreeable, depending upon the duration of its presence. From the very nature of things, it must have been, at least to some extent, injurious to the soil and the pasture, if not the cattle therein. Such facts appear to be fairly established by the evidence. The question recurs whether the defendant has the legal right to thus perpetually invade the possession and premises of the plaintiff. Undoubtedly, a nuisance, to be actionable, must materially affect or impair the comfort or enjoyment of the person complaining, or the use or value of his property. Stadler v. Grieben, 61 Wis. 500.

This court has held that any business, though in itself lawful, which necessarily impregnates large volumes of the atmosphere with disagreeable, unwholesome or offensive matter, may become a nuisance to those occupying adjacent property, in case it is so near, and the atmosphere is contaminated to such an extent, as to substantially impair the comfort or enjoyment of such adjacent occupants. Pennoyer v. Allen, 56 Wis. 502, 43

Am. Rep. 728. In such case it is no defense that the business was conducted in a reasonable and proper manner, and with ordinary cleanliness, and that the odors sent over and upon the adjacent premises were only such as were incident to the business when properly conducted. Ibid.

At an early stage of the trial in the case at bar the court, in effect, expressly ruled that the case would be determined on the condition of things as they were in 1892, and not as they were before the new drain was constructed, and hence that all testimony in regard to the condition of things in 1890 and 1891 would be regarded as immaterial. It may be that at the time of the commencement of this action, and for a short time before, the atmosphere in and about the plaintiff's residence was not contaminated to such an extent as to substantially impair his comfort or enjoyment of the same, and hence that an injunction should not be granted upon that ground alone. But the case presented is not confined to the contamination of the atmosphere, even in 1892. On the contrary, the filth from the defendant's creamery was then actually being cast upon the plaintiff's premises. The case is different from the mere pollution of the atmosphere or the waters of a natural stream by some customary use while passing over the defendant's premises. It is worse. It is the invasion of the plaintiff's premises with an offensive foreign substance by means of artificial appliances. In Tenant v. Goldwin, 1 Salk. 360, 2 Ld. Raym. 1092, Lord Holt, Ch. J., said: "If the defendant has a house of office [privy], and the wall which separates the house of office from the plaintiff's house is all the defendant's, he is, of common right, bound to repair, it. . . . The reason is that every one must so use his own as not to do damage to another. And, as every man is bound so to look to his cattle as to keep them out of his neighbor's ground that so he may receive no damage, so he must keep in the filth of his house of office that it may not flow in upon and damnify his neighbor." That case has frequently received sanction in the English courts. Thus, in Bullard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115, the plaintiff and defendant were adjoining land owners, and had each a deep well on his own land; the plaintiff's land being at a lower level than the defendant's. The defendant turned sewage from his house into his well, and thus polluted the water that percolated under ground from the defendant's land to the plaintiff's, and consequently the water which came into the plaintiff's well from such percolating water when he used his well by pumping, became adulterated with the sewage from the defendant's well, and it was held that the plaintiff had a right of action against the defendant for so polluting the source of supply. The language of Lindley, L. J., is quite applicable here. On page 126 he said: "Prima facie, no man has a right to use his own land in such a way as to be a nuisance to his neighbor; and whether the nuisance is effected by sending filth onto his neighbor's land, or by putting poisonous matter on his own land and allowing it to escape on his neighbor's land, or whether the nuisance is effected by poisoning the air which his neighbor breathes or the water which he drinks, appears to me wholly immaterial. If a man chooses to put filth on his own land he must take care not to let it escape onto his neighbor's land." So the same court, within a year, and in an opinion by the same learned lord justice, sustained an injunction restraining the use of stables constructed under statutory authority, on the ground that, although used with all reasonable care, yet they were nevertheless used in such a way as to be a nuisance to the plaintiff. Rapier v. London Tramways Co. [1898] 2 Ch. 588. That case and others were considered by this court in Evans v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 86 Wis. 597. In McGenness v. Adriatic Mills, 116 Mass. 177, a right of action was sustained for a nuisance created and maintained by discharging through a box drain filthy and polluted water upon the land of A., taken from a natural stream which had been polluted. To the same effect: Woodward v. Worcester, 121 Mass. 245; Harris v. Mackintosh, 183 Mass. 228; Rodenhausen v. Oraven, 141 Pa. 546; Lockwood County v. Lawrence, 77 Me. 297. 52 Am. Rep. 763; Savile v. Kilner, 26 L. T. N. S. 277; Shotts Iron Co. v. Inglis, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 518.

The injury inflicted upon the plaintiff and his premises is permanent in its nature. The defendant should be perpetually enjoined from causing filth to flow upon the plaintiff's premises, either directly, by percolation, or otherwise. Equity having thus acquired jurisdiction in the case, it may retain the same, and adjudge to the plaintiff reasonable and adequate damages for past injuries.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover salary, which plaintiff claimed that he had been wrongfully deprived from earning by the action of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams & Robinson and George W. Baird for appellant.

Messrs. R. M. Bashford and T. A. Polleys, for respondent.

The statutory provision giving the respondent board of regents power to remove teachers and other employes of the board at pleasure, became a part of the plaintiff's contract of employment.

The power of summary removal vested in the board by statute, being discretionary, no notice or hearing of charges against the appellant was necessary, and the manner in which such discretionary power was exercised by the board cannot be inquired into by the courts.

Orton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the complaint in this action the plaintiff's claim is predicated upon a contract with the defendant board for his services as a teacher in the normal school in the city of Milwaukee, and as a conductor of institutes for the instruction of teachers in various parts of the state, for the school year commencing on the 1st day of September, 1891, and ending on the 24th day of June, 1892, for the sum of $2,000 per school year, payable in monthly installments, as teacher in said normal school, and for $50 per week and all traveling expenses as such conductor of institutes. The plaintiff entered upon the performance of said contract about the 1st day of September, 1891, and continued to render services thereunder, in a satisfactory manner, up to the 18th day of April, 1892, when he was wrongfully discharged from such employment, without cause or excuse. The plaintiff has been ready and willing at all times to perform all the conditions and requirements of his said contract, but the defendant on said 18th day of April, 1892, refused to allow him to do so, or to pay him therefor. Plaintiff demands judgment for the balance of his compensation as conductor of institutes, and for the balance of his salary for the full school year ending the 24th day of June, 1892, in the gross sum of $791.68, with interest and costs. The answer is, in effect, as follows: The defendant board was authorized by law to make rules, regulations, and by-laws for the government and management of normal schools; to employ teachers therein, prescribe their duties, and fix their salaries, and to remove any teacher so employed, at pleasure. The state superintendent of public instruction, with the advice and consent of said board, was authorized to make such rules and regulations as they deemed proper for the government of said institutes, designate the counties in which they shall be held, and to employ agents to perform the work in connection therewith. The board had adopted a rule, which was in force September 1, 1891, requiring all persons employed in the normal schools to enter into a written contract with the board in such form as the board may prescribe. At the date aforesaid the plaintiff knew that said board had used a form of such contract, and that it had not been changed, that provided that such contract might be terminated by either party, by giving the other party thirty days' notice thereof. Any contract made between the plaintiff and the board was subject to said terms and conditions, and the provisions of law. The plaintiff had been employed as teacher in said normal school, and conductor, up to the aforesaid date, on said terms and conditions, and at a salary of $2,000 per school year, payable in monthly installments, and $50 per week and traveling expenses as conductor of institutes; and he continued in said employment for the school year commencing September 1, 1891, and ending the 24th of June, 1892, on the same terms and conditions. During said school year, and prior to March 16, 1892, there was a contention between the president and the professors and students of said normal school, and the plaintiff had become so involved therein as to impair his usefulness as a teacher in said school. The board therefore deemed it advisable that the plaintiff should be removed from his position as teacher in said school, and at a meeting of said board held in conformity to law, on the 16th day of March, 1892, at its office at Madison, said board adopted a resolution that the secretary of said board give a written notice to Prof. S. Y. Gillan that his services as a teacher in the Milwaukee Normal School, and institute conductor, be terminated at the end of thirty days thereafter, and that his services as an employé of the board end in thirty days from his receipt of said notice. The plaintiff acknowledged the receipt of said notice on the 18th day of March, 1892. The services of the plaintiff as such teacher and conductor ended, therefore, on the 18th day of April, 1892, and said contract of employment was dissolved and terminated at said date, and since then the plaintiff has not been an employé of said board. The board, on the 25th day of March, 1892, paid the plaintiff $150 on the pay roll of that month, and on or before the 15th day of July thereafter the board tendered to the plaintiff the further sum of $141.68, as the balance of his compensation as teacher and conductor, and for expenses, which the plaintiff refused to receive; and the board has tendered the plaintiff the sum of $324.06 in all, including costs, and has paid the money into court. For this last-named sum the plaintiff obtained judgment.

The action was dismissed, so far as the plaintiff sought to recover any salary or compensation for the school year subsequent to the 18th day of April, 1892. The facts stated in the answer, and the amounts tendered the plaintiff, appear to leave nothing at issue, except the plaintiff's claim of $641 as the balance of his salary up to the end of the school year, — June 24, 1892. That question depends upon the right of the board to terminate the contract on the 18th day of April, 1892, at its mere pleasure or discretion, and that is the only question on this appeal. The parties do not differ, so far as the contract is for the school year at the salary of $2,000 per year, payable in monthly installments. The court does not find that the contract between the plaintiff and the board gave either party the right to terminate it on thirty days' notice. But the court seems to predicate the right of the board to terminate the contract at pleasure entirely on the statute, which became a part of, and governs, it. The appellant ought not to be so very particular and critical as to the legality of the meeting of the board which resolved to notify him that his contract was terminated, when the contract itself had its inception in a very informal, if any, action of the board; and the existence of any special contract for the year commencing September 1, 1891, depends upon mere inference, presumption, or implication from the fact that he had such a contract the year before. The board met, and so resolved, and its secretary served the notice of it upon the plaintiff. That was sufficient at least to terminate such a questionable special contract. If there was a hiring of the plaintiff for any certain time, it is implied, rather than expressed. Section 404, Rev. Stat., provides that "the said board shall have the government and control of all the normal schools and shall have power to appoint a principal and assistants and such other teachers and officers, and to employ such persons as may be required for each of said schools; to fix the salary of each person so appointed or employed, and to prescribe their several duties."

Subdivision 2. "To remove at pleasure any principal, assistant or other officer or persons from any office or employment in connection with any such school." Subdivision 3. This statute the court below held, and the learned counsel of the respondent contends, gave the board of regents of normal schools the power to remove the plaintiff from his employment as a teacher of the Milwaukee Normal School, as they attempted to do, April 18, 1892. The learned counsel of the appellant contends that the contract under which the plaintiff was employed contained no such provision, and that the statute does not compel the board to remove teachers without assigning any cause, and that one of the by-laws of the board requires the committee to make formal written contracts with teachers, and such contracts do not contain any such provision. This power was wisely given to the board. An emergency might arise when the continuance of an objectionable teacher, even for a day, in his employment, might be very injurious to the school. The trial of a teacher in a normal school, on charges of misconduct, with its delays and publicity, and the excitement it would produce, and the feelings it would engender, would be very injurious to the school; and it would most likely make heated partisans of the other teachers and the scholars in the contest, and the evil consequences would be great, if not endless. There is no other way in which the character of the teacher could be saved, except by silent removal. An evil-disposed and perverse teacher might prefer to have charges against him made public, and to rally his forces of teachers and scholars and outside friends, and have a fight and battle with the board, no matter how much the school might be injured by it. It is at least doubtful whether the board could set on foot a trial of charges against a teacher of a normal school, with a view of merely removing him. It would seem to defeat the wise purpose the legislature had in view in giving the board this power of removal at pleasure. The question is not whether the board is bound to exercise this power in all cases, but whether, in case they do remove a teacher summarily, the courts could interfere with the exercise of their discretion or reverse their action.

1. This power of summary removal of a teacher, vested in the board by statute, is a discretionary power, and its exercise in a given case cannot be inquired into, or questioned, by the courts. Atty. Gen. v. Brown, 1 Wis. 513; State v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254; State v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496; State v. Kuehn, 34 Wis. 229; State v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610; Reg. v. Darlington School, 6 Q. B. 682; Re Hennen, 38 U. S. 15 Pet. 230, 10 L. ed. 188; State v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98.

2. This statute that gives the board the power of removal of all teachers at pleasure becomes a part of every contract the board makes with a teacher for his employment in a normal school. This is an old and incontestable principle of the law of contracts. Bishop, Cont. § 439, and cases cited. In Head v. Curators of the University of Missouri, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 530, 22 L. ed. 160, the court said, in relation to the employment of a professor in the Missouri University: "That he and his office and contract were subject to the laws in existence at the time of making it was sufficiently evident, without any declaration on the point."

3. The board of regents could make no by-law or contract by which this power could be bargained away, limited, or restricted. Lauenstein v. Fond du Lac, 28 Wis. 336; Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 268, 269, 471; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 96, 97; Brimmer v. Boston, 102 Mass. 19; Boylston Market Asso. v. Boston, 113 Mass. 528; Reg. v. Darlington School, 6 Q. B. 682. This last case is much in point.

The letters-patent gave the governors of the Darlington School, established by a charter of Queen Elizabeth, the power to remove a teacher or schoolmaster "according to their sound discretion." The case was of a mandamus to restore a teacher who had been removed without charges. The governors had made a by-law by which teachers were to be removed on charges, and the teacher to be heard in his defense. Lord Denman held that "the discretionary power given by the letters-patent was fatal to the validity of the by-law." That "the governors, when they undertook to govern the school in the manner required by the charter, accepted a larger trust and a wider duty. They are bound to remove a master who, according to their sound discretion, they think unfit for the place. The power of the governors to remove justifies their doing so, and it is not to be restricted by any opinion we may have of the reasons on which they might have been induced to exert it." The doctrine of that case has never been repudiated or questioned. It is sound in reason as well as in law. When such a discretionary power has been exercised, it can no more be questioned than the statute itself.

4. After the plaintiff had been removed, and the contract relation between himself and the board terminated, and notice thereof received by him, his right to any further salary or compensation, as a matter of course, is also terminated. Beach, Pub. Corp. § 168 et seq.; Eckloff v. District of Columbia, 135 U. S. 240, 34 L. ed. 120; Langdon v. New York, 92 N. Y. 427; Gillespie v. New York, 6 Daly, 286; Gregory v. New York, 113 N. Y. 416, 3 L. R. A. 854.

The contract of the plaintiff with the board was not for any certain time, but to continue only so long as the board may not exercise this statutory power of removal. The statute became a condition of his contract, as much as if it was written in it, that the board might remove him at pleasure. He accepted the employment with knowledge of the law on this condition of his contract, and he has no reason to complain of it. These principles appear to be unquestionable. The learned counsel has cited no case in contradiction of them. The cases he cites are those in which no notice of the termination of the employment had been given. In Butler v. Regents of the University, 32 Wis. 124, the regents did not exercise the power of removal, and there was no such question in the case. In Tripp v. Utica School Dist. No. 3, 50 Wis. 651, this court held, in effect, that the termination of the services of the teacher was not authorized by the statute. If the exercise of this discretionary power conferred on the board by the statute is not effectual to remove a teacher in the normal schools, and terminate his wages, then the statute is nugatory, and has no force whatever, and it had better be repealed. We can come to no other conclusion than that of the circuit court,—that the plaintiff was entitled to no compensation or salary beyond the 18th day of April, 1892. The removal of the plaintiff is not questioned as an abuse of the discretion of the board. This has been a very unfortunate controversy; but it is better that it has been in the courts, than before the board of regents of normal schools, on the trial of charges against the plaintiff, with the view of his removal, for cause, and it has done far less harm to the plaintiff or the school. The plaintiff's competency and ability as a teacher have not been questioned, or his moral character assailed. He had unfortunately become embroiled in controversies which impaired his usefulness as a teacher, and threatened the success, peace, and harmony of the school. It was thought, no doubt, by the board, that his removal in this quite way would promote the interests of the Milwaukee Normal School, and the board has not been charged with any other motive. This important case has been very ably presented by the learned counsel on both sides, and we have endeavored to give to it sufficient attention to arrive at a correct conclusion.

P. F. DUFFY et al., J. N. Camden and George W. Curtin, Appts.

(..... W. Va. ....)

- *1. Where one by writing empowers another to sell land, implying a cash sale, and the agent simply transfers the writing to a third person, without payment of purchase money, this is not a sale.
2. A mere proposal to sell land does not become a sale until accepted, and notice of acceptance given the proposer.
3. In unilateral contracts, called options, the time fixed for acceptance is of the essence of the contract.
4. A power of attorney may fix a limit of time within which the agent is to do the act. Where it fixes a reasonable time for doing the act, it must be done by the agent within a reasonable time, in order to bind the principal. A proposal of sale made under such power must be accepted within a reasonable time from the date of the power.
5. One dealing with an agent acting under written power is taken to deal with the power spread out before him, and must inspect it to see whether the agent's act is authorized by the power.
6. One dealing with a special agent does so at his peril. He must be careful to see that the agent's authority covers the act he does.
7. An agent appointed by parol to sell land cannot receive purchase money, unless so authorized by his power.
8. A power of attorney merely to sell land implies that the agent shall sell for cash.

9. Specific performance being addressed to the sound discretion of the court, the party asking it must have been ready, willing, and prompt in the performance of those things incumbent on him, and where he has not been so, and it would impose hardship and be inequitable upon the other party, specific performance will be refused.

APPEAL by defendants Camden and Curtin from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kanawha County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to compel specific performance of an alleged contract to convey real estate.

Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson for appellants.

Messrs. Brown, Jackson & Knight for appellee.

BRANNON, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a chancery suit of E. B. Dyer against P. F. Duffy and others in the circuit court of Kanawha county, by which Dyer sought to compel J. N. Camden and George W. Curtin to convey to him certain lands on Grassy creek and Elk river, in Webster county. The decree compelled Camden and Curtin to make such conveyance, and they appeal.

In response to a letter from Duffy, not in the record, the nature of which we can only glean from the reply, Camden wrote the following letter: "Parkersburg, W. Va., April 30th, 1888. P. F. Duffy, Esq., Charleston, W. Va.—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 17th instant received, stating that if I will give you an option for a short time on the Elk and Grassy creek lands, in Webster county, you think you can sell the same for one dollar per acre. I will be glad to sell at one dollar an acre, and will confirm any sale you make to that effect within a reasonable time. I will also sell you the lands at seventy-five cents (75) per acre, if you conclude to take them yourself, and will let me know about it soon. Yours, very truly, J. N. Camden." Upon it is this indorsement, made May 8, 1888: "I hereby transfer the within to E. B. Dyer. P. F. Duffy." Camden afterwards sold and conveyed the land to Curtin. A question which at once presents itself is whether or not Dyer has any right to the land such as he can enforce against Camden, irrespective of the rights of Curtin; for, if he has not, he can succeed against neither. The letter of Camden to Duffy presents two legal features. The one makes Duffy Camden's agent to sell his land; the other makes a proposal to sell the land to Duffy. Let us look at it in the first aspect. When Duffy indorsed on the letter, "I assign the within to E. B. Dyer," what did he assign? It is vague and uncertain. He could not assign the agency,—the power to sell for Camden,—since an agent without power of substitution in his authority cannot assign his power. Story, Ag. § 18. But it is said that Duffy, as agent for Camden, under the first clause, sold the land to Dyer. May we not as well, or more plausibly, say that, taking only the assignment, it relates to the personal right of Duffy? But does this assignment purport to be an act of agency or of sale? It does not purport to be the act of Camden by Duffy, his agent. When an agent does an act for his principal, he must in some way indicate that it is the act of a principal by an agent. We have to annex the letter to the assignment, it is true; but still it remains indefinite, whether it is an attempted subrogation of Dyer to Duffy's power to sell, or an assignment of his own right to purchase, or a sale as agent. It contains not a word importing a present sale of land. It gives no terms. Where no terms are fixed, cash is implied, I know; but I use this argument to show that it is straining the act and implying a sale to treat these few words of assignment as a sale. If the parties intended it as a final act of sale, would they not have made a more definite instrument? It seems likely that Duffy gave it simply to authorize Dyer to find a purchaser. Dyer did set about seeking a purchaser, tending to show that he did not regard himself then a purchaser. If he and Duffy intended by the assignment to make a final sale, would we not expect that Duffy would require cash, as Camden's letter would legally import, or that, if on credit, they would fix terms of credit? Would Dyer risk his purchase without either paying or seeing to terms of credit? Dyer set about seeking a purchaser until, having found one, as he thought, he concluded to consummate a purchase, and on October 13, 1888, deposited in bank, to Duffy's credit, the purchase money. His action indicates that he did not regard himself a purchaser by mere force of the assignment, as he risked no money on it. There is another consideration repelling any idea that we can hold Dyer a purchaser on the date of the assignment. Camden's letter gave no credit. Dyer paid not a dollar down. He took, if Duffy did not give, nearly six months' credit, and Duffy had no authority to make a credit sale, and such a sale would not bind Camden. One dealing with an agent under written power deals with that power before him, and Dyer did have this letter before him, and took it into possession. One dealing with an agent under written power must take notice of his powers, as an act not authorized is not binding on the principal. Curry v. Halle, 15 W. Va. 867; Hewes v. Doddridge, 1 Rob. (Va.) 148; Stainback v. Read, 11 Gratt. 281, 62 Am. Dec. 648.

Duffy was a special agent to sell particular land, not a general agent, and those dealing with a special agent do so at their peril as to his authority. 2 Kent. Com. 621; Story, Ag. § 126. A sale on credit would not bind Camden, as under a mere power to sell land, not authorizing credit, the agent cannot sell on credit. 1 Parsons, Cont. 58; Burks v. Hubbard, 69 Ala. 379; Delafield v. Illinois, 28 Wend. 192; Dresden School Dist. No. 6 v. Aetna Ins. Co. 62 Me. 880; Lumpkin v. Wilson, 5 Heisk. 555; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 860; 2 Kent, Com. 622; Story, Ag. § 77. The deposit of purchase money in bank was no payment to Camden, as it was deposited to Duffy's credit, and, as the power to Duffy was only a parol power to sell, he could not receive purchase money. Mann v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 49, 42 Am. Rep. 771. An agent empowered by seal to sell or sell and convey for cash, or perhaps to sell and convey merely, may receive the money; but if the power is by parol, and does not expressly authorize the agent to receive the money, or, though under seal, provides for a credit, he cannot receive it. If, without payment, there had been a consummated, binding contract, this would not be material. Duffy had a silent, undefined interest in the land, but the money going to Camden was separately his, and Duffy's interest would not authorize him to receive it.

Another reason against compelling Camden to specific performance of the alleged sale is that he empowered Duffy to sell "within a reasonable time." The assignment was in a reasonable time, but it could not alone constitute a sale. No money was paid nor terms of credit provided for. If we treat this assignment as a finished sale, we would have to call it, as between agent and purchaser, a "credit,"—one unauthorized by the power, not binding Camden, he ignorant of it. I use this as a circumstance against any theory that this assignment made a sale. It is the only act within a reasonable time; the act of deposit, the next act, not being within a reasonable time. I do not mean that, under the letter, Duffy could not within a reasonable time make a proposal to sell, to be accepted within a reasonable time, or that, if so accepted, payment was essential to the birth of a contract; for I think that such a proposal, so accepted, would make a contract, and Dyer need not pay until he received a deed, unless payment were made an essential element of acceptance,—a condition precedent to the birth of a contract. If we say that the deposit in bank was an act of payment under the sale made by the assignment, it came too late, because, as an act constituting an essential part of the sale, treating it as an election by Dyer to take the land, it was not within the reasonable time required by the letter of Camden, and because that required a payment to Camden, not a deposit to Duffy's credit, he having no authority to receive; and because, if it had even been deposited to Camden's credit, it would not be good unless, with notice of the deposit, he waived money payment; and because, also, Camden had no notice whatever of such deposit until he had sold the land to another,—until, indeed, this suit was brought. But it will be said that Duffy knew of this deposit. That makes no difference. His powers as agent ended months before with the supposed sale. He had no power in regard to payment of the money, and, of course, his knowledge as to that would not bind Camden, as the doctrine that notice to an agent is notice to his principal applies only to a matter as to which he is agent. If Dyer relied upon such deposit to Duffy's name, he must notify Camden himself of it.

The assignment alone is thus no sale, and gives Dyer no right. But, though the force of the assignment arises in the case, I do not understand that it is claimed that it is alone a contract, but the origin of what finally by the deposit became a contract. The action of Dyer speaks his construction of this indefinite assignment. It has been well said by Sugden, "Tell me what you have done under a deed, and I will tell you what that deed means." Dyer did not pay or offer a dollar at the date of the assignment. He went about seeking a purchaser, likely on speculation. When he had found one, and not before, he deposited the purchase money. In his evidence he treated Camden's letter as an offer by Camden to sell, and said he accepted it, and he was asked if, "at the time you made said deposit, and accepted the offer, did you have any notice?" of a withdrawal of Camden's offer, thus treating the deposit as the acceptance. He says when he made the deposit he asked Duffy to have the deed made, again treating the deposit as his acceptance. He says that certain obstacles existed in the way of confusion of land titles in Webster, and finding papers to give chain of title and boundaries of these lands, and that he would consider six months a reasonable time to consummate the sale. His evidence in the respects named, and in other respects in its drift and spirit, shows that Dyer construed the matter to this effect, namely: That by the letter Camden made a proposal to sell; that by its assignment he, Dyer, became, not at once a purchaser, but entitled to become such, should he thereafter choose to do so; and that by depositing the purchase money in bank to Duffy's credit, with notice to Duffy of the deposit, he became a full purchaser, entitled to call for a deed. Let us, then, so treat it. What aspect does it present? A proposal by Camden, through his agent, to Dyer. Camden's proposal required a consummated sale within a reasonable time. Both clauses of his letter speak an intent not to give long time to effect a sale, but to require promptness. It was an option to purchase, a proposal,—as the letter itself calls itself, an "option,"—and under the language of the offer, as well as the general law of contracts touching a proposal, it must be accepted, and acceptance made known, and within a reasonable time. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 L. R. A. 94; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738; Hanty v. Watterson (decided this term) 39 W. Va.—; Whart. Cont. § 9; Bishop, Cont. § 327. A mere option to purchase vests no right until accepted. Stembridge v. Stembridge, 87 Ky. 91; Boatwick v. Hess, 80 Ill. 188. In case of unilateral contracts, called options, as the obligation is, before acceptance, on one side only, the proposer being bound to comply with his proposal, while the other party is under no obligation, and under no peril until acceptance, the provision of the offer as to time of acceptance is viewed with strictness. Fry, Spec. Perf. § 733; Harding v. Gibbs, 125 Ill. 85. In such contracts the doctrine, often stated, that time is not of the essence of the contract, does not apply; that doctrine applies to contracts when made, not to offers to make them. In case of proposals, time is of the essence as to acceptance. Stembridge v. Stembridge, supra; Longworth v. Mitchell, 26 Ohio St. 334; Barrett v. McAllister and Weaver v. Burr, supra. See valuable collection of authorities on subject of options generally in notes to Lits v. Goodling (Ky.) 21 L. R. A. 127. Shall we say nearly six months was a reasonable time merely to make an election to accept or reject? Surely not. The mere general statement that titles in Webster were confused, without specification or suggestion of any defect as to this land, and that there was some delay in getting boundaries offers no adequate excuse for delay. He must accept or reject the offer sooner. Camden would want to sell himself, or get another to sell, or have the benefit of a period when timber lands were salable, and not tie himself down to one proposal for so long a time that the period would pass away. It seems certain that Dyer wanted to buy only in the event he could find a purchaser, and could not sooner do so. Camden was not required to wait for this. Time will cancel and withdraw a proposal as effectually as express withdrawal, with notice, if acceptance be unduly delayed. Bishop, Cont. § 327; 1 Whart. Cont. §§ 9, 15. Camden waited four months without a hint from Duffy or Dyer of the assignment of his letter to Dyer, or that Dyer had any idea of buying, and then himself sold the land to another, with Duffy's written consent, spoken of below, and it is now proposed to enforce a proposal or option not accepted for nearly six months. Take the second clause of the letter. Its effect arises in the case, and is before us, but it seems not to be relied upon. It is only a proposal by Camden to sell to Duffy, if he would communicate an acceptance soon. Both under the law and the language of this offer, it was no sale until Duffy accepted, and made known his acceptance to Camden. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 L. R. A. 94; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463. It vested no interest in the land. Stembridge v. Stembridge, 87 Ky. 91; Boatwick v. Hess, 80 Ill. 188. Never did Duffy accept it. Therefore, if the intent was to assign his personal right of purchase, it is abortive, because Duffy had no interest in the land to transfer to Dyer. Could he assign the right to accept? He could not, because it was a personal right to Duffy to buy at a certain price, whereas a sale to another was fixed at a higher price; and it was a mere option, and that, before acceptance, seems to be non assignable. There is nothing to assign. It is no contract until acceptance, and a man may rely on the honesty, solvency, and promptness of one, but not of another. Sutherland v. Parkins, 75 Ill. 388; Warvelle, Vend. 187, 188; Weaver v. Burr, Barrett v. McAllister and Watson v. Coast, supra. The earliest act of acceptance would be October 13, 1888, when Dyer deposited in bank the purchase money. This was too late. The letter of option expressly limited Duffy's acceptance by the word "soon." Who will say that five and a half months was soon? Soon means promptly and, also, by it Duffy was to let Camden know of his acceptance soon. Dyer never informed Camden of this deposit. He did not know of it until this suit was brought nor of any acceptance by Duffy or Dyer; and the deposit was to Duffy's credit, not Camden's. Under this second clause, what earthly right would Duffy have to receive the money? None, he being the purchaser. Duffy knew of the deposit; but, of course that was no notice of acceptance to Camden, for, under this clause, Duffy could not be agent and purchaser. And, moreover, an agent appointed by parol to sell cannot receive purchase money. Mann v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 49, 42 Am. Rep. 771.

Thus, a review of the case in all its material bearings leads to the conclusion that Dyer had no enforceable contract. Duffy joins in an answer with Camden and Curtin, denying utterly any such sale in fact or law. If any one could give a clear statement on this matter, Duffy is that one. Why did not the plaintiff put him on the stand to attest the sale? The burden is on the plaintiff to prove a sale and remove obscurity from this obscure transaction, and Duffy is the very man who, as the plaintiff says, conferred his right. Dyer says that, when he made the deposit, he requested Duffy to have Camden make a deed, and he thinks Duffy said he had requested Camden to make a deed. Why not prove this by Duffy? Why not prove by Duffy, if such was the fact, that Camden was informed of the assignment, and of the deposit, and approve it, and so waived the delay? Camden swears that he did not know of the assignment of his letter by Duffy to Dyer until the date of his deposition in this suit,—June 15, 1892,—and was given no information of any negotiation between Duffy and Dyer, and none of the deposit by Dyer. Why not prove to the reverse by Duffy, after Camden's evidence called for such proof, if the contrary was true? Dyer in October, after the deposit, sent B. W. Byrne to Camden to see about a deed. Did Byrne tell Camden of the assignment and deposit? We do not know. Byrne, the agent chosen by Dyer for this mission, is not called by him to prove those or any facts.

I have above sought to show that, tested by principles of law, Dyer never had any enforceable contract for the purchase of these lands. But suppose we treat that vague, uncertain act of assignment of Camden's letter by Duffy to Dyer as creating a contract to sell to Dyer. Then I say that, on the merits, a court of equity ought not to enforce it. Specific performance rests in the sound discretion of the court under all the circumstances. He who asks it must have done those things required of him. Say that the assignment operated as a sale, or say that it was a proposal, as Dyer himself viewed it, giving him right to buy if he thereafter should elect to do so. Neither he nor Duffy informed Camden, until the last of October by Byrne, if he did then. He did not do any act of payment or election to take the land until his deposit in bank, October 13th. He never informed Camden of this election or deposit. If the assignment be treated as a sale, it was Dyer's duty at once to offer to pay Camden, and get his deed. He did not do so. If we regard the assignment as only a proposal giving Dyer right to purchase thereafter, it was Dyer's duty, on election to consummate, to seek Camden, and offer to pay him on delivery of a deed. He did not do so. He deposited the money to Duffy's credit, he having no right to receive; and this nearly six months after the date of proposal, and then did not notify Camden. He knew, too, before he made the deposit, that C. P. Dorr, who purchased the land of Camden for Curtin, was in actual negotiation with Camden for the land, and yet never informed Camden that he, Dyer, had the assignment from Duffy, or had any negotiations with Duffy, but allowed Camden and Dorr to go on and close. His own interest, if he then regarded himself a purchaser, or as having right to become such as also justice to Camden, called upon him to let Camden know of his rights and claim. But he allowed Camden to go on and close the sale to Dorr by a deed to Curtin binding Camden by general warranty. It looks like Dyer had yet not made up his mind to buy. Curtin paid for the land and obtained his deed in ignorance of any claim by Dyer. Would it be right for a court of equity to compel Camden to make good his warranty, and Curtin lose his land, under such circumstances of delay, indecision, and negligence on the part of Dyer?

In determining whether it will exercise its discretion in favor of specific performance, equity must regard the conduct of the parties. Curtin is an innocent purchaser without fault. I do not see that any imputation can be cast on Camden's conduct in the matter. He would have received more money by accepting Dyer's deposit than what he received from Curtin. He had right to expect that, if anything would be done under his letter to Dyer, it would be done promptly, and so provided in it, and that he would not be month after month kept in ignorance of what did take place under it. And, when Dorr approached Camden on the subject of buying the land, he told Dorr that there were reasons why he could not sell him the land without Duffy's consent, and that he must see Duffy, and have his consent; and afterwards Dorr presented Camden a letter from Duffy, dated August 25, 1888, saying that he gave Dorr privilege to buy his interest in the lands (it appearing that Duffy had some silent interest in them), and in a few days after the date of this letter Camden sold the land to Dorr. Now, would not Camden, knowing nothing whatever of any assignment of his letter to Dyer, or any negotiations between Duffy and Dyer conclude that Duffy contemplated no action under that letter, and that it was at an end? It does not appear that Dyer knew of the letter from Duffy to Camden. I refer to it, however, as a pertinent circumstance, tending to show that Camden's action was in good motive, and not such as to place him under the condemnation of a court of equity when deciding whether to give or withhold relief against him. I do not at all intend to have it even inferred that any reflection of bad motive or purpose lies at Dyer's door. All we say is that, whatever his right, he made his election too late, and was not in any respect diligent to protect his right. Courts of equity will not exercise jurisdiction in specific performance where it would impose hardship on people not censurable in conduct, and where the circumstances and condition of things have so changed as to make it work loss and hardship to them. Bonles v. Woodson, 6 Gratt. 78; Booten v. Scheffer, 21 Gratt. 474; Clay v. Deskins, 86 W. Va. 850.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following is the statement of facts taken from the brief of the counsel for the defendants in error, to wit: "On the 5th day of January, in the year 1893, at an election in the town of Hurricane, Putnam county, W. Va., a town incorporated under chapter 47 of the Code, for municipal officers of said town, John M. Thompson and C. A. Smith, residents of said town, and entitled to vote for members of its common council, together with G. W. Dudding, J. P. Mynes, and M. L. Dunfee, were elected to office of councilmen of said town for the year commencing on the 1st day of February, 1893; the number of councilmen for said town being five, the town not being laid off into wards. On the 16th day of January, 1893, at a meeting of the outgoing council, the returns of said election were canvassed, and it was declared that the above five persons received the largest number of votes at said election for the office of councilmen of said town; and said council, at this meeting further decided, among other things, that said Thompson and Smith were not duly elected officers of said town, because they were not freeholders therein, and further declared that W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, two members of the old council, but not elected to the new council, should hold over as councilmen until their successors were qualified,—the said Smith, at that time, and at the time of said election, being in possession of a lot of land in said town, which he owned by a title bond, and said Thompson's wife, at said dates, owning in fee land in said town. On the 17th day of January, 1893, the said Smith and J. M. Thompson each bought land in said town, which was conveyed to them, respectively, by deeds dated, respectively, on the 17th and 18th of January, 1893. On the 20th day of January, 1893, the said Thompson and Smith each duly took the oath of office as councilmen of said town, and duly filed the same with the recorder, or acting recorder. At the first meeting of the new council, said Turley and Losee being present and acting, on the 6th day of February, 1893, the said Thompson and Smith presented themselves, and demanded that they be admitted to the office of councilmen, and permitted to perform their duties as such, but they were refused and denied admittance to their office. On the 11th day of February, 1893, the said Smith and Thompson obtained from the judge of the circuit court of Putnam county a mandamus nisi to Wm. H. McAllister, mayor; R. V. Dorsey, claiming to be and acting as recorder; G. W. Dudding, J. H. Mynes, and M. L. Dunfee, councilmen; and W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, claiming to be and acting as councilmen of said town,—commanding the first five to admit said Thompson and Smith into the office of councilmen of said town, and commanding said Losee and Turley to surrender and turn over to said Thompson and Smith the office of councilmen of said town. The defendants Dudding and Mynes made return to said mandamus nisi that they were willing, and had always been, to admit said plaintiffs to the office of councilmen, and had made and seconded a motion to admit them, but that the majority, including said Losee and Turley, had voted against the motion. The defendants McAllister, Dorsey, Dunfee, Losee, and Turley moved to quash the writ of mandamus nisi, which motion the court overruled; and, the said defendants not desiring to make return to said writ, the court gave judgment for a peremptory writ of mandamus to issue, from which judgment the last five of defendants have obtained this writ of error and supersedeas."

Appellants assign these grounds of error in their petition for writ of error, viz.: First, it was error in the circuit court to hold the statute which requires councilmen to be freeholders unconstitutional; second, the circuit court should have sustained the motion to quash the alternative writ of mandamus because, among other defects upon the face thereof, the plaintiffs, claiming several rights, could not obtain a joint writ of mandamus; third, said motion to quash should also have been sustained because the alternative writ of mandamus failed to make a case for the plaintiffs, or either of them, to obtain the relief prayed for.

In my opinion, there are only two questions suggested by the facts in this case as proper, at the present time, for the consideration of this court: (1) Is the law containing the freehold requirement constitutional? (2) If so, have the relators mistaken their remedy as to all other questions raised by them?

1. In determining this constitutional question, we find the rule plainly laid down in the case of State v. Dent, 25 W. Va. 19, in these words, to wit: "Article 6, section 1, of our Constitution provides: 'The legislative power shall be vested in a senate and a house of delegates.' This obviously confers on them all legislative power, except such as they are prohibited by the constitution, in other provisions, from exercising." And the person claiming that an act of the legislature is an infringement of the restrictions of the constitution must point out the provision plainly forbidding, either by express words or by inevitable implication, the passage of such act; and, if none such exists, the act, however unjust or unreasonable it may seem, is valid, and must be sustained by this court. Judge Cooley, as quoted approvingly in the above case, lays down the rule that "any legislative act which does not encroach upon the powers apportioned to other departments of the government, being prima facie, valid, must be enforced, unless restrictions upon the legislative authority can be pointed out in the constitution, and the case shown to come within them." The defendants in error, recognizing the binding force of this rule, point out three sections of the constitution all and each of which they claim are violated by the act in question:

First. Section 4, article 4, which provides that "no person except a citizen entitled to vote shall be elected or appointed to any office, state, county or municipal." That because this section forbids any persons except qualified electors to hold office, by just implication, the converse of the proposition is also included in the meaning of the section; that is to say, that all electors are duly qualified to hold office. Such reasoning is very fallacious. This provision was simply intended to limit the number from whom the various officers of this state might be chosen to those having a voice in the selection of such officers, and not in any sense intended to determine the qualifications necessary to properly discharge the duties of any office. For the electors to say in the constitution adopted by them that "no one but ourselves shall ever be elected or appointed to any office in this state" does not, by implication, say to the legislature, further, "You shall pass no law that would prevent any of us from holding office," for such an important matter as this would not be left to implication if the electors had considered such a provision desirable. While we have no decision in this state touching this question, the highest tribunals of other states have construed similar provisions in their state constitutions as above indicated. In the case of Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 420, the supreme court of that state, in passing on the same question here raised says: "Counsel argue that section 6, article 7, of the Constitution provides that 'no person except a qualified elector shall be elected to any civil or military office in the state,' by implication, inhibits the legislature from adding the property qualification under consideration. There is nothing in the constitution which expressly designates the qualifications of councilmen in a city or town, and this section contains the only language that can possibly be construed as applicable thereto. But it will be observed that the language used is negative in form; that it simply prohibits the election or appointment to office of one not a qualified elector. There is no conflict between it and the statute. By providing that a supervisor or an alderman shall be a taxpayer, the legislature does not declare that he need not be an elector. Nor is the provision at all unreasonable. On the contrary, it is a safeguard of the highest importance to property owners within the corporation. The right to vote and the right to hold office must not be confused. Citizenship, and the requisite sex, age, and residence, constitute the individual a legal voter, but other qualifications are absolutely essential to the efficient performance of the duties connected with almost every office; and certainly no doubtful implication should be favored, for the purpose of denying the right to demand such additional qualifications as the nature of the particular office may reasonably require. We do not believe that the framers of the constitution, by this provision, intended to say that the right to vote should be the sole and exclusive test of eligibility to all civil offices, except as otherwise provided in the instrument itself; that no additional qualifications should ever be demanded, and no other disqualifications should be imposed. If, as has been well said, they 'had intended to take away from the legislature the power to name disqualifications for office, other than the one named in the constitution, it would not have been left to the very doubtful implication which is claimed from the provision under consideration.' State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102." In the latter decision the court laid down the law in a syllabus as follows, to wit: "The provision in the Constitution (sec. 4, art. 15) that no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector does not by implication forbid the legislature to require other reasonable qualifications for office."

Second. The next claim of the counsel is that the latter clause of section 5, article 4, is violated, which is in these words: "And no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification unless herein otherwise provided;" his argument being that the freehold requirement is a test, within the meaning of the constitution. The assertion is so unfounded as to hardly need refutation. This clause is simply an application of section 11, article 3, to the case of officeholders, which is in these words: "Sec. 11. Political tests, requiring persons as a prerequisite to the enjoyment of their civil and political rights, to purge themselves by their own oaths of past alleged offences, are repugnant to the principles of free government and are cruel and oppressive. No religious or political test oath shall be required as a prerequisite or qualification to vote, serve as a juror, sue, plead, appeal or pursue any profession or employment. Nor shall any person be deprived by law, of any right, or privilege, because of any act done prior to the passage of such law." As will be seen at a glance, nothing is said about holding office, in this section, but it is made to apply alone to the right "to vote, serve as a juror, sue, plead, appeal or pursue any profession or employment." To remedy the omission here, the constitution makers added the clause to section 5, article 4, which refers alone to religious and political tests as a prerequisite or qualification for office, and has nothing whatever to do with any just qualification that the legislature may deem necessary to a proper discharge of the functions of the office. In the case of Rogers v

Buffalo, 128 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579, the court of appeals, construing the same provisions in the New York constitution, says. "Still another ground of invalidity is alleged by the appellant. He says that the statute conflicts with article 12, which provides for the taking of an oath of office by members of the legislature and all officers, executive and judicial, before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, which oath is therein set forth; and it is there stated that 'no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office of public trust.' The statute by which an applicant for appointment to a position in a public office is made to show his fitness therefor is claimed to constitute an illegal test, within the meaning of this section.

We do not think that the provision above cited was ever intended to have any such broad construction. Looking at it as a matter of common sense, we are quite sure that the framers of our organic law never intended to oppose a constitutional barrier to the right of the people, through their legislature, to enact laws which should have for their sole object the possession of fit and proper qualifications for the performance of the duties of a public office on the part of him who desired to be appointed to such office. So long as the means adopted to accomplish such end are appropriate therefor, they must be within the legislative power. The idea cannot be entertained for one moment that any intelligent people would ever consent to so bind themselves with constitutional restrictions on the power of their own representatives as to prevent the adoption of any means by which to secure, if possible, honest and intelligent service in public office. No law involving any test other than fitness and ability to discharge the duties of the office could be legally enacted under cover of a purpose to ascertain or prescribe such fitness. Statutes looking only to the purpose of ascertaining whether candidates for an appointive office are possessed of those qualifications which are necessary for a fit and intelligent discharge of the duties pertaining to such office are not dangerous in their nature, and in their execution they are not liable to abuse, in any manner involving the liberties of the people. . . . In this case, we simply hold that the imposing of a test, by means of which to secure the qualifications of a candidate for an appointive office, of a nature to enable him to properly and intelligently perform the duties of such office, violates no provision of the Constitution." The same reasoning would hold good in an elective office, so far as the section under discussion is concerned.

Third. The last claim of the counsel is that the provision complained of is in violation of section 8, article 4, of the Constitution, in which the legislature is empowered to "prescribe by general laws the terms of office, powers, duties and compensation of all public officers and agents, and the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed and removed." This section includes all municipal officers, and was only intended to require the legislature to enact general, and not special, laws in relation to the matters included in the section. But the counsel argue that "by granting the legislature the authority to establish offices, and provide the term of office, powers, duties, compensation, and manner of election and removal, the power to add a qualification, not being given, is excluded by implication." The learned counsel appear to forget the difference so often defined between the federal and state constitutions; the former being strictly a grant of powers, while the latter is a limitation or restriction on the powers of the state legislature, which otherwise would be supreme in all legislative matters, as it is now in all cases wherein not restricted by the constitution,—that instrument itself so declaring, as heretofore mentioned. And for the very reason that the power to prescribe qualifications is not mentioned in this section, the legislature has unrestricted control of that power. And it has been held by the court of appeals of another state that the same kind of provision gave the legislature entire control over all such officers; that the power to prescribe the manner in which they shall be elected and appointed included within it, necessarily, the power to prescribe civil-service examinations, or to prescribe that they should be chosen from a class of citizens who possess some qualification that specially fits them for office, or renders them efficient officers. In the case of People v. Cuts, 50 N. Y. 459, 10 Am. Rep. 508, the court of appeals, construing this same provision, says: "There is no right bestowed by the constitution upon the elector to choose by vote to that office. But there is a gift from the legislature to the elector so to do, or rather a power thereby intrusted to him by the statute, which may be taken back again. Now, the authority which confers a power, and may take it away, may, in bestowing it, limit and restrict its exercise, as it sees fit, so far as it is not specially prohibited therefrom, and may, within that limit, say for how long, in what manner, and upon what objects it shall be exerted. Certainly, if the legislature may say to the voter, 'You shall not vote for any one for this office, but it shall be appointive,' it may say, 'You shall not vote for any one for this office who is not free from this disqualification which we now declare.' The legislature may not put upon any elector a personal restriction from voting for any officer who may be elective, or whom it may declare elective, save such restriction as is imposed by the constitution, for from that it is especially prohibited. But it may, in the exercise of its judgment, for the public good, limit the number from whom the elector may select, for thus to legislate is within the general and sovereign power of legislation, which it constitutionally possesses." And in the syllabus the court lays down the law as follows, to wit: "Where the power is reserved to the legislature to direct the method of filling an office, whether by election or appointment, it may, in its discretion, when conferring upon the elector the power to elect, limit the number from whom he may select." In this case the freehold requirement is not, technically speaking, a qualification, but it is a limitation by the legislature in conferring the right to vote, as to the number from whom the elector may select. It is the same as if the legislature had provided that the officers of the municipality must be chosen from among the freeholders thereof, the same as grand jurors are selected. This is not class legislation, because it is in the power of any one to become a freeholder, the same as it is in the power of any one to educate himself under civil-service rules. But it is clearly within the power of the legislature, even if, as the counsel claim, "there is no good reason for such law." Experience in municipal matters, and a wise consideration of the question, will convince any unbiassed mind that such a law has under it the very best of reasons. The fact that a man owns real estate has little bearing on the question as to whether he is capable of filling an office, but the real-estate owners are the substantial people of any community,—its bone and its sinew,—and there are but few among them that do not have some property pride, and an interest in the welfare and prosperity of their permanent dwelling place. On the other hand, among those not owning real estate, belong the floating population,—those who are too trifling and unthrifty to want property, and those who, having wasted their substance in riotous living, and spent their days in idleness are jealous of their neighbors' prosperity, and are ready to tear down, destroy, and scatter broadcast, the results of hard earnings, frugal management, and careful savings. To them, although electors, the prosperity and welfare of the municipality amounts to nothing, for, like the Bedouins of the plains, 'neath the shadows of night they can fold their tents, and silently steal away, while, if there are any among the unfortunate but deserving poor who would make capable officers, their more successful neighbors are ever ready and willing to lend a helping hand, and see that they own the necessary "ten feet of ground." It was no trouble for the relators to become freeholders, when they found a necessity for so doing. A municipal corporation is the legislative grant of local self-government to the inhabitants within a certain designated territory, which is known as the "city," "town," or "village," and corporate powers granted are exercised by its inhabitants in its corporate name. The freeholders of such municipality own every foot thereof, and the benefits derived therefrom are enjoyed, and the burdens borne, almost entirely by them. The loss or gain of the municipality is their loss or gain. They favor just and reasonable taxation, because it increases the general welfare, and thereby is beneficial to their private interests. They oppose excessive and injudicious expenditures of public levies, because the waste must fall heaviest on them. They therefore have an interest that makes them efficient and reliable municipal officers. While the office of councilman is the most important office, within its limited jurisdiction, of any in the state,—combining, as it does, legislative, judicial, executive, and ministerial powers,—there is usually no pay, and but little honor, attached to such office, and the burden and annoyance are exceedingly heavy. A competent man, who has no sufficient interest in the community to become a freeholder, does not care to give his time, endure the labors, and suffer the annoyance of the office, simply to improve the property of others; and sometimes it is almost impossible to induce competent freeholders to undertake it, however great their interests may be. By making it exclusive, the office is rendered more important, and it devolves upon the freeholder, as a duty, to accept. Under our system of government, all officers are but the servants of the people, and it is but just that the people should have the best service possible; and in endeavoring to secure this, for the public weal, the legislature has wisely incorporated this provision in the general law relating to the incorporation of cities, towns, and villages, and it is now in the special charter of nearly every city and town of over 2,000 inhabitants. It is further plain, under our statutory law, the candidate must be a freeholder at the time he is voted for, because the voter has a right to presume that the candidate is eligible to the office at the time he asks his suffrage; otherwise, the election is void. The election law especially requires that, in nominating candidates for office, they shall be certified to be legally qualified to hold the office for which nominated. But it is not necessary to decide this question at the present time, except as a mere dictum.

The constitutional question being out of the way, the only other question that presents itself is whether mandamus is the proper remedy to review the action of a municipal council in determining, under the law, that a candidate is not legally qualified to hold the office. This entirely depends on the fact as to whether the council, in so determining, was acting within the limits of its authority, or assuming a jurisdiction it did not possess. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to control the action of a municipal body, when acting within the scope of its legal powers but only when it refuses to act at all, or is acting without legislative authority. Mason County Supra. v. Minturn, 4 W. Va. 300. Section 23, chap. 47, Code, provides: "All contested elections shall be heard and decided by the council." This constitutes the council a special tribunal to judge of the election and qualification of its own members. The counsel, in argument, places the question of contest on too narrow grounds. He would limit it to the case where two persons are claiming the same office by election. Where there are substantial doubts as to whether a candidate elected to office is eligible or not, any citizen interested, as taxpayer or elector, would have the right to raise the objection, and it would then become the duty of the council, as the only tribunal in which the authority is vested, to promptly hear and determine the matter. This gives a quick and speedy hearing, while the office might expire before a determination was reached, if left to the courts. In case of a miscarriage of justice before the council, chapter 110, § 2, provides for a review of the decision of the council by means of certiorari; and in case of reversal, and disobedience on the part of the council, which is not at all probable, a way would be found to compel respect to the orders of superior judicial tribunals.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, the mandamus nisi is quashed, and these proceedings are dismissed, at the costs of the relators.

Holt, J., concurring:

Section 18 of chapter 47 reads: "The municipal authorities of such city, town, or village shall be the mayor, recorder and the councilmen, who shall be freeholders therein and who together shall form a common council." I do not think the freehold qualification unconstitutional. These offices are created, not by the constitution, but by the legislature, in the exercise of its inherent, plenary, legislative power, qualified so as to require a general law for incorporating cities, towns, or villages containing a population of less than 2,000. Section 8, article 4, of the Constitution says that in such cases, among others, the legislature shall prescribe the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed, and removed, and leaves it to the legislature to say from what body of persons they shall be elected or appointed, but with this qualification: That, being municipal officers, the negative provision of section 8 of article 4 of the Constitution applies.—they must, in any event, be citizens of the state, entitled to vote; for, if the constitution is to be taken as prescribing exhaustively the qualifications of such municipal officers created by law, as well as of those officers created by the constitution itself, then section 21 of chapter 47, saying that the mayor, recorder, and councilmen must be residents of such city, etc., is also unconstitutional, and a resident of the city of Pocatalico could be legally elected mayor of the city of Charleston, and a resident of the city of Charleston could be legally elected mayor of the city of Pocatalico. So there are many other equally obvious and indispensable qualifications for various offices which the legislature has created, and may yet create, under its inherent, plenary, legislative power over the subject. See State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 118; Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417, 420; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 96; Rogers v. Buffalo, 128 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579.

I regard the power of the legislature inherent, as well as given by section 8 of article 4, as comprehending the power to create these municipal offices, and prescribe the qualifications of such as are appointed or elected to fill them, and that the statute, in so far as it requires them to be freeholders of the town, should not be declared void on account of an implication that might at first blush seem to arise from the negative provision contained in section 5 of the same article of the Constitution. Plenary power in the legislature is the rule. There can be no restriction, except what the Constitution of the United States or of the state prescribes. Therefore, it is for those who question the validity of the statute to point out where and how it is forbidden, and if this is not made clear and palpable, beyond reasonable doubt, such doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative power, and the act sustained; and this, if no other good reason were apparent, is sufficient. For twenty years, almost (1877), it has been practically interpreted as constitutional by the action of all departments of the government, and it would now create a great confusion and inconvenience to hold it void; and this in the case of special charters as well as in the general law. Great weight is always rightly attached to such long, contemporaneous, practical exposition. See Bridges v. Shallercross, 6 W. Va. 562, and the authorities cited by Judge Haymond.

Brannon, J., dissenting:

Not concurring in the judgment in this case, I file, without revision, to express my views, the following opinion prepared by me, but which did not meet with the approval of the court, as will appear in opinions prepared by Judges Dent and Holt:

John M. Thompson and C. A. Smith were elected on January 5, 1893, at a municipal election for the town of Hurricane, Putnam county, as members of its council; but the council refused to allow them to enter into office, upon the ground that at the date of the election they were not freeholders, and allowed W. L. Losee and W. S. Turley, incumbents in said office, to continue to act therein until their successors should be elected and qualified. Upon a writ of mandamus, the circuit court gave judgment for the claimants, Thompson and Smith. The writ ran to the mayor, recorder, and councilmen, including Losee and Turley, and they, except Mynes and Dunfee, councilmen, bring the case here by writ of error. A number of important questions arise on the record, involving principles of great practical import:

First question: If the claimants were not freeholders, would it disqualify them from being councilmen? The town was incorporated under the general law found in chapter 47 of the Code, and as section 13 requires the mayor, recorder, and councilmen to be freeholders, it is claimed that claimants are disqualified. If this be so, then a resident of this town may be a voter, and qualified to be elected governor of the state, and yet be ineligible to the town council. The claimants are qualified voters. Are they qualified to hold these offices? Is the freehold qualification demanded by the statute unconstitutional? Section 1, article 4, of the Constitution reads, "The male citizens of the state shall be entitled to vote at all elections held within the counties in which they respectively reside," with various exceptions in that section specified. Here is a broad declaration that all male citizens shall be entitled to vote, with specific exceptions. Other exceptions cannot be made by the legislature. Plainly, it was the purpose, by this section in the organic law, to point out, and make clear and certain, in what particular persons among the people of the state the sovereign power of the ballot resides. If we wish to know who is the voter, we look here, and here alone. It vests in the citizen this great right. It cannot be taken from him by legislation. If he falls within the general grant in the opening clause of the section, and not within any of its exceptions, he is a suffragan, over any power that would deny his right, or add another qualification. Cooley, Const. Lim. 758. He is a voter, though as poor as Lazarus. But has he another great privilege,—“right,” I should say; for it is hard to say which is the higher right, in the freeman,—that of voting, or that of being voted for? The constitution has granted the citizen the ballot. Has it forgotten his right to hold public office? It has carefully defined the qualification of voters, in the well drawn section quoted. Has it failed to define the qualification of officers? Having defined the qualifications of voters, it was not to be supposed that it would omit the very important matter of defining who might be officers. It has not omitted to do so. It makes the one right practically the correlative of the other. To the citizen clothed with the right of suffrage is given also the right of holding office. It should be so, and it is so. Section 4 of article 4 provides that “no person except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office; but the governor and judges must have attained the age of thirty, and the attorney-general the age of twenty-five years, at the beginning of their respective terms of service; and must have been citizens of the state for five years next preceding their election or appointment, or be citizens at the time this constitution goes into operation.” This does not in affirmative express terms declare that a voter shall be competent to hold office, as does the first section say that all male citizens shall be voters. It could have been better drawn, for present purposes, by declaring that any one who is a voter should be competent to be elected or appointed to office, but the section means that. We must read sections 1 and 4 together, as if in pari materia, because they deal with two kindred subjects, and they are located close together. Section 1 has just defined the qualifications of voters. Section 4 takes up the subject of qualifications of officers, and in saying that no person but citizens entitled to vote shall be eligible to office, it, by implication,—by strong and plain implication,—means to declare that a citizen entitled to vote shall likewise, because of his quality of voter, be entitled to be elected or appointed to office. In saying that none but voters shall be officers, it means to assert the converse,—that voters shall have right to be officers. It is a negative pregnant. A reading of the two sections will more strongly impress one that such is the meaning of the fourth section than can be conveyed in words of explanation or construction. The negative mode of expression was used in the section, likely, to exclude all persons not voters from office; for, if it had said that all voters should be eligible to office, it might have been contended that persons not voters might be made eligible to office, while under the section as it is, in the negative form, that is prohibited. But surely it did not mean to leave the gate swinging, so as to let any power disable a voter from holding office. When it says that one not a voter shall not hold an office, does it not impliedly say that a voter may hold office? That it meant, not simply to exclude those not voters from office, but at the same time to confer upon voters the right to hold office, is shown by the fact that the section goes on to prescribe certain qualifications for governor, judges, attorney-general, and senators. Why touch the subject of qualification for office at all, if the section had for its aim only to exclude nonvoters? The convention, knowing that, by declaring that none but voters should become officers, it had vested in voters the right to become officers, and desiring to require, as to governor, judges, and senators, certain qualifications in addition to their being voters, made the specific additional requirements as to them. Comparing this section 4, article 8, as found in the Constitution of 1868, with that in the present one, we notice the insertion in the present constitution of the word “but,” not till then found in the section. In the former constitution, it read: “No persons, except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office. Judges must have attained the age of thirty-five years, the governor the age of thirty years,” etc. In the present constitution it reads: “No person, except citizens entitled to vote, shall be elected or appointed to any state, county or municipal office; but the governor and judges must have attained the age of thirty,” etc. The insertion of the word “but” indicates that the convention knew that the first clause expressed a general rule or definition of qualification for office, admitting all voters to the right; and as governor, judges, senators, and attorney-general would fall within it, unless excepted, and desiring to except them, it, for safety, inserted the word, to make it more clear than it had been. In other words, it is an exception, the same as if, after allowing all voters to be chosen to office, it had said, “except that the governor and judges must have attained the age,” etc. Why the necessity of exception, if there is no general rule? Thus, to be a voter is to be also qualified to take office; to be a voter is the correlative of the right to be an officer, except as regards governor, judges, senators, and attorney-general, to the extent, as to them, specified in section 4. Judge Brown so construed a similar section in the Constitution of 1868, in Phares v. State, 8 W. Va. 569, 100 Am. Dec. 777, saying: “The constitution prescribes who are entitled to vote, and it also provides that any person so entitled to vote shall be eligible to office.”

I will propound two questions, which I will assume to think are decisive. Can the legislature enact that the governor, judges, or senators shall be freeholders? No; because the constitution only demands that they be voters, and of certain age, and no other qualifications can be exacted. The naming those shows that no others were intended. Can the legislature enact that the auditor and treasurer shall be freeholders? I answer no, as I do as to governor, because the constitution has only demanded that they be voters. The only difference is that as to governor, judges, and senators, further qualifications are exacted. Will it be contended by any one that the legislature may exclude a voter from the auditorship because he is not an owner of realty? If it cannot, it is only because of this constitutional provision. Section 8 empowers the legislature to "prescribe by general laws, the terms of office, powers, duties and compensation of all public officers and agents, and the manner in which they shall be elected, appointed and removed." It does not give the legislature power to prescribe the qualifications of officers. If the convention had left open that important matter, it would be expected that it would, in the section just quoted, grant to the legislature the necessary function or power of prescribing such qualification; but it did not so, and simply because it had itself done so in section 4. Can we suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to leave open that most important matter,—important as it concerns the rights of individual citizens, and more important as it concerns the vital interests of all the people of the state in the administration of its government;—namely, the qualification for office, leaving it subject to the fluctuation of sentiment, the caprices of constantly changing legislatures, the passions of the hour? The very idea of a written constitution of government tells us that the definition of eligibility to official station should be, and would be, one of the very first subjects dealt with in it. If section 4 does not perform this function, where do we find it? There is no statute defining qualification for office. The legislature has always understood that the constitution did this work; for the Legislature of 1868, passing a general election law under the Constitution of 1868, which contained a like section to section 4 now under discussion, did not define the qualifications for office. Neither did the Legislature of 1872-73, passing a general election law under the present constitution. Neither did the Legislatures of 1882 and 1891, in the general election laws passed in those years. Four general election laws have been passed in twenty-eight years, none defining the qualifications for office. I have not found where the legislature has done so in any act. Thus, we have the contemporaneous construction of the legislative department of government through many years, and a great mass of legislation, to the effect that the constitution prescribed and fixed the qualifications of officers. This has great effect. Cooley, Const. Lim. 81.

Counsel for appellee argues that the fact that section 6 requires officers to take an oath, and closes with the injunction that "no other oath, or declaration or test shall be required as a qualification, unless herein otherwise provided," would forbid the freehold requirement. It would, if we could consider it a "test," within the meaning of this provision; but, from the first thought, I doubted whether it would apply to a property qualification or an educational qualification, though the words "unless herein otherwise provided" might favor, slightly, such contention. My inclination was to regard matters of opinion or bias or political action as here referred to. We know that this prohibition had its birth and suggestion in the existence of test oaths springing from the passions and excitement of the civil war designed to exclude participants therein, on the Confederate side, from holding office. English history tells us of test acts, and they relate to matters of opinion, chiefly religious opinion, like that in 25 Car. II., requiring an oath from officers against transubstantiation, and requiring them to take the sacrament under the English church; and that earlier in the same reign, called the "Corporation Act," requiring officers to renounce the covenant; and also the uniformity act, requiring clergymen to assent to everything in the Book of Common Prayer. So far as advised, from authority here accessible, I think this provision against tests relates to opinion, and not such as a property qualification. See Story, Const. §§ 1847, 1849, and Hume's and Macaulay's Histories of England. I have met with the cases of Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 218, 55 Am. Rep. 675, where it is held, paragraph 6, that a provision in the Michigan constitution just like the one in ours does not apply to those special qualifications required for particular offices. The opinions in that case, and also the opinion on pages 91, 92, in the case of People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 108, will sustain the view I have just expressed as to the meaning of the word "test" as here used. I have also met with Rogers v. Buffalo, 123 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579, holding same view. Therefore, as section 4 confers upon the voter the capacity to take office, with the exceptions therein stated, the legislature does not possess the power to add to those exceptions, any more than it possesses power to disfranchise a citizen from voting by prescribing qualifications or exceptions beyond those stated in section 1.

The legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusions from office, or any general regulations requiring qualifications not required by the constitution, except for crime. Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 78; Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686, 15 Am. Dec. 322; Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123; Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 189; Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 648. Chancellor Sanford, in Barker v. People, supra, used this language: "Eligibility to public trusts is claimed as a constitutional right which cannot be abridged or impaired. The constitution establishes and defines the right of suffrage, and gives to the electors and to various authorities the power to confer public trusts. It declares that ministers of religion shall be ineligible to any office. It prescribes, in respect to certain officers, particular circumstances without which a person is not eligible to those stations [as does ours], and it provides that persons holding certain offices shall hold no other public trust. [So does ours.] Excepting particular exclusions thus established, the electors and the appointing powers are, by the constitution, wholly free to confer public station upon any person, according to their pleasure. The constitution giving the right of election and the right of appointment, these rights consisting essentially in the freedom of choice, and the constitution also declaring that certain persons are not eligible to office, it follows from those powers and provisions that all other persons are eligible. Eligibility to office is not declared as a right or principle by any express terms of the constitution, but it results as a just deduction from the express powers and provisions of the system. The basis of the principle is the absolute liberty of the electors and the appointing authorities to choose and to appoint any person who is not made ineligible by the constitution. Eligibility to office, therefore, belongs not exclusively or especially to electors enjoying the right of suffrage. It belongs to all persons whomsoever, not excluded by the constitution. I therefore conceive it to be entirely clear that the legislature cannot establish arbitrary exclusion from office, or any general regulations requiring qualifications which the constitution has not required. If, for example, it should be enacted by law that all physicians, or all persons of a particular religious sect, should be ineligible to public trusts, or that all persons not possessing a certain amount of property should be excluded, or that a member of the assembly must be a freeholder, any such regulation would be an infringement of the constitution; and it would be so because, should it prevail, it would be, in effect, an alteration of the constitution." Now, observe that Chancellor Sanford goes beyond where I need go; for he says that, without anything in the constitution expressly defining qualifications for officers, the mere fact that certain persons were by the New York constitution excluded, as is the case with us, is sufficient, alone, to vest in others, not excluded, the right to take office, or in the voters the range of choice from all not excluded. There was no such section as our section 4 for the chancellor to rely upon. If his proposition was right, how more can I assert that the position here taken is right, where we have a section 4, excluding only nonvoters, and leaving it to be understood that all that were voters should be allowed to receive office? This common principle of construction is illustrated in Donaldson v. Volz, 19 W. Va. 156, holding that as the constitution, after granting exemption from execution, had specified certain exceptions, the legislature could not add rent. The expression of certain exceptions included others.

We have been under the impression that the property qualification for office had been, many years ago, abolished, by change in constitutional law. It surely has not been restored, and cannot be, but by a change in the constitution. It will not do to say that, while it may not be demanded as to state and county office, it may be as to municipal offices; for section 4 includes them, in terms. Were this not so, I would hold a different opinion. So I hold that the want of freehold qualification does not exclude from holding the position of councilman. It cannot be true that a man may be elected governor, and yet cannot be elected a town councilman, merely because, though a voter, he is not a freeholder. This would impress one as an absurdity and injustice. Ought the local taxing power to be vested only in the property owner? Members of the legislature, vested with greater taxing powers, need not be freeholders. The only cases cited in support of the contention that the freehold qualification is not unconstitutional are State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102, and Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417. In the former it is held that the provision in the Ohio constitution that "no person shall be elected or appointed to any office unless he possesses the qualifications of an elector" does not forbid, by implication, the legislature to require other reasonable qualifications for office. The reasoning on the point is short and unsatisfactory. The judge says the power of the legislature should not be denied by mere implication, unless clear. He thought it was not clear. I think it very clear. But I add that it does not appear that the clause in the Ohio constitution containing the negative words had, as ours has, the feature of prescribing qualifications as to governor, judges, and senators, nor the section giving the legislature power only to prescribe terms, compensation, and manner of choice of officers, but failing to give it power to fix qualifications. The Colorado constitution is the same, in effect, as that of Ohio. The remarks just made apply to the Colorado case; and I note the fact, specially, that in neither the Ohio nor the Colorado constitutions did the clause include municipal offices, as ours does. The Colorado court says that the clause in the Colorado constitution had no relation to municipal officers. The decisions are of less authority because of that fact. If one additional material qualification may be prescribed, why not another? Why not many others? The constitution is fundamental law, and strictly construed in defense of the citizen's rights. It is the Magna Charta of his freedom and rights, political and civil. Admit once that it does not fix his qualification for office. Where would his disfranchisement end? That would depend upon uncertain political, religious, or other winds. Would we limit the act within the bounds of the reasonable? That would be indefinite, unsafe, precarious,—dependent upon the times and motives and aims dominating them. Against these things, it was intended to imbed the right in the solid rock of the constitution. If we say it might have been imbedded in plainer language, yet we must look at the policy,—the evil against which it was intended to provide. I do not say that no provision or qualification whatever that is reasonable—essential to fit the party for the duty—may not be prescribed. I lay down a general rule. But I say this freehold test is not reasonable or necessary to make a man a competent or suitable officer. The Virginia court, passing on the constitutional clause giving all voters the right to hold office, held void an act requiring members of electoral boards to be freeholders. It admitted that there might be cases where, by implication, an additional qualification might be imposed, when it was essential to the discharge of the duties of the place, but the qualification of freehold could not be justified on this theory. Black v. Trower, 79 Va. 123.

Another question: Were Thompson and Smith freeholders when elected? Smith held land under a purchase evidenced by a title bond providing for a conveyance on payment of purchase money, and was in possession, but had not paid for the land. He thus had an equitable estate in fee simple. A freehold may be in an equitable estate as well as legal estate, as authorities below cited show. There is nothing, then, to prevent his being a freeholder, but nonpayment of purchase money. Shall a man owning land, in possession, who happens to owe yet a little purchase money, be deemed not a freeholder? The only reason is that he is not entitled to call for a conveyance of the legal estate. But he has a vested interest or property in the land, recognized by law. In the eye of equity, he is the owner of the land, holding in trust for his vendor only for purchase money, while the vendor holds the legal estate in trust for him, and is entitled only to the money. A court of law would recognize his right by giving him an action of trespass. If the law were that, to be a freeholder, he must have legal title, it would be different, but Virginia cases of binding authority repel that idea. It is ancient law that the cestui que use is a freeholder, so as to be a good juror. Co. Litt. 272b; 4 Bacon, Abr. 556, title Jurries. But as to such cases I think the statute of uses would execute the use to the possession, and give good legal title. Helmondollar's Case, 4 Gratt. 536, held that one having the equitable interest in land, entitled to call for the legal title, is a freeholders; and it is stated that, among many Virginia cases, no one denies that a cestui quo trust of a freehold estate is a good grand juror, who is required to be a freeholder. In Cunningham's Case, 6 Gratt. 695, a purchaser, by oral contract, in possession, who had paid for the land, was held to be a freeholder. In Carter's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 319, it was held that a grantor, who had passed away the legal title by deed of trust, and had merely the equity of redemption, was a freeholder. In Moore's Case, 9 Leigh, 639, the owner conveyed the land to a trustee to secure a debt, and then such owner conveyed to another person his equity of redemption, and put him in possession, and this person was held to be a freeholder. So the legal title in the person is clearly not necessary to constitute him a freeholder. And upon the strength of Burcher's Case, 2 Rob. (Va.) 826, I conclude that the fact that Smith owed yet some purchase money does not prevent his being a freeholder. It decided that a person was a freeholder who was in possession under a purchase; the deed to him not being delivered to him but in the hands of another, as an escrow, to be delivered on payment of purchase money, which remained partially unpaid. The opinion said, as I now say: "It seems sufficient if the juror is in possession of a freehold estate, and enjoying the profits and substantial ownership thereof;" that he was in lawful possession, and a court of equity would regard the land as the purchaser's property, and, if he failed to pay, would not turn him out, but give him a day to pay, and then sell the land as his, and pay him any surplus of its proceeds after payment of the debt. If that was so at the date of that decision, when the court of law did not recognize the equitable title, or its owner as having any title, but would turn the purchaser out, by ejectment, at the suit of the vendor, how much more should we hold it to be law now, when section 20, chapter 90, of the Code compels the court of law to view the purchaser's right as a substantial right, by declaring that a vendor shall not, at law, recover against the vendee land sold by the vendor to such vendee, when there is a writing stating the purchase and its terms? The heading in Reynold's Case, 4 Leigh, 663, says that it seems that one who has contracted, by article under seal, to sell his land, but has not conveyed it, and still holds the legal title, is a freeholder,—that is, the vendor; and therefore it may be said that if the vendor is a freeholder the vendee cannot be a freeholder in the self-same land. But that statement is not binding, because the court says it did not decide it, as that question was not adjourned to it; and, secondly, it is true, as said by Judge Gholson in Burcher's Case, supra, that the vendor only agreed to sell on certain conditions precedent to be complied with by the vendee, and the record did not show that they had been performed, or a dollar paid, or that any title had been made, or even that possession had passed to the vendee. I hold that the want of legal title or failure to pay purchase money does not settle that the party is not a freeholder. Is he in possession of land, claiming freehold estate, by right, legal or equitable, recognized by law, whether the purchase money had been paid or not? If yes, then he is a freeholder. Therefore, Smith was a freeholder.

Another question: Was Thompson a freeholder when elected? His wife owned an estate in fee in land. We do not know by record when she acquired it, so as to say whether it was separate estate, nor whether there was issue by the marriage. But in no conceivable view upon the record, as it is, was Thompson a freeholder when elected. If we could see that the wife acquired the land, and the marriage took place before the Married Woman's Separate Estate Act, April 1, 1869, we could say that he was a freeholder, because, by marriage simply, he was entitled to possession and rents and profits during the joint lives of himself and wife. Pickens v. Kniseley, 36 W. Va. 794, 800. It would be a freehold, as it would continue during their joint lives, at least. 2 Kent, Com. 130; Dejarnatte v. Allen, 5 Gratt. 499, 513; Schouler, Husb. & W. §§ 187, 181; Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 89, 201. Thompson would also be a freeholder, by reason of being invested with an estate by the curtesy initiate, though it does not appear that there was issue of the marriage, as such an estate is freehold, since it exists for the life of husband. It is true that at common law there must be issue, to create an estate by curtesy initiate. 2 Bl. Com. 126; 2 Minor, Inst. 108. And under our Statute, Code, chap. 65, § 15, as it stood up to the Act of March 20, 1882, notwithstanding it broadly declared that "if a married woman die seized of an estate of inheritance in lands, her husband shall be tenant by the curtesy in the same," yet Winkler v. Winkler, 18 W. Va. 455, construed it as not dispensing with any of the four common-law requisites of curtesy. But chapter 86, Acts 1882, amended said Code, section 15, by utterly dispensing with issue as an element in curtesy; and I think it would operate to vest in the husband an estate by curtesy initiate, as here is an estate of inheritance, not separate estate, vested in the wife during coverture. But we cannot say that the land vested in the wife, and the marriage took place, before April 1, 1869. If on the other hand, we suppose that the wife acquired this land after April 1, 1869, it being thus separate estate, under section 2, chap. 66 Code 1891 (Code 1887, chap. 65 § 8), the wife yet living, the husband could not be tenant by the curtesy initiate. It has been seriously questioned whether a husband could, by force of common law, take an estate by curtesy in the separate real estate of his wife; but the better opinion is—and the law here, as settled in Winkler v. Winkler, supra, is—that he can. That question—that is, whether the common law would, alone, give him such estate—is, however, unimportant practically, because the statute would certainly give it. Code chap. 65, § 15; opinion in case just cited (page 468). But there is this distinction between an estate by curtesy in lands of the wife, not separate estate, and lands that are her separate estate, namely, that in lands not her separate estate there is curtesy initiate, whereas, in lands that are separate estate, there cannot be curtesy initiate, but only curtesy consummate. In other words, until the death of the wife, no estate whatever in her lands vests in the husband. He has, while she lives, only a chance or possibility of becoming clothed with an estate upon the event of the death of the wife before his death. This is because the separate estate statute declares that the wife shall hold her separate estate, and its issues, rents, and profits, to her sole and separate use as if she were single, free from the control or disposal of her husband. This statute is, in letter, spirit, and purpose, plainly inconsistent with the existence of any substantial estate of the husband in her land while she lives. See Breeding v. Davis, 77 Va. 639, 46 Am. Rep. 740; Alexander v. Alexander, 85 Va. 354, 1 L. R. A. 125; Wells, Married Women, 106; Hill v. Chambers, 30 Mich. 422; Porch v. Fries, 18 N. J. Eq. 204; Thurber v. Townsend, 22 N. Y. 517; Beach v. Miller, 51 Ill. 206, 2 Am. Rep. 290; Cole v. Van Riper, 44 Ill. 58; Stewart v. Ross, 50 Miss. 776; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 987; Billings v. Baker, 28 Barb. 343. Therefore, Thompson was not a freeholder, when elected.

Another question: But both Smith and Thompson, after election, and before their term of office began, acquired land, and became freeholders. This raises the question whether, though they were not freeholders when elected, it is enough that they were when their terms began. Much difference of opinion has existed in the courts upon this question. Where the constitution or statute declares that only certain persons shall be elected or be eligible to office, it may be plausibly contended that it refers to the date of the election, and that one not so qualified cannot be elected to, and cannot hold, the office, though he become so qualified before his term begins. But, even in such case, highly respectable authorities hold that it is sufficient if he be so qualified at the commencement of the term. Some authorities for the former view are Searcy v. Grov, 15 Cal. 117; State v. McMillen, 23 Neb. 885; Taylor v. Sullivan, 45 Minn. 309, 11 L. R. A. 272; State v. Clarke, 3 Nev. 566; State v. Williams, 99 Mo. 291. Some authorities for the latter view are Smith v. Moore, 80 Ind. 294; Brown v. Goben, 122 Ind. 113; State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 9 Am. Rep. 489; State v. Trumpf, 50 Wis. 103. The latter view derives additional force by the fact that the votes cast for the ineligible candidate are not necessarily void. If they were, there would be more reason to say that he could not even be voted for; but they are so far votes, so far effectual, that if the ineligibility be not known to the voters, or be not such as they are bound to know, the minority candidate, is not elected, and cannot claim the office. Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89. But we are not called upon to say which of those views is correct, because in this case the statute cited to disable these claimants from holding their offices does not say that only freeholders shall be chosen or elected or be eligible, but says, "The municipal authorities of such city, town or village shall be a mayor, recorder and councilmen, who shall be freeholders therein." This simply says that to be such officers they must be freeholders. It only means that the powers and functions of these offices shall be wielded only by freeholders. Why defeat the popular will, this being the language, by mere construction, simply because, when elected, the persons elected were not freeholders, when at the time they actually act in office they are? The letter of the act does not require it, neither does its spirit, since its object is only to keep nonfreeholders from acting in office. It was meant, not as a prohibition against their election, but against their holding office. Authority will sustain this position. In Privett v. Bickford, 26 Kan. 52, 40 Am. Rep. 301. the constitution provided that no person who had borne arms against the United States should be "qualified to vote or hold office" unless his disability should be removed, and it was held that though disqualified when elected, if the person's disabilities be removed before taking office, it was sufficient. In State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96, 9 Am. Rep. 489, it was held that an alien at date of election, but naturalized at beginning of term, could hold. In De Turk v. Com., 129 Pa. 159, 5 L. R. A. 853, the constitution provided that no one holding office under the United States should "hold or exercise any office in this state." A postmaster, when chosen county commissioner, resigned as postmaster, even after quo warranto begun to oust him as commissioner, and it was held he was competent to hold. In Com. v. Pyle, 18 Pa. 519, it was held that, "where one would be ineligible to office on account of disqualification, he must get rid of the disqualification before he is appointed or elected; but, where the prohibition extends only to the enjoyment or exercise of an office, it is sufficient that the person be qualified before he is sworn." The United States Constitution says: "No one shall be a representative" who is not of a certain age, or has engaged in rebellion; but John Young Brown, under age at date of election, and others under disability when elected, but becoming of age, and whose disabilities had been removed, have been admitted to the house of representatives and senate. McCrary, Elections, § 258. Therefore, I conclude it is sufficient that the plaintiffs were freeholders at the commencement of their terms.

Another question: Can both Smith and Thompson unite in one writ of mandamus? The rule is that, where the interests of several relators are separate and independent, they cannot join in one writ of mandamus, any more than in another form of action. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 439; 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 219. But this is a peculiar case, as to this point; and, if any case would justify a joinder of two interests, this would. The offices may be deemed separate it is true; but they are claims to seats in a body composed of numerous members, elected simply to that body, not to any particular places or seats therein, not by separate wards, but for the whole town, by all its voters, at one election. Their places are held by Losee and Turley. Which one of these parties holds Thompson's place? Neither one more than the other. Suppose Thompson to sue alone, simply for the admission to the board of councilmen. If he were admitted, whom would he oust?—Losee or Turley? Would the council say which one? If it did, it would simply do so arbitrarily, or by lot, for it would have no rule to go by. Perhaps Thompson might ask Losee's place alone, and have order for his motion. But what if Smith also, asks the place of Losee? and perhaps, if he sued for Losee's place, Losee might say that he did not withhold his place, any more than did Turley. Would not, if we assert that both should sue separately, either be entitled simply to ask admission generally, without asking the place of either Losee or Turley? If so, is it not better to tolerate a joint application for both Losee's and Turley's seats? Precedents are found fully justifying this joint writ. Two persons joined in one writ to be sworn in as church wardens. Reg. v. Guise, 2 Ld. Raym. 1008; Reg. v. Twitty, 2 Salk. 433; King v. Middlesex, 3 Ad. & El. 615; Reg. v. Heathcote, 10 Mod. 48. In Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh, 689, seven persons held as slaves claiming manumission under one and the same deed, joined in one mandamus to compel its recordation, and no objection was thought of, for misjoinder. True, they all claimed under one deed, but each one's freedom was a separate right annexed to his person only. These parties claimed under one election, which is one element for consideration. Nineteen persons appointed as a board of visitors to a college sued out without objection, a joint writ against that number, constituting the old board, to try title. Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415. In a case reported in 43 La. Ann. 92 (State v. Shakespeare), several councilmen of New Orleans, turned out of the board, took one mandamus to obtain restoration, and it was held that they could so sue. The opinion in Haskins v. Scott County Suprs., 51 Miss. 410, using language probably of Merrill (Mandamus, § 282), states the principle that "relators must have a right common to all of them; must have a joint benefit in the performance of the act or duty required of respondent, and be joint sufferers because of the nondoing. Otherwise, they cannot unite in this suit." Does not the plaintiffs' case come within that statement of the principle? Though I have had some question on this point, I conclude that there is no error in the use of the writ jointly by Smith and Thompson.

Another question: It is contended that mandamus does not lie, but that certiorari is the proper remedy. The council canvassed the election returns, and declared by its order that Smith and Thompson received the highest number of votes. There was no complaint or error in its action touching the election to call for certiorari, but, after declaring them elected, the council refused to admit them. This called for mandamus, not certiorari. That mandamus has been long used in the Virginias as a proper process to try title to office, and compel admission of him who has title to it, is well settled. In the great, I may say historic, case of Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 662, "where every inch of ground of the slightest value was hotly contested, wherein Bridges sought to enforce his title and admission to the office of superintendent of the penitentiary the efficacy of the writ was not even questioned, and Judge Haymond said that if it had been the objection could not have been maintained. I shall not discuss the matter, being satisfied that that case, and others I cite, will sustain the remedy by mandamus. Cross v. West Virginia, Cent. & P. R. Co. 84 W. Va. 742, 85 W. Va. 174; Booker v. Young, 12 Gratt. 303; Dew v. Sweet Spring Dist. Ct. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 8 Am. Dec. 639; Hutch. Treatise W. Va. § 1278; Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415. I would affirm the judgment.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Henry GEE, Resp.

(....Or.....)

A statute authorizing gravel to be taken from private lands for necessary repairs on highways is not unconstitutional because notice is not required to be given to the owner, or any participation allowed him in the selection or formation of the tribunal to assess his damages, where he is given an opportunity to present a claim for compensation to the county court by written complaint and have his damages assessed and paid, with opportunity to be heard on that question.

(April 17, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Yamhill County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful entry by defendant upon plaintiff's property and digging and taking away gravel therefrom. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. J. Spencer for appellant.Messrs. Irvine & Coshov, for respondent:

In Kendall v. Post, 8 Or. 181, the validity of this particular portion of the sections under consideration in this case was directly attacked, and this court at that time without division, concurred with the circuit court and held said section to be valid and operative. The 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States cannot invalidate a statute that was a valid "law of the land" prior to its ratification. "A constitution should operate prospectively only, unless the words employed show a clear intention that it should have a retrospective effect."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 77, and cases there cited.

The statute under consideration, as it now stands, had been the law for fourteen years before the ratification of the 14th Amendment, and the statute was but declaratory of the common law.

Stat. 5 Eliz. chap. 13; Denniston v. Clark, 125 Mass. 223, citing Comyns, Dig. Ohinin, chap. 4; Stat. 14 Car. II, chap. 6; 7 Geo. III, chap. 42; 13 Geo. III, chap. 78; Jones v. Anderson, 6 Pick. 59; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray, 409.

Similar statutes to the one under consideration have been the law of the land, both in England and the United States almost from that period "to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 17 U. S. 4

Wheat. 235, 244, 4 L. ed. 559, 161; State v. Simons, 2 Speers, L. 761; State v. Doherty, 60 Me. 509.

Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as these maxims prescribe for the class of cases, to which the one in question belongs.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 434, and cases cited in note 4.

That the statute in question contemplates proceedings authorized under the law of eminent domain, there seems to be no question.

People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 598; Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Iowa, 544.

That portion of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution was never intended to restrict the laws of eminent domain. There is no restraint upon that power except requiring compensation to be made.

People v. Smith, supra; Garrison v. New York, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 196, 23 L. ed. 612.

When the property is taken directly by the state or any municipal corporation by state authority, it has been repeatedly held not to be essential to the validity of a law, for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, that it should make or tender compensation before the actual appropriation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 692, and cases cited; Loweree v. Newark, 38 N. J. L. 154; Garrison v. New York and People v. Smith, supra, McCrary v. Griswold, 7 Iowa, 251; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616.

"Due process" not does mean necessarily by a judicial proceeding.

Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88; McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 87, 24 L. ed. 355; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658; Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. 18 Wend. 181, 31 Am. Dec. 313; Mills v. St. Clair County, 7 Ill. 238.

If compensation is secured before the property is taken, it is sufficient. It need not be actually paid to the owner.

Lord, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant's entering upon the plaintiff's lands described in the complaint, digging and taking gravel therefrom, and leaving the fences open, so that cattle entered upon and destroyed his pasture. The defendant, after denying the allegations of the complaint, set up as a separate defense thereto that Yamhill county was and is a duly organized county of the state of Oregon; that during all of the time mentioned in the complaint the defendant was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting supervisor of the road district in which plaintiff's lands are situated, and that two legally established county roads ran over and upon said lands; that the laying down of the fences as alleged was for the purpose of obtaining access to a bed of gravel situated on such lands; that the gravel therein was necessary to repair said county roads, and that such entry was for the purpose of securing it to be used thereon; that the gravel alleged to have been dug and hauled away was so used; that the laying down of the fences, and the digging and carrying away the said gravel, was done in a prudent and careful manner, without unnecessary damage; and that Yamhill county is liable for such damage as the plaintiff may have sustained thereby, and not the defendant. To defendant's separate defense the plaintiff demurred, alleging that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The demurrer being overruled by the court, the plaintiff refused to plead further, whereupon the court rendered a judgment dismissing the action, and awarding the defendant costs and disbursements, from which judgment the plaintiff has brought this appeal.

Our statute makes it the duty of supervisors to keep the roads in their districts open and in good repair, and to enable them to do so they are authorized by section 4092, Hill's Code, "to enter upon any lands adjoining or near the public road and gather, dig, and carry away any stone, gravel or sand . . . necessary for the making and repair of any public road in their district;" and section 4093 provides that, "if any person shall feel aggrieved by the act of any supervisor cutting or carrying away timber or stone as aforesaid he may make complaint thereof in writing to the county court at any regular meeting within six months after the cause of such complaint shall exist, and such court shall proceed to assess and determine the damages, if any, sustained by the complainant, and cause the same to be paid out of the county treasury." The plaintiff contends that these provisions of the road law are unconstitutional and void, because (1) they do not provide for giving notice to the owner whose property is taken, nor (2) for his participation in the selection or formation of the tribunal upon which is devolved the duty of assessing his damages. Lands for highways, as well as timber, stone, and gravel with which to make, improve, or repair them, are taken by right of eminent domain. Cooley, Const. Lim. 657. By the constitution of this state it is provided that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and, except in case of the state, without such compensation first assessed and tendered. Const. Or. art. 1, § 18. Under this provision the private property of the citizen cannot be taken against his will for any purpose other than a public use, nor, except in case of the state, without just compensation first assessed and tendered. With the state it is not a condition precedent that the compensation should precede or be concurrent with the taking of private property for public use. It may appropriate such property without compensation being first assessed and tendered, but it must make provision by which the party whose property has been seized can obtain just compensation for it. Nor is this all. When the public exigencies demand the taking of private property for public use, it must be done by due process of law. The constitution of the United States provides that the "state shall not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Article 14, § 1, amendments. "Due process of law," Earle, J., said, "is not confined to judicial proceedings, but extends to every case which may deprive a citizen of life, liberty, or property, whether the proceeding be judicial, administrative, or executive in its nature," and that, generally stated, it meant "an orderly proceeding, adapted to the nature of the case in which the citizen has an opportunity to be heard, and to defend, enforce, and protect his rights." Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 191, 30 Am. Rep. 289. Consistent with these principles, the property of a citizen cannot be taken by the power of eminent domain without some notice to the owner, or some opportunity being afforded him, at some stage of the proceeding, to be heard as to the compensation to be awarded him. When the public appropriates property to improve or repair a public highway, the owner is entitled to a hearing or to be heard as to the compensation which he is to receive. Upon the question of compensation Mr. Lewis says: "All the authorities agree that the owner is entitled to be heard as a matter of right, and consequently that he is entitled to such notice as will give him an opportunity to be heard." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 366. While, therefore, the state, when taking private property for a public use, or a county by its authority, is not bound to make or tender compensation before its actual appropriation, yet, as the citizen cannot be arbitrarily deprived of his property, it must make provision by law whereby the owner can have a hearing or be heard before an impartial tribunal as to the just compensation to be awarded him. By section 4093, supra, the state has afforded an opportunity to any person aggrieved by the act of any supervisor in entering upon his land and carrying away gravel, etc., pursuant to the provisions of section 4092, to be heard, and his grievance considered, by the county court, which is clothed with ample power to determine and assess his damages and cause the same to be paid by the county upon complaint in writing of the person so aggrieved. This provision undeniably affords an opportunity for the party aggrieved, whose property has been taken by the supervisor, to propound his claim for compensation; and the fact that this duty devolves upon him as a preliminary step is no objection to its validity or constitutionality. It not only affords a remedy to which the party aggrieved can resort to have his compensation determined and assessed, but also provides adequate means for its satisfaction or payment out of the county treasury without risk of loss. Hence it clearly appears that he has an opportunity to be heard as to the just compensation which is to be awarded to him, and that he is not deprived of his property without due process of law.

But it is claimed that the owner of property taken for public use is entitled to participate in the selection of the tribunal to assess his damages, as otherwise he might be denied a fair and impartial trial, and thus deprived of the just compensation guaranteed him by the constitution. It is no doubt true that the compensation must be determined by an impartial tribunal, but as Mr. Elliott says, "the character of the tribunal, and the manner in which its members shall be selected, is a matter to be determined by the legislature, except where the constitution directs how the tribunal shall be selected, and what its character shall be." Elliott, Roads & Streets, 214-217. As to how the tribunal to assess the damages shall be formed, it is not necessary that the owner of the property to be affected shall be consulted. A court or judge, with or without a jury, is an impartial tribunal. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 818. In the case at bar the county court—composed of the judge and county commissioners—is the tribunal authorized by law to determine and assess the damages, and, when engaged in the transaction of such business, exercises judicial functions, and must be regarded as an impartial tribunal. In Kendall v. Post, 8 Or. 144, it was held that a party aggrieved by the acts of a supervisor, who had taken stone from his land to repair the highway, must resort for redress to the county court while transacting county business, to determine and assess his damages, and that the statute was not unconstitutional because it authorized such court to assess the damages without a trial by jury. As the state, by the right of eminent domain, may take gravel or other suitable material for repairing public highways from adjoining lands, and has provided an impartial tribunal for ascertaining and paying the damages suffered thereby, it results that the party affected must apply for redress to such tribunal, and that the objections urged against the validity of the acts are not tenable.

LUMBERMAN'S MINING CO., Plff. in Err.

(63 Mich. 491.)

1. A contract to mine ore in a certain pit at a certain price per ton "as long as we can make it pay" is too indefinite to entitle the contracting parties to an allowance for prospective profits in case their work is stopped by the other party to the contract.
2. The words "as long as we can make it pay" have no special signification in a contract to mine ore.

(November 18, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Menominee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach by defendant of a contract to pay plaintiffs for certain work done in the operation of a mine. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ball & Hanscom and B. J. Brown, for plaintiff in error:

NOTE.—For indefiniteness as affecting validity of contracts, see also Wells v. Alexandre (N. Y.) 15 L. R. A. 218 (with note on validity of contract for purchase of indefinite quantity); Barrow S. S. Co. v. Mexican Cent. R. Co. (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 359; Schwanebeck v. Smith (Md.) ante, 168, 24 L. R. A.

The contract was one continuing only during the pleasure of the plaintiffs. It was equivalent to an agreement to work so long as the plaintiffs should make enough to satisfy them. Contracts to be valid must be mutually binding.

Wilkinson v. Heavenrich, 58 Mich. 574, 55 Am. Rep. 708.

The contract was too indefinite and uncertain to be capable of enforcement against plaintiffs, and was therefore void for want of mutuality.

A contract to employ a teacher for a certain time, and to pay "good wages," is too indefinite to be valid.

Fairplay School Twp. v. O'Neal, 127 Ind. 95.

A contract to pay one of two notes given for corn, if the corn market should advance sufficiently to justify it, is void for uncertainty.

Thompson v. Hortner, 78 Md. 474.

The requirement of "good cause" to justify the revocation of an agreement is too vague to constitute a binding contract.

Cummer v. Butts, 40 Mich. 322, 29 Am. Rep. 580.

Words used in a written contract are to be understood in their plain, ordinary and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words; or unless the contract evidently points out that, in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties, it should be understood in some other and particular sense.

2 Greenl. Ev. § 278.

The profits which the plaintiff were allowed to recover were too uncertain, contingent, and speculative to found a verdict upon.

McKinnon v. McEwan, 48 Mich. 108, 43 Am. Rep. 458; Allis v. McLean, 48 Mich. 432; Talcott v. Crippen, 52 Mich. 386. See Petrie v. Lane, 67 Mich. 454.

If the words "make it pay" were shown to have any special significance, other than the usual meaning, that fact would not affect the contract if the mining captain knew of no such usage and did not contract with reference to it.

See 2 Parsons, Cont. 7th ed. 678-675.

Mr. F. O. Clark, with Mr. R. C. Flannigan, for defendants in error:

Durand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 7, 1889, the plaintiffs, who were practical miners, entered into a verbal agreement with the defendant company, through its mining captain, to go to work in what is called the "Cave Pit," and were to receive $1.50 per ton for all the ore they produced, as long as they could make it pay. The plaintiffs practically agree that the mining captain, with whom the contract was made said to them that he would give $1.50 a ton for all the ore they could produce anywhere in the pit, to which they responded, "All right; we will take the contract, and work it as long as we can make it pay." The plaintiffs were to put in skip roads for hoisting the ore, and were to put it in position for hoisting, and the defendant was to furnish the hoisting machinery and do the hoisting. Acting under this contract, the plaintiffs went to work in the pit. They leveled off a place and put down some plank platforms to pile ore upon, and sorted out some ore from the loose rock, and took some ore also out of a seam in the foot wall of the pit, and placed it on these platforms. On the morning of the third day after they began to work, the captain of the defendant company went down, and found the plaintiffs digging into the foot wall of the pit, upon which he ordered them to quit mining at that point. A controversy then arose between him and the plaintiffs in reference to where they had a right to dig, and as to the extent of their right, which ended by the plaintiffs quitting the work. The plaintiffs contended that they had a right to mine at any point they chose, and that they had a right to dig into and through the foot wall, and that they had a right, under their contract, to mine all ore which might be newly discovered by them after digging through the walls of the pit, and that they were not confined to such ore as they might find within the pit, as it had already been opened and worked. The defendant contends that, even if the contract is a valid one, it merely had reference to such ore as might be found within the pit, as it had been opened and worked, and that it gave them no right to dig or break through the walls of the pit, and mine ore found outside of the walls; that it was essentially what is known among miners as a "scramming contract," which is one that confers the right to mine and gather such ore as may be left within the limits of a mine or pit as it has been opened and mined before, that nothing beyond that was ever thought of, and that the act of the plaintiffs in breaking through the walls of the pit, and mining in a newly discovered vein of ore, was never contemplated by the parties; and that it would greatly endanger the property of the defendant, as well as the lives of the miners, by rendering it likely to cave, as had happened before, and for which reason it is alleged this pit was named "Cave Pit;" and the defendant insists that the plaintiffs were stopped from digging in the foot walls for the reasons stated, while the plaintiffs contend that the real reason was that the defendant thought that they would make too much money if allowed to mine in the rich vein of newly-discovered ore beyond the foot wall. The plaintiffs also contend that the term employed in the contract, "as long as we can make it pay," has a special signification among miners, and means as long they could make "company account" wages, being such wages as the company was then paying by the day for such work; and they introduced some testimony, against the defendant's objection, tending to prove this to be so, while the defendant denies that this is so, and contends that the term has no special signification. The plaintiffs also contend that they had discovered a body of ore which amounted to at least 17,000 tons, and that if they had been allowed to mine it,—as they claimed they had a right to do under the contract referred to,—they would have realized a profit of $22,000; while the defendant contends that this is not true, and that the dangers and contingencies were so great that no estimate of profits could be made which would be at all reliable, or upon which the jury could intelligently act in attempting to decide upon what the damages should be. The questions of fact were all fairly submitted to the jury, who found a verdict of $1,000 for the plaintiffs, and a judgment for that amount was thereupon rendered in their favor. The defendant claims error.

The questions we are called upon to consider all relate to and depend upon the two main propositions in the case, which are whether or not the contract is of such a character as to entitle the plaintiffs to damages for its breach, and, if it is, then whether or not the profits which the plaintiffs claim they would have made if they had been allowed to proceed to mine the ore, as long as they could make it pay, are not so speculative, uncertain, and contingent as to make it improper to permit the jury to pass upon them in deciding upon the damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled. We have sought in vain for a valid reason to sustain the plaintiffs in their contention in this case, but we cannot do so. We do not think the contract is of such a character as to be enforceable as an executory contract. The agreement was simply that the plaintiffs would work at mining the ore in "Cave Pit" for $1.50 per ton as long as they could make it pay. No limitations were put upon their methods, or how or in what manner they should conduct the work in order to make it pay, nor does it give the defendant any voice in deciding upon whether or not the plaintiffs could make it pay, nor does it place the subject of the contract upon any certain basis upon which a jury can lawfully and justly arrive at a fair rule of damages in case of its violation. Under this contract, the plaintiffs must be presumed to be the sole judges of whether or not it would pay them to do the work, and of how long they should continue it. Neither do we think that the clause, "as long as they could make it pay," has any special signification in this case. It is not in any sense ambiguous, and can have no different meaning when applied to mining than it has in any mechanical or agricultural employment. It is a term used daily in all the different enterprises and occupations in which men are engaged, and its scope is so well understood that no evidence is necessary to show what it is, or that it means anything different in one case than in another. When a party agrees to sell articles of merchandise, or deliver the productions of his labor to another at a certain price as long as he can make it pay, every one must clearly understand that the term is dependent on conditions over which the promisee has no control, and in so far as any one has the power to make the term effective, it is lodged solely in the promisor, who by judicious purchases or skillful manipulations of labor may be able to make a transaction pay when a more careless, negligent, or improvident person would be unable to do so. This serious element of uncertainty destroys all mutuality in the contract, and gives the promisor full power to say when a further execution of the contract will not be advantageous, because he cannot make it pay. Contracts cannot arise where there is no mutuality, nor can they arise from the action of one party alone where the other has no power to prevent his action. The uncertainty of the term, "as long as we can make it pay," employed in this contract, is illustrated in the case of Oummer v. Butts, 40 Mich. 323, 29 Am. Rep. 580. In that case the contract stipulated that on sixty days' notice it might be canceled by either party for "good cause." One of the parties terminated the contract whereupon the other party, who insisted that no "good cause" for his dismissal existed, brought suit to recover for the profits he would have made if the arrangement had not been interrupted. Mr. Justice Graves, in an opinion concurred in by the entire court, says: "The difficulty is inherent. It exists in the terms adopted by the parties. The requirement of 'good cause,' as something on which the right to revoke by one or the other should depend, is, as here introduced, too vague to be fairly intelligible. The phrase in such connection, as to parties and subject-matter, has no such distinct sense as to furnish a common and intelligible criterion for the parties, or any determinate sense whatever. It is impossible to say that the wills of the parties concurred, and that each meant exactly what the other did, or even to say what either meant. The case is one where the parties have failed to express themselves in terms capable of being reduced to lawfull certainty by judicial effort." The same general rule is laid down in cases cited in Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 844, 845, and notes; Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 81 Mich. 43, 18 Am. Rep. 142; Cannell v. Gibbs, 83 Mich. 381; Wilkinson v. Heavenrich, 58 Mich. 574, 55 Am. Rep. 708.

Under this view of the law, we must hold that the plaintiffs cannot recover under this contract for any prospective profits which they might have made if they had been allowed to complete it, and the jury should have been so instructed. As this disposes of the case in favor of the defendant, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of damages, or any other question raised by the record.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, with costs of this court, and a new trial granted.

The other Justices concurred.

The rate of interest on a county warrant, which is by statute to draw "legal interest" after presentation to the treasurer and indorsement to show that it is not paid for want of funds, cannot be reduced by a statute reducing the rate of interest, as the rate which first begins to run upon it is a part of the contract obligation.

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Thurston County denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendant, as treasurer of Thurston County, to pay county warrants, with a certain rate of interest upon them. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. A. E. Buell and Crowley, Sullivan & Grosscup, for appellant:

The legal rate of interest at the time of the issuance of these warrants was ten per cent per annum.

1 Hill, Code, §§ 2785-2796.

Without any statutory provision, these warrants by custom would draw interest at the legal rate.

NOTE.—The ground of the above decision clearly is that a county warrant, presented and indorsed for want of funds becomes under the Washington statute a contract for interest at the existing legal rate, and that such contract does not become mature until notice of readiness to pay. In this respect it is to be distinguished from a judgment as to which see note to the case of Rockwell v. Butler (Colo.), 17 L. R. A. beginning on p. 612.

Byrmour v. Spokane, 6 Wash. 362.

The act fixing the legal rate of interest, which went into effect June 7, 1893, can have no effect whatever upon contracts and obligations created and existing before the passage of such act, and the contracts or obligations which bore interest will continue to bear interest at the rate fixed by the law at the time of their creation.

If it be true the legislature attempted to change the rate of interest upon contracts made prior to the passage of this act, their effort must necessarily result, if carried into effect, in the impairment of all contracts providing for interest.

In no case will it be found where the right to interest was an integral part of the contract, part of the contract, either by agreement of parties or operation of law, that the courts have permitted this right to be impaired.

If a private person contracts to pay "interest" the rate he must pay is determined by what the legal rate was at the date of his contract.

Bell v. Bell, 25 S. C. 152.

Stiles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, being possessed of warrants issued by Thurston county in 1891-92, upon the call of respondent, who is treasurer of the county, presented them to him for payment. The treasurer offered payment of the principal, with interest at 10 per cent per annum until June 7, 1893, and at 8 per cent since that date. The reason for the difference in the rate of interest offered was that whereas, prior to June 7, 1893, the legal rate of interest in this state was 10 per cent, the Act of February 21, 1893, which took effect June 7, reduced that rate to 8 per cent. The Statute (Gen. Stat. § 216) requires the treasurer, when he has no funds to pay a county order or warrant presented, to indorse it, "Not paid for want of funds," with the date of the indorsement over his signature; and from this time it is declared the order shall draw legal interest. The contention of the appellant is (1) that the language and intention of the Act of 1893 are wholly prospective; (2) whatever may have been the intention it was not within the power of the legislature to change the rate which prevailed at the time when the orders were presented and indorsed.

In Saunders v. Carroll, 12 La. Ann. 793, the first of the above points was well covered, and it was held that a new interest law would not be considered as applicable to cases which arose previous to its passage unless the legislature, in express terms, declared such to be its intention. We have no idea that our legislature of 1893 contemplated for one moment that public obligations of this class would be repudiated, to the extent of one fifth of the interest thereon, by the passage of the Act of February 21. The act itself bears no evidence of any such intention. But a disposition of the case upon this point would be far from satisfactory, and we shall consider it upon the other as well. It is agreed that, if the provision in regard to interest of 10 per cent entered into and become a part of the contract, the legislature could not impair it by making the reduced rate applicable to the warrant either before or after the passage of the law; but, if the exaction of interest is mere penalty for the unlawful act of detaining money due, then it is conceded that it is changeable with the change in the law. A county order or warrant is lacking in one of the qualities which make notes, bills, checks, etc., commercial paper, viz. "negotiability." This lack, however, is due entirely to the fact that it is open to all defenses which might have been made to the claim on which it was founded. In Alison v. Juniata County, 50 Pa. 351, it was held, following

Dyer v. Covington Twp. 19 Pa. 200, that such warrants were not even contracts upon which a suit could be maintained, but that the original indebtedness was the sole ground of action. There are some other cases of like tenor, perhaps, but they do not express the current law of such matters. Dillon on Municipal Corporations, §§ 485-487, and Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, §§ 427-430, treat these warrants as only something less in negotiability than notes or bonds, and therefore not commercial paper.

This court, in Seymour v. Spokane, 6 Wash. 362, maintained a doctrine exactly the contrary of that put forth in Pennsylvania and a few other states concerning the payment of interest on warrants where no statute required it. But however the case may be elsewhere, or in other cases, we are satisfied that it cannot be held here that a county warrant is not a contract to pay money. Our statutes governing the presentation and allowance of claims against counties, and the issuance of warrants for the sums allowed, plainly contemplate that the transaction between the claimant and the county is to be merged in the warrant, and settled by it, just as fully as is a store account between a merchant and his customer when the latter gives his note for the balance found due upon the former's books. One of the principal reasons we find given in the cases alluded to for not allowing interest on warrants, where there has been no custom and no statute, is that people who have dealt with a county have, by advancing the price of their goods, discounted the face of their claims before their warrants are issued. But here we have the law making the payment of interest mandatory, so that one who deals with a county knows that he is expected to sell to it on a cash basis, the same as he does to a private individual, making himself whole for delay in payment out of the interest required to be paid him. When the dealer delivers goods to the county, it is just as much implied that he shall have interest at the legal rate from the time his warrant is presented as that he shall have his claim passed upon and a warrant issued for the amount found due. But it is said that the right to interest exists only because it is given by statute as a penalty for the county's nonpayment on demand, to which the sufficient answer is that every right which a creditor has against a county is to precisely the same extent statutory. The right to sue, the right to have a claim allowed, the right to have a warrant, and to have it paid, all depend on statutes which are none the less necessary to the existence of any of these rights because they are universal accompaniments of county organization. The obligation to pay interest is no less one of contract when the claim for interest is based upon a transaction growing out of contract, because the burden of paying interest is imposed upon the county by a statute. Its obligation to pay the principal has the same foundation.

The only question which remains, then, is whether, since the warrant has read into it a contract to pay "legal interest," it can be held that the rate is to vary as the legal rate is changed by statute from higher to lower, and vice versa. It is claimed that there is notice in the statute itself that the rate which is legal at one time may be changed later, and that the warrant holder takes the risk of the change. To support this proposition a number of cases are cited which hold the rule to be that, where a note provides for "interest" from the date until maturity, the rate recoverable after the maturity may be changed. These cases are based upon the principle that the interest before the maturity is based upon the contract, while that after is dependent upon the rules as to damages. But no case is produced which holds, nor is it claimed by respondent that where a note provides for "interest," or "legal interest," until maturity, any change in the interest law has been held to apply so as to raise or lower the rate recoverable up to maturity; that is, the universal holding is that, where the right to interest is based on the contract, it is the legal rate at the date of the contract which must prevail, and cannot be altered. Kosh-konong v. Burton, 104 U. S. 668, 26 L. ed. 886. Now, a warrant, under our statutes, is a promise to pay it in its order of issue, when money applicable to it comes into the treasury, and its maturity, by analogy with a note, is the time when the treasurer gives notice of his readiness to pay it, and stops the interest. Respondent says that, if a warrant is considered as a contract, it is one which becomes due instantly upon presentation, and therefore the interest upon it, like that upon a past due note, is only allowed as damages. But there is this difference: A note can be sued upon, judgment taken, execution issued, and property levied upon and sold, and the debt paid; but no action lies either upon a warrant or the original debt. In the case of the note interest after maturity or judgment is the penalty inflicted for the wrongful failure to pay; but with the warrant the forbearance enforced by the condition of the public treasury is the reason at bottom of the allowance of interest. It is the private debtor's fault that he does not pay; but it is not the fault of the county, which must exist, but cannot pay faster than it receives the means to pay with. It is also said that the law allows interest at different rates, from time to time, according as the value of money is supposed to vary, and purely as compensation for the detention of money. Such is the theory of it when it is allowed as a penalty; but, as we have seen, this theory has no application when the payment of interest is based upon a contract, although that contract merely provides for the legal rate. Respondent is forced to admit that if, instead of passing a new law merely lowering the legal date, the legislature had simply repealed section 2795 of the General Statutes, upon this theory, all interest on county warrants would have stopped June 7, or, if the rate had been doubled, interest on such warrants after that rate at 20 per cent would have been recoverable. Such a conclusion would alone be sufficient to stamp such a theory as wholly unreasonable. Public policy can justly have but little to do with such matters, but the importance of maintaining the public credit is not to be estimated at nothing. Repudiation of public obligations is not to be thought of in these days, and cannot be tolerated in the guise of reduced interest on past transactions any more than would a clipping of the principal. Nor, as has been said before, do we believe the legislature had any such intention in enacting the new law. Other statutes make ample provision by which the counties can at any time fund their legal indebtedness at as low rates as money can be procured for, thereby paying off at a stroke, all their high interest bearing warrants, and placing themselves on a cash foundation. In the meantime they ought to, and under the law can, do no less than meet their obligations upon the same terms as a private person. Having contracted to pay interest on their warrants at 10 per cent, that rate is due on the holder. Judgment reversed, and remanded, with directions to set aside the order of dismissal and proceed with the cause.

Dunbar, Ch. J., and Scott, J., concur.

Hoyt, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the conclusions of the majority announced in the foregoing opinion. Under well settled rules of law, money due and unpaid, if the amount thereof is liquidated, will draw interest at the legal rate. It is equally well settled that an exception to such rule exists in favor of the sovereignty and of its necessary agencies in the government; that, under such exception, sums due and unpaid will not draw interest unless there is express statutory provision therefor, or such universal custom and acquiescence therein as to have the force of express legislation. It is conceded that counties are necessary agencies of the state, and are entitled to the benefits of this exception. It must follow that the warrants in question, being claims against a county, will only draw interest by virtue of the express provision of the law which provides that after they have been presented, and payment refused for want of funds, they shall draw interest at the legal rate. Without this provision the warrants would draw no interest, and the sole object of its enactment was to place counties upon the same basis, so far as the payment of interest on money due was concerned, as private individuals were, without any legislation. If the money was due from a private individual, it would draw interest at the legal rate which was or should be established during the time that payment was delayed; and the fact that a certain rate was the legal rate at the time the money became due would not establish that as the necessary rate until payment. If the legislature should change the legal rate, the changed rate would obtain from the date the law making the change went into effect. If a note is given bearing a certain rate of interest, and nothing is said about the rate which it shall draw after maturity, the great weight of authority is to the effect that after such maturity it will only draw interest at the legal rate, unaffected by the contract rate set out in the note. In a case of this kind there would be much greater reason that the rate of interest as specified in the contract should continue to attach to the use of the money after a violation of its terms than that the rate in existence at the time a warrant was presented for payment should continue to be the rate as to the money represented by such warrant, uninfluenced by the fact that the legal rate had been changed by the legislature.

What is said in the opinion of the majority as to the right of one furnishing goods for the county growing out of the rate of interest which prevailed at the time such goods were furnished needs no attention, for the reason that it is not contended on the part of the appellant that the rate of interest upon the money due for such goods would be established prior to the time of the issue and presentation of the warrant.

Something is said about public policy, but, in my opinion, considerations of that kind can have no influence in the determination of this question, for the reason that the law seems to me clear, when the object to be accomplished by the legislation is taken into consideration. If, from the language of the provision, it was clear that the legal rate named therein referred exclusively to such rate at the date of the presentation of the warrant, such fact would not warrant the construction placed thereon, for the reason that the rate prescribed was not a contract rate, but was in the nature of a penalty for the nonpayment of the money, like the penalty imposed for the nonpayment of a judgment, which it is conceded is within the control of the legislation, unaffected by the rate of interest established by law at the date of the entry of the judgment. But, as I read the provision, it has no particular reference to the date of the presentation of the warrant, but is simply a general provision applying to all warrants by which it is provided that, during the time the money due thereon is unpaid, such money shall draw interest at such rate as, from time to time, shall be established by law as the legal rate. The construction contended for by the appellant would, in my opinion, only be warranted if the statute was to the effect that after the presentation of the warrant it should draw interest at the legal rate at the date of its presentation. The general language used, and the statement that the warrant shall draw interest at the legal rate, when fairly interpreted, should only be held to mean that the legal rate referred to is that prevailing from time to time while the warrant remains unpaid.

I am unable to find anything in the language used to show an intention on the part of the legislature to create a legislative contract. It only appears therefrom that the state and its counties should be put upon the same footing as individuals, and be required to pay for the use of money retained, after it is due, a fair compensation; and such compensation is fixed at the legal rate, which is fixed by the legislature from time to time, as the value of the use of money changes. There is no reason why the legislation should be so construed as to compel the payment of more than a fair compensation for the use of the money. Such, however, is the result of the construction given by the majority. The judgment directed will require the county of Thurston to pay for the use of the money 10 per cent, when the use has been by law declared to be worth only 8 per cent. Stress is placed upon the fact that the retention of the money by the county, being caused by the state of its treasury, should put it upon a different basis than an individual whose neglect to pay is caused by want of funds. I can see no reason whatever for so discriminating against a county, which is but one of the agencies through which the state does its business.

Anders, J.: I concur in the above.

The master is never liable for the acts of the servant, which are not connected with the particular service he has employed the servant to perform. Under the facts and circumstances of this case, it is entirely immaterial what purpose or motive actuated James, and induced him to carry the drills. 94 L. R. A.

As James was a special agent whose duties and course of employment only authorized him to act for the defendant as the custodian en route of the baggage of its passengers, and as these drills did not belong to any passenger, and clearly were not baggage, the law would hold that the baggageman was acting for himself and not the defendant, in receiving, carrying and delivering these drills.

It was a purely voluntary act on the part of James, outside the course of his employment, for the consequences of which the law would not hold the master liable, and certainly the law would not hold the master liable to the party who had induced the servant to perform for him a gratuitous act without the master's consent.

From the facts the inference is irresistible, that defendant acquiesced in and consented to its baggagemen carrying and delivering the drills. And under such circumstances the defendant is clearly liable for the negligence of its baggageman.

Plaintiff had every reason to believe, since he found defendant's baggagemen delivering drills when he came, and they kept it up during all his employment down to the day of his injury, that it was done for the interest and benefit of defendant, especially since they were always shipped by defendant's old and trusted agent Stover, who died in the employ of defendant.

The authority of both agent Stover and baggageman James was apparent and binding on defendant.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained by plaintiff by reason of the alleged negligence of the servant of defendant. The evidence showed that the plaintiff was the general foreman in charge of the works of the Hannibal Lime Company, at Bear Creek, a small station on the line of defendant's road, six miles west of Hannibal; that the office of the lime company was in that city; that plaintiff had charge of all its business, including the shipment of lime from Bear Creek, and had been such foreman for five or more years previous to the injury; that he was accustomed to send iron drills, used for getting out the rock to make lime, to a blacksmith at Wither's Mills, two miles west of Bear Creek, to be sharpened. The drills were from five to six feet in length, weighing some thirteen pounds each. They were sometimes sent on wagons, sometimes on hand cars, and sometimes in defendant's baggage car. No instructions or directions were given as to the manner by which the drills were to be returned by the blacksmith. The blacksmith at Wither's Mills (Jacob Stover) was postmaster at that place, and was also defendant's ticket agent, and had been for about fifteen years before the accident. After the drills were sharpened by Stover, he would take them from the shop to the station house, and lay them down on the railroad platform, in front of the depot. They were usually wired, three together. He would then tag the drills, "Hannibal Lime Company, Bear Creek station," or, if not so tagged, he would mark them with chalk, in the same way. He would then, upon the arrival of defendant's passenger train from the west, put the drills in the baggage car, in charge of defendant's baggage man, who would receive them, place them in the car, and deliver them to the lime company at Bear Creek station. If the train stopped, he would drop them off at the platform, and, if it did not stop, he would throw the drills off anywhere east of the rock chute. This way of delivering the drills by the baggage man had continued for ten or fifteen years before, and up to the day of, the injury. It was a custom of long standing, and the drills were so delivered as frequently as from three to five times per week, and often every day in the week, during this long series of years. Each retiring baggage man would hand down the habit and custom to his successor. The evidence showed: That the plaintiff was in the habit of communicating with the managing officers of his company at Hannibal by letters, which he would throw into the baggage car as the train went by; and on the day of this accident he went down to the track, in order to put a letter which he had written his employers in Hannibal on the train, as he had been accustomed to do that as the train came in he was standing with one foot on the rail of the side track nearest the main line, with the letter in his hand. When the train got within 200 feet of him, he noticed the ends of the drills projecting out of the open door of the baggage car, saw them raised up, and saw the baggageman look out of the door, and down the track, towards the point where he was standing, and then drew himself inside the car. Anticipating that the drills were to be thrown off, plaintiff at once left his position by the side of the track, and ran northward to get out of the way. When he had gotten about 15 feet from the point where he was standing when he was looking out the drills. The baggageman testified that he looked out of the door of the car, and down along the track, and, seeing plaintiff standing by the side of the track, stepped back into the car, and, bracing himself, swung the drills with all his might from the train, as far as he could throw them, for the purpose of avoiding any possibility of striking the plaintiff; that he did not see plaintiff move from the position where he had first seen him, and did not know that he had left that position; that, knowing the position where plaintiff stood, he supposed it would be perfectly safe to throw the drills over beyond the side track. The drills struck the ground, and, revolving, struck plaintiff, knocking him down, injuring his arm,—the point of one of the drills entering his arm. A portion of one of the bones of the forearm had to be removed, thereby shortening that bone, and altering the normal position of the hand with relation to the wrist, and, as compared with its previous condition, permanently impairing the usefulness of the hand and arm. The evidence further showed that James, the man who threw the drills out of the car, was the agent of the American Express Company, and also a train baggageman in defendant's service; that under the regulation of the defendant, promulgated for the guidance and direction of train baggagemen, such baggagemen were not permitted to carry any article or commodity in the car which did not belong to the passengers on the train, and come properly within the designation of passenger's baggage, unless it was the property of the railroad company itself, such as tools, material, or supplies sent out by it for its servants at the various stations; that drills shipped by the public over the road properly fell within the designation of freight or express matter, and the train baggageman, James, was not authorized to carry them; that they could only be carried on a passenger train by the express company, as express matter. Plaintiff swore that defendant never, to his knowledge, received a cent for the carriage of the drills; that, so far as he knew, his company was the only party interested in their carriage. And this was corroborated by defendant's train baggageman, Mr. James, who testified that he was never instructed by defendant to carry the drills, and never informed any of its officers that he was carrying them; that plaintiff put the drills on the car at Bear Creek, and instructed him to throw them off at Wither's Mills for "Uncle Jake," and he carried the drills purely as a matter of accommodation, never having received anything for so doing. The present management of defendant company took charge in 1894, some two years before the accident. The superintendent, S. E. Crance, the trainmaster, T. S. Beeler, as well as the general agent of defendant at Hannibal, E. F. Bradford, testified that they did not know that the drills were being carried by the baggageman on a passenger train. Plaintiff's evidence, however, showed that Woodward, the superintendent who preceded Crance prior to 1884, as well as Beeler, the trainmaster under the present management, had been seen in the baggage car on two or three occasions when drills were being carried by the baggageman. But the evidence further showed that the presence of drills in the car, if seen by them, would excite no suspicion that they were being carried by the baggageman for outside parties; that it was perfectly right and proper to carry drills and tools belonging to the defendant in the car, or to carry such drills in the baggage car as express matter. The evidence further showed that Hance, the conductor of the train, was frequently in the car when the drills were being carried, and probably knew that the baggageman was carrying the lime company's drills; but it was shown that the train baggageman, in his department of work, and in respect to his special duties, was entirely independent of the conductor, who had no authority over him in respect to the nature of the articles carried in the car. Defendant demurred to the case made by plaintiff's evidence, and renewed its demurrer at the close of all the evidence, but it was overruled. A trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000; and the defendant, after an unsuccessful motion for a new trial, brings the case to this court by an appeal.

Before the defendant can be held liable for the negligent act of its baggageman, it must be made to appear not only that at the time of the injury he was its servant, and in its employ, but that the act of the servant which occasioned the injury was done in the course of his employment. The master is not liable for the acts of the servant which are not connected with the service which the servant had been employed to perform. If, for instance, a servant should be employed to do a particular thing or kind of work, and does something else, without his master's consent, and, by reason of his negligence or carelessness, another is injured, the master is not liable, because the injury was not done in the course of his employment. In order that the master may be held liable, the act causing the injury must pertain to the duties which the servant was employed to perform. If the baggage-man, in delivering the drills, was not serving his master, but was merely doing so to accommodate others, and the master was deriving no benefit therefrom, then the master is not liable, even though the injury complained of would not have been committed without the facilities afforded by the baggageman's relations to the defendant. Garretzen v. Duencel, 50 Mo. 104, 11 Am. Rep. 405; Cousins v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 66 Mo. 572; Mitchell v. Crassweller, 18 C. B. 237; Farber v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 116 Mo. 81, 20 L. R. A. 350. In Towanda Coal Co. v. Heeman, 86 Pa. 418, plaintiff, a small boy, climbed onto the cars; and a brakeman, after the train started, threw coal at him, striking him in the face,—blinding him,—and he slipped off, and was run over. The evidence showed that the brakeman had no duty to perform in admitting or excluding persons from the train; that this duty was vested solely in the conductor. The court denied a recovery, saying: "The legal rule was stated in the opinion of Alderson, J., in that case (McKenzie v. McLeod, 10 Bing. 385), to be that the act of the servant is the act of the master where the duty is defined by precise orders; and where something is directed to be done, and the manner of doing it is left wholly to the discretion of the servant, the judgment exercised may be considered the judgment of the master, and he must be answerable. 'But where he has neither ordered the thing to be done, nor allowed the servant any discretion as to the mode of doing it, I cannot see how in common justice or common sense, the master can be held responsible.' An examination of all the testimony shows that there is nothing contained in it to prove that the brakeman whose conduct is complained of, in the assault he made on the plaintiff, was acting in pursuance of any authority conferred on him." In Farber v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 82 Mo. App. 378, the court says: "The mere fact that a tortious act is committed by a servant while he is actually engaged in the performance of the service cannot make the master liable. Something more is required. It must not only be done while employed, but it must pertain to the duties of the employment. That has been repeatedly decided in this state. McKeon v. Citizens' L. Co. 42 Mo. 83; Snyder v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 419; Jackson v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 87 Mo. 430, 56 Am. Rep. 460." In Walton v. New York Cent. Sleeping Car Co. 139 Mass. 556, "the defendant was the owner of sleeping cars running in the trains of the Boston & Albany Railway, over its road, and had in its employ, as a porter on the car, one Maxwell. Maxwell had arranged with a woman at Newton to do his washing, and the woman was to send her daughter to the train to get his soiled linen. Maxwell did the linen up in a bundle, and, as the train ran through the station without stopping, dropped the bundle off; and it struck plaintiff, a trackman on the Boston & Albany road, and injured him severely, and he brought suit against the sleeping-car company. Plaintiff asked the trial court to rule that if Maxwell was in the employ of the defendant, paid by it for taking care of the car, allowed to keep articles of personal property of his own in the car, and, having such in his possession in the car on this occasion, carelessly and negligently threw the same from the car while passing over the railroad therein, in the performance of his general duties in the care of the car, and that the plaintiff then being in the exercise of due care, and rightfully on the railway, the defendant would be liable for all such damages resulting therefrom as would be legally recoverable for the injuries occasioned thereby." The judge refused so to rule, and ruled as follows: "The defendant is not responsible if the injury to plaintiff was done by Maxwell, the servant of defendant, without the authority of defendant, and not for the purpose of executing the defendant's orders, or doing the defendant's work, and not while acting as such servant in the scope of his employment. If Maxwell was employed by defendant as a porter upon its parlor car, and wholly for the purpose of his own, and disregarding the object for which he was employed, and not intending by his act to execute it, negligently threw the bundle—his own property—from the platform of the parlor car, and thereby the plaintiff, who was not a passenger, was hit and injured while in the exercise of due care, and if this injury done by Maxwell was not within the scope of his employment, then the defendant is not liable." The judge also ruled, as requested by defendant, that, upon all the evidence, the plaintiff could not recover. The supreme court says: "The ruling and instructions of the court were correct. There was no evidence that Maxwell was employed by defendant to take care of his own clothing and personal effects. The act complained of was not within the scope of his employment, and it was wholly immaterial that he was at the moment riding in a car of the defendant, in which he was employed by it for other purposes." In Cunningham v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 81 U. C. Q. B. 350, the plaintiff was in the employment of one C., a contractor with defendant for building fences along its line. As a matter of convenience to him, he was permitted by defendant to carry his tools upon its trains, and was, at the time of the injury, taking two crowbars from Port Hope to a point on the line of the road where his men were at work. As the train passed the spot, C. dropped one bar out, and the baggagemaster pitched out the other, which struck and injured the plaintiff. The baggageman had nothing to do with C., nor any right to meddle with his tools, nor did he ask him to put the bar out. Held, that defendant was not responsible for the injury, for the baggageman was not acting as the servant for defendant, nor in pursuance of him employment.

The evidence shows that the baggageman in the case at bar was a special agent, having no general power, and that his duties were to look alone after the baggage of passengers. Carrying the drills, which occasioned the injury, was not within the line of his employment. It necessarily follows that the defendant cannot be held responsible for any injuries occasioned by the negligent handling of them, unless it was done by the direction of defendant's officers and agents, or with their knowledge and consent, and for the benefit of defendant corporation. To establish this knowledge on the part of defendant's officers, it was shown that the conductor in charge of the train knew that it was the custom of the baggageman to carry the drills to and from Wither's Mills to Bear Creek, and to dump them off at the latter place, on their return, while the train was in motion. Beeler, the general agent, E. F. Bradford, superintendent, and the former superintendent, Woodward, had been in the baggage car on several occasions when the drills were being carried by the baggageman. But the evidence also shows that the conductor had no control over the baggageman, who was also express messenger, and that it was not unusual to carry such things as express matter. The other parties—Crance, Beeler, and Bradford—stated that they did not know that the drills were being carried by the baggageman for outside parties, even if they saw them. The plaintiff testified as follows: "I don't know that Mr. Beeler knew anything about the arrangement by which the bars were carried. . . . I never paid anything to the company for carrying the drills. I never knew the lime company to pay anything to the defendant for carrying them. . . . The railroad never received a dollar or a cent, to my knowledge, for the carriage of the drills, or the letters that I spoke of. . . . Q. No officer of the company knew anything about those drills being carried there, to your absolute knowledge? A. No, sir. . . . I knew the lime company was the only one interested. I did not speak to Mr. Woodward about the drills, nor let him know that the blacksmith was sharpening the drills for us, or that the drills were being carried on the train." The evidence did not show that the officers of the defendant knew that the baggageman was in the habit of carrying drills for the lime company, that they consented to it, or that it came within the line of his duty to do so, but it did show to the contrary. If it had been shown that the baggageman had been in the habit of carrying the drills, and putting them off at Bear Creek station, by and with the knowledge and consent of defendant's officers, and as its agent, authority to do so might be inferred therefrom. Edwards v. Thomas, 66 Mo. 468. But he was also, at the same time, agent for an express company, and his conduct in handling the drills was as consistent with the one service as the other. Moreover, he testified that he was not acting as baggageman in handling the drills; that he did so gratuitously, merely as an accommodation to the plaintiff; and the evidence of the plaintiff himself tended strongly to show that such was the case. The mere fact that the baggageman handled the drills was no evidence, of itself, that he was doing so in the capacity of a baggageman, and was no notice to defendant. In order to make defendant liable for the act of the baggageman, for acts of negligence committed not in the line of his employment, it must be shown that he either had express authority to transact the business connected with the injury, or that defendant, by its officers, knew that he, as its agent, was so engaged, for such a length of time as would justify the presumption that he was authorized to so act. It was not enough that the conductor, Hance, had knowledge that the baggageman was in the habit of carrying drills from Wither's Mills, and putting them off at Bear Creek station, for the lime company, for, as has been said, the conductor had no control whatever over him, and notice to him was no notice to the defendant company.

But it is contended by plaintiff that Jacob Stover, the defendant's ticket agent at Wither's Mills, shipped the drills on the passenger train of defendant of his own accord, without solicitation of plaintiff, and with the acquiescence, if not permission, of defendant, and that in so doing he was in the line of his employment as station agent, his act was that of the defendant, and that it is estopped to deny that its agent acted without its knowledge and authority. That this position is correct, with respect of the acts of a station agent clothed with the power to receive and forward freight, and who acts within the scope of his authority, seems to be well-settled law. Harrison v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 74 Mo. 860, 41 Am. Rep. 318, and authorities cited. But there was not one scintilla of evidence which showed, or tended to show, that the drills were sent as freight, or that Stover had any authority to send them as such, or in any other way, on defendant's passenger trains. Stover's acts in sending the drills by the baggageman, as well, also, of the latter in handling them, were unauthorized by defendant, who should not be held responsible for the injury, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. The arrangement seems to have been one between plaintiff, for the lime company, and James, the train baggageman, with reference to something not in the line of his employment, and of which his employer had no knowledge, and gave no consent.

Under the views herein expressed, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the question as to what duty defendant owed plaintiff at the time of the injury, when on its right of way for the purpose of mailing letters upon its train. The demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained.

The principles of assent as deducible from the opinions of the various courts would seem to be, that the assent of the creditors to an assignment or deed of trust made for their benefit will be presumed when the assignment is absolute, beneficial, and imposes no terms or conditions, either by way of release or discharge of the debts by the creditors, or in any other way imposing a detriment to the creditor or a benefit to the debtor. Such presumption, however, is subject to rebuttal by showing dissent.

In Massachusetts the courts hold that assent must be shown and is not to be presumed, but this doctrine would seem to arise from the want of equitable jurisdiction in the courts of that state to enforce the trust, and from the fact of the repeal of the Statute of 1836, relating to the question of assent to such deeds.

I. Assent and presumption.
General doctrine.

Assent or acceptance on the part of the grantee or other party to a deed or other instrument, by means of which the title to property, whether real or personal, is to be transferred to him, or by which he is in any other manner to become bound, is a fact, the truth of which is to be established by competent evidence, before such deed or other instrument can be adjudged to have a legal existence. Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 244.

Like every other fact, it may be established by direct evidence, or its existence may be inferred or presumed from other facts already in proof. Ibid.

Where a deed is executed by the grantor and delivered to a stranger for the use of the grantee, without the previous advice, direction, or authority of the grantee, and without his knowledge, the law will presume that the grantee assents to it, the moment it is delivered to the stranger. Ibid.

Assent is an act of the mind—that intelligent power in man by which he conceives, reasons, and judges, and of which it is a primary, invariable, and most familiar law that it cannot act with reference to external objects, until, through the medium of the senses, it is impressed with or knows their existence. Ibid.

Without such impression or knowledge, there can be no assent, no actus contra actum; and to presume it in opposition to the facts, is to presume that which is impossible; which the law, the rules and precepts of which are in conformity with the unchanging truths of nature, will never do. Ibid.

In Gazzam v. Poyntz, 4 Ala. 374, 37 Am. Dec. 745, it is said that the creditors may either assent to the debtor's proposition, or take their chance by suit.

"A presumption" may be defined to be an inference as to the existence of one fact, from the existence of some other fact, founded upon a previous experience of their connection. Welch v. Sackett, supra.

It is necessary that there be a previous experience of the connection between the known and inferred facts, of such a nature that as soon as the existence of the one is established, admitted, or assumed, the inference as to the existence of the other immediately arises, independently of any reasoning upon the subject. Ibid.

It is a generally admitted principle of the law that to the creation of a trust by deed, in favor of any person, it is not necessary that a cestui que trust should either be a party or assent to it. Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 206.

A trust may be created for the benefit of a creditor without his knowledge. Shepherd v. McEvers, 4 Johns. Ch. 186, 1 L. ed. 791, 8 Am. Dec. 561; Soull v. Reeves, 3 N. J. Eq. 84, 29 Am. Dec. 694.

Delivery or assent, however, on the part of the trustee or mortgagee, is essential. Foster v. Perkins, 42 Me. 168.

An acceptance is necessary to constitute the assignee a trustee for the creditors. Brevard v. Neely, 2 Sneed, 164.

Delivery by the grantor, and acceptance by the grantee of a deed, are both requisite to pass the legal title to land, and both facts may be established by circumstances as well as by direct proof. Hubbard v. Cox, 76 Tex. 242.

The trustee, having accepted the terms of the trust, and there being no repudiation of its terms by the beneficiaries, his acceptance inures for the creditors' benefit. Bank of California v. Marshall, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 704.

The title of the assignee under a deed of assignment, in trust for creditors, in no way depends upon the consent or non-consent of creditors to take under the assignment. Thomas v. Chapman, 62 Tex. 183.

A trust unknown to the creditor at the time of its defendants in an attachment proceeding to reach property which had been conveyed in trust for creditors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Scarborough & Rogers, for appellant:

A deed of trust is but a mere mortgage with power of sale, and does not pass title.

McLane v. Paschal, 47 Tex. 869; Blackwell Barnett, 52 Tex. 838.

A mortgage, like any other contract, requires the consent of the mortgagor and mortgagee, and it must be consummated by delivery. Without these there is no mortgage, but only an attempt at one, or proposition to make one. And delivery of a contract includes acceptance of it by the grantee or obligee.

creation will not deprive him of the right to its benefits. Wallis v. Beauchamp, 15 Tex. 308.

The fraudulent intent of the grantor alone will not avoid such a deed unless the assignee or the creditors knew of, or participated in, the fraud. Truss v. Davidson, 90 Ala. 369.

In Hutchinson v. Green, 91 Mo. 367, it was held that the creditors of a corporation might make an assignment without the consent of stockholders, for the benefit of creditors.

Where the deed of assignment was voidable, it was held that preferred creditors, though not parties to the declaration of trusts, might claim under it. Bellamy v. Bellamy, 6 Fla. 62, 102.

In Kalkman v. McElderry, 16 Md. 55, the court stated that the presumption of assent depended upon the character of the instrument of transfer. Such an assignment will not be considered beneficial, unless the deed devotes the property absolutely, and under all circumstances, to the payment of the debt secured. In that case, the court admitted the general principle as laid down in Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 208, but held that the assignment in the present case did not absolutely and under all circumstances devote the property to the payment of the debts, and as there was no evidence of assent, in fact, of the creditors, the law would not presume any.

II. Assent presumed.

a. In general.

Where the deed provides a security without imposing any terms upon the creditor, or in any manner postponing the collection of his demand, the provision being manifestly for his benefit, the law implies his assent and the deed is not revocable by the grantor. Lockwood v. Nelson, 16 Ala. 294.

It is for the benefit of a creditor to receive all the effects that the debtor has. Hall v. Denison, 17 Vt. 310.

The beneficiary is not bound to show his assent thereto, by executing the deed, his assent being presumed in the absence of evidence showing the contrary. Wiswall v. Ross, 4 Port. It is not an open question in Alabama, that the assent of preferred creditors to a deed of assignment, valid in other respects, will be presumed. Smith v. Leavitt, 10 Ala. 93.

The principle has become such a fundamental one, that it would require the action of the legislature to overturn it. Ibid.

In Brown v. Chamberlin, 9 Fla. 464, it was said to be the settled rule in law on the subject of the assent of creditors to the assignment, that assignments directed to the creditors were not valid without their assent, but that assignments to trustees for their benefit did not require such assent to render them valid and operative, the legal estate in the latter case passing to the assignee without assent, and preventing the judgment creditor from acquiring a lien except through fraud.

It is presumed in the case of preferred creditors, and is supported by the consideration of their debts, in the absence of conditions. Sadler v. Fallon, 4 R. I. 490; Evans v. Lamar, 21 Ala. 833, their debts not being postponed beyond their maturity.

Even though the creditors do not become parties, or even express their assent where the assignment is to a trustee for their benefit, no conditions being annexed. Hall v. Denison, 17 Vt. 310.

Such assignment need contain no provision for their signature or make them parties to it, if properly drawn and executed between the debtor and the assignee, and the creditor's consent will be presumed. Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421.

No formal acceptance by the creditors is re-

Messrs. Clark, Dyer & Bolinger for defendants in error.

Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The firm of Eaton, Guinan & Co., merchants, executed a deed of trust on their property to John F. Marshall, which gave him power, in the usual course of trade, to sell so much of the property as was necessary, for cash, to raise money to pay the indebtedness of Eaton, Guinan & Co. to four other firms named in the trust deed, and to pay to himself 2½ per cent commissions on the amount realized by sales, besides other expenses of executing the trust, as well as the rent of a storehouse in which the business was conducted, after which the residue of the property was to quired. Reinhard v. Bank of Kentucky, 6 B. Mon. 322.

Such presumption rests upon the general principle that a party is presumed to assent to acts done for his benefit. Forbes v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 223, 227.

The title and possession of the property having passed out of the debtor to the trustee for the creditors. Webster v. Harkness, 3 Mackey, 220.

And the assent, adds nothing to its legal operation as a conveyance of property. Paul v. Logansport Nat. Bank, 60 Ind. 190.

The conveyance is not in any way dependent for its validity upon such assent. Robbins v. Magee, 76 Ind. 381.

In the above case the court distinguished a voluntary assignment from a composition agreement, holding that in the latter the assent of the creditors gave the contract force, while in the former such assent could neither strengthen nor weaken the debtor's act. 174d.

The law presumes the benefits, designed for the beneficiaries, will be accepted by them. Farquharson v. McDonald, 2 Heisk. 404.

Especially where the deed contravenes no principles of law. Hulick v. Marshall, 9 Mo. App. 148.

The deed being absolute in terms and expressly accepted by the assignee, the provisions being fair and equitable, and such that there could be no objection to carrying it into effect. Suydam v. Dequindre, Harr. Ch. 347.

No release or condition being stipulated for on behalf of the debtor, and the property being distributable among all the creditors pro rata. Fellows v. Commercial & Railroad Bank of Vicksburg, 6 Rob. (La.) 246.

The presumption of law as well as of fact in the first instance being that it was made with his assent, unless there be some cause to infer his non-acceptance, the deed being for valuable consideration and operating from the delivery to the trustees for the beneficiaries. Stewart v. Hall, 3 B. Mon. 218.

The assent of the cestui que trust may be given at any time after the deed is made. Field v. Arrowsmith, 8 Humph. 442; Saunders v. Harris, 1 Head, 185.

Where there is no conflict and the beneficiaries claimed the benefit of the assignment, at any time before it is revoked, an acceptance at the proper time will be presumed. Dews v. Oilwell, 3 Baxt. 432.

The above doctrine is said to be founded upon the established principle of the common law, that it is not necessary to the creation of a trust by deed in favor of another, that the cestui que trust should either be a party or assent to it, that if the trust is for his benefit the law presumes his assent until the contrary is shown, trusts being creatable where there can be no present assent. Brown v. Chamberlin, 9 Fla. 464.

The trust must be for their benefit and cannot be for their injury. Fellows v. Commercial & Railroad Bank of Vicksburg, supra.

So the consent of the creditors is not absolutely necessary to the validity of a voluntary assignment, made in good faith and in compliance with the Indiana statutes. Robbins v. Magee, 76 Ind. 381.

And it is not necessary to the validity of such a deed that the creditors should be consulted, even though such a course might be pursued with propriety, the acceptance by the trustees, and the acquiescence of the creditors for more than twenty years, affording presumptive evidence in favor of assent. Brashear v. West, 22 U. S. 7 Pet. 603, 8 L. ed. 501.

Such presumption of law exists in the absence of all evidence to the contrary. Tompkins v. Wheeler, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 106, 10 L. ed. 903; Lawrence v. Davis, 3 McLean, 177.

And unless it be proved that they refused its terms, or took no steps to avail themselves of its benefits. Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 383.

The dissent must be made manifest in some manner. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co. 25 N. H. 9.

The creditor manifestly showing his dissent after being notified of such deed. Ensworth v. King, 50 Mo. 477.

The assent, however, of the creditor will only be presumed in cases where the provisions of the deed are beneficial and not when prejudicial to his interest. Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123, 65 Am. Dec. 458.

But such presumption is not to be carried so far as to bind him as having actually accepted it. Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 175; Tuttle v. Turner, 29 Tex. 752, 773.

It is, however, liable to be rebutted by showing an express dissent; a man cannot be forced to accept a conveyance against his will. Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Bind. 503, 2 Am. Dec. 474.

The doctrine of presumption of assent is further recognized in Truss v. Davidson, 90 Ala. 359, the instrument being free from fraud or illegality, and containing nothing which can be construed prejudicial to the rights of creditors.

And where there is no fraud in fact, such assent, although given after the execution of the deed and even after the levy of attachments, will be presumed, and will relate back to the day of filing the mortgage. First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridonour, 46 Kan. 707.

The presumption of assent will not be affected by reason of a preference clause, in favor of creditors assenting within a given time and releasing their claims, the instrument containing a clause for the distribution of all the property pro rata. Hall v. Denison, 17 Vt. 310.

The assignment, however, must be absolute and unconditional, the assignor neither retaining a power to change the trustee, nor a control of the deed of trust. Fellows v. Commercial & Railroad Bank of Vicksburg, 6 Rob. (La.) 246.

The doctrine is thus expressed in Ex parte Conway, 4 Ark. 386: Even creditors are presumed to give their assent to the deed, as it is made for their benefit, unless they come in and specially object to it, deeds of trust often being made for the benefit of absent persons, or even of persons not in being; but no expression of assent on the part of such persons is necessary, such a trust being always held to be executed upon the principle that the deed is complete when the trustees take upon themselves its performance, and it is not necessary to the va-be returned to Eaton, Guinan & Co., and the trust deed be no longer operative. Marshall immediately took possession of the property named in the trust deed, and, two days afterwards, plaintiff in error, also a creditor of Eaton, Guinan & Co., brought an action against them, and sued out a writ of attachment, which was levied on the property covered by the trust deed. Marshall, and the creditors Eaton, Guinan & Co. intended to secure by the deed were also made parties to the action. The finding of the trial court and of the court of civil appeals is understood to be that, at the time the attachment sued out by plaintiff in error was levied, the creditors of Eaton, Guinan & Co. for whose benefit the trust deed was intended had no knowledge of its execution, and had not then, in any manlidity of assignments that the creditors should be consulted, as they are always presumed to be willing to receive their debts from any hand that will pay them.

If the conveyance is absolute, vesting the property in the assignee, no express assent of the cestui que trust is required while the property remains unchanged. The cestui que trust, although the instrument is made without his concurrence, may require and coerce the execution of the trust. Suydam v. Dequindre, Harr. Ch. 347.

Neither the presence of the grantee nor his previous authority, or his subsequent express assent to the deed, is necessary to make its delivery valid where there is a previous authority to receive the deed, his assent is presumed, where the deed is beneficial to him, although his dissent may be shown and the deed rendered ineffectual. Merills v. Swift, 18 Conn. 287, 46 Am. Dec. 315.

A deed of trust for creditors, executed by the debtor and duly recorded, will prevail against a judgment obtained by a creditor, even though the creditors may not have assented to the trust until after judgment. Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 371, 31 Am. Dec. 642.

The established doctrine of presumed assent, was extended in Rankin v. Lodor, 21 Ala. 390, to a deed of trust executed by one of the partners individually, and by the firm in which such partner was interested, in trust for creditors, with the usual powers to the trustees to collect the debtor's property and realize the same, and hold the proceeds after payment of expenses in trust for the creditors pari passu, as they executed the deed within a certain number of days from its date, and to pay the residue among those creditors who signed the deed within another given time, and to pay in like manner, all those creditors who might sign the deed within a further specified time, with power to carry on the business as therein specified, the deed containing a clause of release by the creditors; the court holding that the assent of all the creditors was not necessary to the validity of such deed, and gave it full force and effect.

These principles were applied in the following cases:

In Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 560, where the deed purported to convey all the property of the grantor, absolutely and unconditionally, for the purpose of paying the debts in the manner prescribed by it, no conditions being prescribed to the creditors, before they were entitled to receive the benefits conferred by the deed.

In England v. Reynolds, 38 Ala. 370, wherein it was stated that the creditor's assent was not necessary to uphold such a deed as against attaching creditors.

And in Hodge v. Wyatt, 10 Ala. 271, where a deed of trust was executed, the court stating that a deed of that description must not be confounded with a general assignment, for the benefit of all or of particular creditors, in which without an express assent of the creditors, one was implied until the contrary was shown in consequence of the benefit which must result to them from the instrument.

So in Kinnard v. Thompson, 12 Ala. 487, no delay was stipulated for by the debtor, the property being absolutely, and under all circumstances, devoted to the payment of the specified creditors, and therefore the court followed the rule adopted in the prior decisions in that state, holding the deed good as against an execution creditor named in it.

Again in Brown v. Lyon, 17 Ala. 659, where the creditors were not required to execute the deed, they were the only creditors who were parties.

Where a deed purported to be tripartite, and was signed by one of the beneficiaries, there being nothing which showed that it was to be inoperative, until signed by the other beneficiaries, it was held the case was not distinguishable from that class of cases which held that neither the trustees nor the beneficiaries were required to sign the deed in order to give it effect. Shearer v. Loftin, 26 Ala. 703.

In De Forest v. Bacon, 1 Conn. 633, where the debtor conveyed his estate to trustees for distribution among certain creditors, with a bona fide intention of preferring them, no dissent having been expressed by the creditors.

Where the debtor assigned a number of notes and accounts in trust for certain creditors with instructions to collect and apply the money pro rata, after deducting a compensation, of which assignment the creditors were notified, and none dissented or objected. Van Winkle v. Iowa Iron & Steel Fence Co. 56 Iowa, 245.

Where no objection was made to the assignment until the complainant filed a bill within sixteen days after the execution of the deed, it was held that the fact that none of the creditors had then formally accepted its provisions could not be rendered an available objection to the deed which was accepted by the trustee. Reinhard v. Bank of Kentucky, 6 B. Mon. 252.

In Duval v. Baisin, 7 Mo. 449, where the deed was executed for the benefit of preferred creditors who were made parties, but did not sign the same, and there was no provision requiring them to execute the deed before sharing in the benefits conferred by it the same doctrine was followed.

Where the deed showed an intention to pay all the creditors pro rata, without provision for individual creditors and nothing pointing to any distinction, there being no attack upon the deed by the creditors, the deed contravening no principles of law. Hulse v. Marshall, 9 Mo. App. 148.

So where the assignment was made to a trustee, a nonresident of the state, the property being held in trust for the benefit of all the creditors. Spanney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co. 26 N. H. 2.

And in North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244, where an objection was raised that there was nothing to show that the assignment in question was accepted or that the beneficiaries ever knew of it, the assignment being for valuable consideration and beneficial. Smith v. Bank of Washington, 5 Serg. & R. 313, to the same effect.

Where a voluntary assignment, made to a trustee, authorized and directed the assignee to pay out "the following dues or debts owing from me to the following named persons" mentioning such persons by name with the amounts, and provided that the residue should be divided equally among "his creditors," with the proviso that if any of his creditors should not present their claims and release him within four months, the dividends payable to ner, assented to it. On trial, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, against Eaton, Guinan & Co., for $1,674.90, and foreclosing the attachment lien, subject to the rights of creditors for whose benefit the trust deed was intended; and the trustee was directed to satisfy that "judgment, as far as possible, out of any funds that may remain in his hands, as the proceeds of said property, after satisfying the debts and claims secured by said deed of trust, and which are therein named," but costs were given against plaintiff. The trial court and court of civil appeals held that: "It was not necessary that the beneficiaries of the deed of trust should accept thereunder before the levy of plaintiff's attachment, in order to give it effect superior to the attachment lien. The trust was at once accepted by the trustee, and, then should be paid over to the debtor, the court held that such last condition was only applicable to the creditors therein described as "his creditors" and did not apply to those previously mentioned. Sadlier v. Fallon, 4 R. I. 490.

In Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271, 31 Am. Dec. 642, the deed was objected to as not binding, because not assented to before the judgment lien attached. It was held that it was not requisite for the cestui que trust to execute a deed made for his benefit, the legal estate passing by the execution of the deed by the assignee and assignor, and that nothing short of an express or implied dissent on the part of the beneficiary would avoid such deed.

So where the assignment was for the benefit of preferred creditors unconditionally, without any stipulation for a release or otherwise. Wheeler v. Sumner, 4 Mason, 183.

In the case of an assignment in trust for creditors, without release or other condition, the property being distributed equally among the creditors pro rata, it was held the assent must be presumed upon the general principles of law, the trust being for their benefit, and that it might be inferred as a presumption of law, until the contrary was shown; and further that if the assent was expressly given within a reasonable time it operated retroactively to confirm the conveyance ab initio. Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 203.

In Ashurst v. Martin, 9 Port. (Ala.) 566, the plaintiff contended that the assignment was fraudulent and void, because it made the preference given to the creditors designated in the schedule, dependent upon the condition that they should execute the same and a release, and discharge the assignor within a given time. The court held, it being contended that the creditors named in such schedule, who did not accept the terms, were excluded from any participation in the benefits of the deed, that the true construction was that by refusing to execute the release, the creditors were merely postponed to the third class mentioned in such deed, and were not precluded from taking advantage under the deed, and the property should not be allowed to revert to the debtor.

In Hyde v. Olds, 12 Ohio St. 591, an assignment of property was made to a trustee in contemplation of insolvency, with a design apparent upon its face to prefer certain creditors to the exclusion of others, the instrument being accepted by the trustee and the act of assignment complete, the court held the deed took effect without the assent of the creditors not named therein, as they could not be expected to assent to an assignment according to its terms, but that the assignment being complete the statute would take hold according to its legal effect and the law would assent for them.

In Baldwin v. Peet, 23 Tex. 703, 75 Am. Dec. 806, it was held that the assent of creditors to a general assignment would be presumed, so as to give it effect, although they knew nothing of it when it was made.

The same conclusion was reached in Wallis v. Taylor, 67 Tex. 431; Green v. Banks, 24 Tex. 508.

No person can be made a grantee against his will, but a deed may operate by a presumed assent, until a dissent or disclaimer appears. Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 423.

While the validity of the deed rests upon the presumed fact, it is but fair that the presumption of assent should extend to the whole transaction, otherwise by legal presumption a fraud might be aided in its perpetration. Green v. Banks, supra.

And also to notice of the facts and circumstances under which it was made, as well as to the terms of the deed. Ibid.

Where the only evidence of acceptance was the fact that one of them was present and assisted in the negotiations when the deed was executed, the court held the question a matter of presumption. Ibid.

When a conveyance is made to another person, his assent is said to be presumed, because there is a strong intendment of law that it is for his benefit, and that no man can be supposed to be unwilling to do that which is for his advantage, and for the reason that it would seem incongruous and absurd, that when a conveyance is completely executed on the part of the grantor that the estate should remain in him, and thirdly because it is contrary to the policy of the law to permit a freehold to remain in suspense and uncertainty. Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 423.

The principal case cannot be said to overrule the principles thus established by the above cases, inasmuch as the instrument in question in that case did not constitute an assignment, either general or special, for the benefit of some or of all of the creditors of its maker, but was in effect only a mortgage, with power to secure the creditors named in it.

The principal case further recognized the validity of general assignments, made in accordance with the Texas statute, under which they are valid without the assent of creditors.

b. Statutory presumption.

Under section 3223 of McClain's Annotated Code of Iowa, ed. 1893, vol. 1, page 851, in the case of an assignment of property for the benefit of all the creditors of the assignor, the assent of the creditors is to be presumed.

By the enactments of New Hampshire of 1861 and 1862, as amending the Laws of 1834, chapter 2483, and chapter 2595 of the Pamphlet Laws, the assent of all the creditors is presumed to all such assignments, when properly made. Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421.

Under the statute of that state the deed need not provide that the creditors should become parties by executing it, and, if no conditions are annexed the assignment is for the benefit of the creditors, and their assent will be presumed until the contrary is shown. Hurd v. Sillaby, 10 N. H. 108; Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 509; to the same effect Fellows v. Greenleaf, supra, the instrument being proper in all respects and according to the statute, the trust being properly and unconditionally accepted.

The statute referred to in the above case is chapter 184 of the Revised Statutes of New Hampshire, Compiled Statutes 297, which contained no provision in regard to the assent of the creditors. Fellows v. Greenleaf, supra.

The statute seizes upon it and diverts its provisions into an equitable channel, inuring for the benefit of all creditors in proportion to their rein the absence of repudiation by the beneficiaries, his acceptance would inure to their benefit." Other questions were raised on appeal, and are presented in application for writ of error, but the view taken of that presented by the ruling above shown renders consideration of them unnecessary.

The instrument in question did not constitute an assignment, either general or special, for the benefit of some or all of the creditors of its makers, but was, in effect, only a mortgage, with power to sell to secure creditors named in it; and if all creditors named in it assented to it, at the time of its execution, no other effect could be given to it. A general assignment made in accordance with the statute in force in this state regulating such assignments is valid without the assent of spective demands under the Ohio Statute of March 14, 1853. Hyde v. Olds, 12 Ohio St. 591.

Section 8174 of Hill's Annotated Laws of Oregon, vol. 2, ed. of 1887, page 1409, provides that in case of an assignment for the benefit of all the creditors of the assignor, the assent of the creditors shall be presumed.

By article 65c of title 73, Sayles' Texas Civil Statutes, vol. 1, page 68, creditors consenting to an assignment are to make known their consent in writing within four months after the publication of the notice, and the creditor, not assenting, can receive no benefit under the assignment, but it is provided that a creditor who has no actual notice may communicate his assent at any time before distribution of the assets, and the receipt by a creditor of any portion of his claim is conclusive evidence of his assent.

In Sanborn v. Norton, 59 Tex. 308, it was held that the act did not make consent of any other character invalid, nor prevent the assignee from entering the name and claim of creditors not consenting in writing among those who are to reap the benefits of the assignments, the act stating that creditors not assenting shall not receive the benefits but does not positively shut out those who give their consent otherwise than in writing.

The above provision has for its object the enabling of the assignee to ascertain within a definite period the number of creditors accepting, and the furnishing of such indisputable evidence of consent, and also to place it in the power of the creditor to share in the benefits of the assignment. Sanborn v. Norton, supra.

In the above case it was further held that the section contemplated that the assignee might proceed as if such creditor were ranked among the accepting creditors, inasmuch as if the assignee paid him a dividend, it was conclusive evidence. Ibid.

Under the Revised Statutes of Wyoming, ed. of 1887, title 2, chapter 2, section 93, an assignment for the benefit of creditors is void against any creditor of the assignor, not assenting thereto, in cases of preference, coercion to release, or compromise, false or fraudulent claim, reservation or interest to the debtor, or other matters therein specified.

III. Extent of presumption.

Although a deed be made for a party's benefit, his assent will be presumed, still such presumption is not absolute or conclusive, the law not forcing a party into a contract against his will; he must make his election. Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583.

When its validity rests upon a presumed fact, it is but fair that the presumption of assent should extend to the whole transaction, otherwise by legal presumption a fraud might be aided by its perpetration. Baldwin v. Peet, 22 Tex. 708, 75 Am. Dec. 806; Green v. Banks, 24 Tex. 508.

It should extend to notice of the facts and circumstances under which it was made as well as to the terms of the deed. Green v. Banks, supra.

The presumption that a party will accept a deed because it is beneficial to him, it is said, will never be carried so far as to consider him as having accepted it. Com. v. Jackson, 10 Bush. 429; Tuttle v. Turner, 26 Tex. 778; Bell v. Farmers' Bank of Kentucky, 11 Bush. 84.

The doctrine of presumed assent and acceptance of a trust, made for the benefit of creditors, is not sufficient where there is a contest as to the priority of liens. Mills v. Haines, 8 Head, 582.

Where, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the latter took no action for eight years when the trust was revoked, after which the creditors took no action for nearly three years, it was held there was no presumption of assent. Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 583.

In Tennant v. Stoney, 1 Rich. Eq. 222, 44 Am. Dec. 213, it was held that it was not necessary for the creditors, intended to be secured by the deed of trust, to be made parties to or to assent to the execution of the instrument, and that such creditors, so long as they have done no act inconsistent with the deed, might accept of its conditions.

IV. Rebuttal of presumption.

a. In general.

The assent of creditors to an assignment in trust for their benefit is presumed, where the interest would dictate such assent, but this presumption is repelled whenever the conditions imposed by the debtor are not beneficial, or he is delayed in the collection of his debt, his security is impaired, or he is required to do or omit anything whatever. Mauldin v. Armistead, 14 Ala. 702; Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. 262; Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 560.

There can be no presumption of assent where the assignment contains stipulations prejudicial to the creditors. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co., 25 N. H. 9.

In the case of a fraudulent intent unknown to the trustee, the assent of the creditors will not be presumed. Baldwin v. Peet, 22 Tex. 708, 75 Am. Dec. 806; Townsend v. Harwell, 18 Ala. 301.

No assent ought to be presumed to an assignment which, in effect, gives license to the assignee to suffer the property to be wasted by neglect. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co., supra; Monell v. Monell, 5 Johns. Ch. 233, 1 L. ed. 1084.

Nor where the trustee is grossly disqualified by his character or situation from properly discharging the trust. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co., supra.

There may be a repudiation or rejection of the deed, which may be by some unequivocal act which will operate as an estoppel against further claims under the deed. Farquharson v. McDonald, 3 Henk. 404.

Where the assent of the creditors is not to be presumed, the principals established in Leeds v. Sayward, 6 N. H. 85, must be applied and a dissenting creditor will be entitled to recover by the trustee process, any surplus remaining after the debts of the assenting creditors have been discharged.

In Todd v. Bucknam, 11 Me. 41, the deed contained a provision that every creditor coming in under it, should give six months credit for the balance of his demand, after deducting the amount received out of the trust fund, calculating creditors, but this is by force of the statute. Such was the ruling in Shattuck v. Freeman, 1 Met. 13, and of the correctness of that ruling there can be no doubt. There are decisions, on assignments not made under the statute, holding that the assent of creditors to a general assignment, for the equal benefit of all creditors, which does not require releases, or necessarily delay any of the creditors for an unreasonable time, will be presumed, unless the contrary be shown; and decisions may be found holding that the same presumption will be indulged when the assignment is for the benefit of a part, only, of the assignor's creditors. Such decisions, however, cannot be looked to as authority for the proposition that assent of creditors is not necessary; for they carry the implication that it is, and the six months from the time when the trustee should have executed the trust, under the penalty of forfeiting such balance, by instituting process for recovery in the time, the court held that such terms were so manifestly in dereliction of the creditor's rights, as not to justify the presumption of assent.

The presumption is not sufficient in the case of a contest between creditors. Mills v. Haines, 8 Head, 533.

b. Conditions imposing a release.

An assignment is presumed to be accepted by the preferred creditors as for their benefit, and will be supported by the consideration of their debts to the extent of the same, unless by its terms it obliges them, in order to take any benefit under it, to release the assignor. Sadlier v. Fallon, 4 R. I. 490.

In such cases the presumption of assent does not arise for the reason that a question of discretion is involved. McCain v. Pickens, 33 Ark. 399, 405.

In Miller v. Conklin, 17 Ga. 430, 68 Am. Dec. 245, where the deed was for the use and benefit of such creditors, as should file their claims with the assignee and release the debtor within ninety days, the assignment was held invalid as against non-assenting creditors.

So in McBride v. Bohanan, 50 Ga. 527, where the deed stipulated for a benefit to the assignor by way of extinguishment of the debts, it was held that if the creditors consented they would be bound thereby, but their assent must be shown, otherwise they would not be bound.

And in Swearingen v. Slicer, 5 Mo. 241, where the conditions imposed a release, the court held that the assent could not be presumed, and that such a deed was of no effect until executed by the creditors.

The same principles were upheld in Drake v. Rogers, 6 Mo. 317, where the deed contained a similar provision.

An assent cannot be presumed where a condition is affixed to a deed (Hurd v. Silsby, 10 N. H. 108), where the deed provided a distribution to be made among those who would become parties and release their demands, the statute under which the assignment was made providing that no conditions should be annexed.

If the creditors are to have the benefit of the assignment, only upon condition that they discharge their debt, their assent may not be presumed, as it would involve a question of discretion upon which they might differ in opinion. Hall v. Denison, 17 Vt. 310.

In such cases the same presumption of assent does not arise, a question of discretion being involved, and therefore in such cases there must be an express assent. Haley v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 308.

Where the terms of the assignment called for a release, it was held that until their assent was given to the condition, in the mode, and within the time pointed out by the assignment, that the assigned property was liable to attachment by foreign process in the hands of the assignor. Sadlier v. Fallon, 4 R. I. 490.

So where a release is required within a certain time, as a condition of receiving the benefit of the 24 L. R. A.

trust, the reason for presuming acceptance does not exist. Smith v. Millett, 11 R. I. 523.

Where the deed conveyed the debtor's property in trust for the benefit of such of his creditors as should within a specified time release him from all further claims, with a provision for the payment of the balance to the debtor, it was held valid. Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

c. Other conditions.

Assent will not be presumed, where the deed contains conditions unfavorable to the creditors, and the deed will be void and the trustee will hold the property as against other creditors, whether assenting or dissenting. Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421.

In Williams v. Gartrell, 4 G. Greene, 287, where the assignment was a conditional one, it was held that the code did not apply, and that the assent of the creditors could not be presumed.

Where the assignment in trust imposed a condition upon the trustee, making him responsible only for the actual moneys coming to his hands, and for his willful defaults, it was held that there could be no presumed assent, it not being proved that any of them assented. Brown v. Warren, 43 N. H. 330.

So where the deed contained a clause, changing the point of time at which the liability of the trustee should commence, and relieving him from the duty of distributing the property, and also exempted him from the use of diligence, thus opening the door for fraud, it was held that it could not therefore be presumed that the creditors assented thereto. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co., 25 N. H. 9.

Where an agreement was entered into in consideration of a promise and agreement by the debtor by which the creditors promised to give time for the payment of their debts until a trustee disposed of the property and applied the proceeds, with a condition that the debtor shall perform his part of the agreement, and the creditors named in the schedule execute the contract, and providing that the total demands of the creditors should not exceed a given sum, such agreement being signed by the plaintiff, and by the other creditors excepting one who refused to sign, it was held the agreement was binding when executed. Towne v. Rublee, 51 Vt. 62.

To an assignment conditional that the assignees should render an account to a major part of the creditors, who should sanction the assignment before it took effect, their assent is necessary to give it effect. Lawrence v. Davis, 3 McLean, 177.

Where a bank being in embarrassed circumstances, assigned to trustees with authority to sell, collect debts, and complete a certain railroad with power to borrow money for that purpose, and allow claims against the bank, the proceeds to be applied in payment of principle and interest upon the loan, the dividends were to be divided pro rata among the creditors who had filed claims after the completion of the road, the deed was held void as to creditors not assenting thereto by filing their claims. Bodley v. Goodrich, 48 U. S. 7 How. 278, 12 L. ed. 609.

So where the assignment prohibited the participation of certain creditors, unless they consented to take their share of the surplus, after paying certain preferred creditors, and discharged the debtor, indulge the presumption of assent, on the theory that men will ordinarily assent to such acts as are beneficial to them, but indulge it only in absence of proof to the contrary. In Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 215, Fed. Cas. No. 5,964, it appears to have been held that express assent of the creditor would operate "retroactively to confirm the conveyance ab initio," whereby the right of an intervening attachment creditor would be defeated, while other decisions hold to the contrary. The English rule in reference to such assignments is thus stated: "If a debtor convey property in trust for creditors to whom the conveyance is not communicated, and the creditors are not in any manner privy to the conveyance, the conveyance operates only as a power to the trustee, which is revocable by the debtor, and is the no matter whether their debts were paid or not, it was held void as against creditors not assenting thereto. Wakeman v. Grover, 4 Paige 23, 3 L. ed. 325.

d. Assignments hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors.

In Townsend v. Harwell, 18 Ala. 303, the above doctrine of presumed assent was held not to apply in the case of a deed of conveyance, made for the purpose of delaying, hindering, or defrauding creditors, such a deed being clearly and utterly void.

To such a deed there must be an actual assent on the part of the beneficiaries, otherwise the levy of an execution subsequent to the date of the assignment will prevail. Benning v. Nelson, 23 Ala. 801; First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridenour, 46 Kan. 707.

And until such actual assent is shown, any creditor may levy or attach and hold in defiance of the deed. First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridenour, supra.

The law will not imply the assent of the beneficiaries to such a deed. Ashley v. Robinson, 29 Ala. 112.

It matters not however much it may really be for the creditor's benefit, as it would put it in the power of the grantor to make valid his own fraudulent deed. First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridenour, supra.

Such a deed is but a power which is revoked by the bankruptcy of the assignor. Ashley v. Robinson, supra.

If the assent of a beneficiary to a fraudulent assignment could be presumed, the rule which makes the participation in the fraud of the beneficiary necessary to vitiate an assignment would preclude the possibility of successfully assailing it for fraud, where it has been made without the knowledge of the beneficiaries, and in their absence. Ibid.

To an assignment in trust made with a fraudulent intent unknown to the trustee, the assent of the creditors will not be presumed. Green v. Banks, 24 Tex. 508.

An assignment which reserves the surplus to the debtor is constructively fraudulent, and will not be upheld against an attaching non-assenting creditor. McReynolds v. Dedman, 47 Ark. 348.

e. Assignment direct to creditors.

When the assignment is made to a trustee, the title of the estate passes to him and the assent of the creditors will be presumed, when the assignment is made without condition, it being for their benefit; otherwise when the assignment is made directly to creditors when their assent is necessary. Smith v. Millett, 11 R. I. 523.

The creditor's assent must be given at the time of the assignment, upon the principle that it requires two parties to make a contract. Jones v. Dougherty, 10 Ga. 278.

Their assent is necessary to give validity in law to the deed. Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522, 1 L. ed. 323.

There must be two parties to the transaction, and however absolute the form of the assignment may be, until it is accepted it does not pass the property. Webster v. Harkness, 3 Mackey, 220, 24 L. R. A.

If the assignment is made immediately by the debtor to his creditor, with the manifest intention of both parties that the control of the debtor over the fund shall pass from him immediately, the assent of the creditor is necessary to perfect it. Ibid.

V. Express assent.

It is considered a settled law that where a deed of trust is executed for the security of creditors, and provides that the creditor shall do or omit anything whatever, the deed is revocable until the creditor assents to it. Lockwood v. Nelson, 16 Ala. 234; Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. 262; Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 590; Graham v. Lockhart, 3 Ala. 9; Evans v. Lamar, 21 Ala. 333; Lehman v. Tallahassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 597; Ashley v. Robinson, 29 Ala. 112; Lockhart v. Wyatt, 10 Ala. 231, 44 Am. Dec. 481; Shearer v. Loftin, 26 Ala. 706; Rankin v. Lodor, 21 Ala. 330; Townsend v. Harwell, 18 Ala. 303; Benning v. Nelson, 23 Ala. 801; McReynolds v. Dedman, 47 Ark. 348; McCain v. Pickens, 32 Ark. 399; Naylor v. Foodick, 4 Day, 144, 4 Am. Dec. 137; Camp v. Mayer, 47 Ga. 414; Jones v. Dougherty, 10 Ga. 273; McBride v. Bohanan, 50 Ga. 527; Miller v. Conklin, 17 Ga. 430, 68 Am. Dec. 248; Williams v. Gartrell, 4 G. Greene, 237; First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridenour, 46 Kan. 707; Oxnard v. Blake, 45 Me. 603; Aberle v. Schlichenmeir, 51 Minn. 1; Luehrmann v. St. Louis Furniture Co. 21 Mo. App. 499; Swearingen v. Slicer, 5 Mo. 241; Drake v. Rogers, 6 Mo. 317; Leeds v. Bayward, 6 N. H. 83; Derry Bank v. Davis, 44 N. H. 548; Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421; Brown v. Warren, Id. 430; Hurd v. Silsby, 10 N. H. 108; Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co. 25 N. H. 9; Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522, 1 L. ed. 323; Jackson v. Bodie, 20 Johns. 184; Smith v. Millett, 11 R. I. 523; Sadlier v. Fallon, 4 R. I. 490; Mills v. Haines, 3 Head, 332; McEwen v. Bamberger, 3 Lea, 579, 583; Dews v. Oilwill, 3 Bart. 432; Sharp v. Fly, 9 Bart. 4; Green v. Banks, 24 Tex. 508; Towne v. Rublee, 51 Vt. 63; Phippen v. Durham, 3 Gratt. 457; Bodley v. Goodrich, 48 U. S. 7 How. 273, 12 L. ed. 699; United States v. Hoyt, 1 Blatchf. 332, 334; Webster v. Harkness, 3 Mackey, 220; Lawrence v. Davis, 3 McLean, 177.

Where a man seeks to postpone the payment of his debts, by conveying property in trust, to secure or pay them, all the creditors must assent to give any validity to the deed, because that is the manifest intention of the grantor. Rankin v. Lodor, 21 Ala. 330; Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. 262.

A deed postponing a creditor in the collection of his debt, beyond the time of its maturity, is not valid as a conveyance until it is assented to by the creditor. Evans v. Lamar, 21 Ala. 333.

Until that time it is a mere power which may be revoked by the levy of an execution by the creditor, upon the property conveyed. Ibid.

In such a case the assent of the creditor will not be presumed. Ibid.

Where the assignment is voidable at the election of the creditors, it is competent to waive their objections and consent to allow the assignee to execute the trust. Aberle v. Schlichenmeir, 51 Minn.

Where the grant is not absolute, the presumption is not so strong that the grantee accepts the same as if he had given money to an agent to pay his creditors to whom no communication had been made. The deed, therefore, . . . until third persons had agreed or assented to it, or at least had it communicated to them (if, indeed, that would be sufficient), was a mere revocable transfer." Smith v. Keating, 6 C. B. 158.

The same rule is applied in Massachusetts to assignments for the benefit of creditors, which are not made in pursuance of statute; and, until the assent of the creditors be given in some manner, it is held that property in the hands of an assignee is subject to attachment by creditors of the assignor. Fall River Iron Works v. Croade, 15 Pick. 15; Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408; May v. Wannemacher, 111 Mass. 207; Swan v. Crafts, 124 Mass. 458; deed where he derives no benefit under it, but is subjected to a duty or the performance of a mere trust. Jackson v. Bodle, 20 Johns. 184.

So where the assignment, by its terms, contemplated the signature of all creditors, it was held that it was of no effect until so signed. Camp v. Mayer, 47 Ga. 414.

In such a case if one refuses to sign, the assignment fails to bind any. Ibid.

And where, by the peculiar provisions of the deed, nothing short of an express assent of a majority in interest of the parties provided for could render the deed available, it was held that assent was necessary. Shearer v. Loftin, 26 Ala. 708.

In the above case, the trustees had no power to execute the trust by a sale of the property, until directed to do so by a certain majority, or by all of the beneficiaries. Ibid.

Where the assignment was not in accordance with the provisions of the New Hampshire statute, it was held that the assent of the creditors could not be presumed. Derry Bank v. Davis, 44 N. H. 548.

A creditor may, however, bind himself by his assent to an assignment which is not within the provisions of the statute. Ibid.

Until after the creditors have accepted, by taking or claiming a benefit under the assignment, or by some distinct act manifesting an intention to do so, no lien or absolute property can be held to exist in their favor. Mills v. Haines, 3 Head. 332.

A failure to aver acceptance in a contest with unsecured creditors, after the lapse of two years from the execution of the assignment, has been held sufficient to let in the unsecured creditors, who had in the interim acquired liens by attachment. McEwen v. Bamberger, 3 Lea, 576, 588; Dews v. Oilwill, 3 Bart. 432.

In Lockhart v. Wyatt, 10 Ala. 231, 44 Am. Dec. 451, the assignment was in trust for creditors designated in the deed, with the proviso to allow the use of the property for eventual security for a certain time, when the profits were to be applied to pay specified debts. It was held that the assent of the named beneficiaries was requisite to make the deed valid as a conveyance.

Where the deed devoted the property conveyed unequivocally to the payment of three existing specified debts, without any postponement or delay in its appropriation, through the agency of trustees to the payments of the debts, it was held a voluntary assignment, discriminating in the order of payment among the creditors, executed by the grantor and the trustees, and to be regarded as a mere power not effectual as a conveyance of title, until assented to either expressly or by implication, on the part of the beneficiaries. Ashley v. Robinson, 20 Ala. 113.

Where the assignment declared and recited that the creditors assented to it, it was held that on its face and in its legal operation it was no more than an act of the assignor, who could not, by a mere declaration or recital, conclude others who did not assent, it being no more than a mere narrative by the assignor which affected him only. Lehman v. Tallapoosa Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 557.

In Naylor v. Fosdick, 4 Day, 146, 4 Am. Dec. 187, the question was whether a debtor in failing circumstances could assign his estate to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, with the assent of part of them, expressed either prior or subsequent to the assignment, which should be valid against creditors dissenting, so that such dissenting creditors could not take the estate by legal process to satisfy the debts. Several of the creditors named in the schedule had no knowledge of the assignment at the time, but they did not afterwards dissent, it was held that such assignment was void as against a dissenting creditor issuing an attachment.

In Ornard v. Blake, 45 Me. 602, it was held that a mortgage made by a debtor, for the purpose of securing his creditors without their knowledge, was inoperative until approved or assented to by the creditors, even though recorded.

Where a bill was brought to set aside an assignment for the benefit of certain creditors giving a preference, and it was contended that it was not accepted, it was held that in making such assignment the assent of at least two persons was necessary; that a debtor could not change his relation to his creditors by a voluntary assignment of his property to them, and that such an assignment not accepted, and without change of property, left a legal redress of the creditors the same as before the assignment. Lawrence v. Davis 3 McLean, 177.

Where the conveyance was made to trustees, the creditors not being parties or privies, as an indemnity to the sureties upon an official bond, it was held revocable by the assignor, with the consent of the trustees until notice of it had been communicated to the creditors, and they had affirmed it, for the reason that where a person without the privity of his creditors, and without consideration, disposes of his property as between himself and the trustees for the payment of his debts, he merely directs the mode in which his own property shall be applied for his own benefit, the creditors being only parties for the purpose of showing how the property is to be applied. United States v. Hoyt, 1 Blatchf. 333, 334.

Where a settlement was made by a corporation with creditors, at a sum not exceeding fifty per cent of their respective claims, and an arrangement was made without the knowledge of the debtor for a settlement with part of the creditors on the basis of more than fifty per cent, it was held that such settlement avoided the deed as to all non-consenting creditors, even though the corporation had no knowledge and did not consent to the arrangement. Luehrmann v. St. Louis Furniture Co. 21 Mo. App. 439.

A composition agreement is rendered void as to non-consenting creditors, by a secured preference given to any creditor, even without the debtor's knowledge. Ibid.

In Robinson v. Rapelye, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 83, a deed was executed without the knowledge or consent of even the preferred creditors, their number and the amount of their demands being wholly unspecified, and it was held that although the debtor had a right to prefer a particular creditor or class of creditors, yet the mode in which the right was attempted to be exercised must be unexceptional, and with the knowledge and consent of the creditor intended to be preferred.

In Green v. Demoss, 10 Humph. 371, where the

Pierce v. O'Brien, 129 Mass. 814, 37 Am. Rep. 360. These decisions were made before the enactment of a statute regulating general assignments in that state, or since its repeal, as will be seen from the opinions, which all hold that the assent of the creditor is necessary to their validity, and that this will not be presumed. There are other decisions holding that assent of creditors is necessary, and will not be presumed when assignment is made directly to them, and still others which hold that assent of creditors is not necessary, even though the assignment be to a trustee for their benefit.

We have no intention, in this case, to consider the different holdings, or to announce a rule applicable to questions here suggested, and growing out of assignments to trustees for benefit of creditors not made under statute; but, as vendor claimed a lien upon property for unpaid purchase money, it was said that it was difficult to state precisely what was sufficient on the part of the creditor, to make them parties, or to make them lien creditors by virtue of the assignment, and that the mere legal presumption of acceptance, because of a benefit to themselves, was not sufficient; that there must be an affirmative act, clearly expressive of their assent and intention to claim the benefits of the deed.

In Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. 262, the conveyance was made to a trustee for the purposes of securing debts past due, and others running to maturity, a date subsequent to the maturity of the latest debt being named for payment, with a proviso for the debtor to continue in possession and use the property, the profits to be applied in payment of the debts, and the court held that such deed passed no title to the trustee without the assent of the creditors, and only operated as the conveyance of a power.

In Graham v. Lockhart, 8 Ala. 1, it was held that a deed, stipulating that the debtor might continue in possession, was good if assented to by the creditors, but could not prevent non-assenting creditors from proceeding to sale of the property remaining in the debtor. Only such creditors as actually assented to such a deed are bound thereby.

Where the deed preferred creditors coming in within a certain number of days, it was held not binding upon non-assenting attaching creditors who were entitled to the surplus. Leeds v. Sayward, 6 N. H. 83.

VI. Sufficiency of assent.

The assent may be given in two ways; one by claiming the benefit of the deed of assignment, and when it is shown that the assignment is for the benefit of the creditors, and there is a competent grantee and trustee. United States v. Bank of United States, 8 Rob. (La.) 262, 412.

An assignment for the benefit of preferred creditors is valid even though their assent is not given at the time, provided they subsequently assent in terms, or by receiving the benefit conferred thereby. Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 78, 6 L. ed. 423.

So they may make themselves parties by filing a bill, and by claiming or receiving a benefit under it. Sharp v. Fly, 9 Baxt. 4; United States v. Hoyt, 1 Blatchf. 332, 334; Breedlove v. Stump, 3 Yerg. 237.

By so doing he waives his right to deny its validity, and elects to surrender any lien he has upon the property and to look to the proceeds of sale instead. Horsely v. Chew, 65 Md. 555; Lanahan v. Latrobe, 7 Md. 268. Farmers Bank of Maryland v. Thomas, 37 Md. 258, 46 Md. 43, to the same effect.

Creditors may become parties in other ways than by actually signing the instrument, as by coming in under it for the purpose of obtaining a dividend. Wallace v. Cumming, 27 La. Ann. 631.

If the assignment is made without the knowledge of the creditors, they may affirm it when it comes to their knowledge, and will be presumed to do so in the absence of proof to the contrary. Brevard v. Neely, 2 Speed, 164.

In Valentine v. Decker, 43 Mo. 583, where the assignment was in trust for creditors, it was held 24 L. R. A.

that it was not necessary that an express assent should be given on the part of the creditors to enable them to take under it.

An instrument, such as a deed of assignment, may become operative as a conveyance in favor of any or more of the creditors, who may assent to it, and the assent of all of the beneficiaries is not necessary to make it operative as a conveyance. Ashley v. Robinson, 29 Ala. 112.

But a deed assented to by some of the creditors verbally, was held void as against attaching creditors, where the trustee only gave his note as security. Quincy v. Hall, 1 Pick. 357, 11 Am. Dec. 138.

The assent of one creditor vests the whole legal title in the trustee, and such a deed is good as against attaching creditors. Rankin v. Lodor, 21 Ala. 8-9.

Where the claim was verified and filed within the required time, without objections by the assignee, it appearing from the record that the claim still remained with him, although it had been on the file fifteen months, and had been ranked among other claims upon which dividends were to be paid, the court held that all the circumstances put it beyond the power of the creditor, to recall his previous action and take advantage of the want of a preliminary step on his part, which it was his duty to take, but which had been waived by the other party, and that there was sufficient evidence of acceptance. Sanborn v. Norton, 59 Tex. 308.

In Windham v. Patty, 62 Tex. 490, the deed contemplated three parties, the maker, the assignee and parties of the third part who were described as "the several persons, creditors of the parties of the first part, who have executed, or shall hereafter execute or accede to these presents," the closing sentence of the deed being as follows: "And the parties of the third part, by their signatures hereto, express their consent to this arrangement, and accept the provisions for them made herein." The deed had no signatures except those of the maker and the assignee, and there was no record evidence of the creditors having signified their acceptance, and the court held that the creditors would not be limited to the method of expressing their assent which was suggested by the deed.

Where the plaintiff sued the debtor who had previously called his creditors together, and with their assent assigned his property to a trustee upon a note and account, the estate having been distributed pro rata among the creditors, but such assignment was not signed by the plaintiffs, the court held that the plaintiffs being informed of the terms and conditions of the deed and accepting their pro rata without reservation, thereby made themselves parties to the agreement. Wallace v. Cumming, 27 La. Ann. 631.

Where the assignment contained no provision that the creditors should assent or sign, before the property passed into the assignee's hands, and was not properly a tripartite deed, but simply between the debtor and the assignee, properly made and sworn to under the New Hampshire statute without conditions attached, and was for the benefit of all the creditors, and the assignee accepted the

it has been sometimes thought that they bear a close analogy to mortgages with power of sale, it may not be improper to ascertain on what ground rests the proposition that assent of creditors is not necessary to give validity to an assignment to a trustee for their benefit, even as against attaching creditors. The cases which hold that a creditor will be presumed to assent to such an assignment as is manifestly for his benefit only assert a rule of evidence, for they leave the presumption open to rebuttal, and thus concede necessity for contract between the assignor and creditor. The decisions which hold assent of the creditor essential, and refuse to presume it, establish a different rule of evidence; but they also emphasize the necessity for contract between assignor and creditor, as do those decisions which hold as-trust which was unconditional and unexceptional, it was held that the sentence at the end of the deed, "the creditors whose names are subscribed, agree to said assignment," were mere surplusage and superfluous and not prejudicial to the rights of the creditors who knew nothing of any formal assent being necessary and that the assignment was valid. Fellows v. Greenleaf, 48 N. H. 421.

Where the debtor made an assignment in trust, the deed being acknowledged and registered, the trust being accepted two days thereafter, and the deed was attacked as fraudulent by a creditor claiming a prior lien and alleging no acceptance of the benefits by the creditors, it was held that the acceptance of the trustee before the commencement of the suit operated in favor of the secured creditors, who claimed the benefit within a reasonable time, and that the presumption of acceptance would be equally efficacious against third persons, if supplemented by an actual acceptance within a reasonable time, or even without a formal acceptance in the absence of a possible repudiation of the instrument. Nailer v. Young, 7 Lea, 736.

VII. Time of assent.

In Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 78, 6 L. ed. 422, an assignment for the benefit of preferred creditors was held valid, their assent not being given at the time of the execution, provided they subsequently assent in terms, or by receiving the benefits thereunder.

If the assignment is made for the benefit of those who within a given time signify their assent, the share of any creditor will not be liable to attachment as the property of the assignor before the assent is given, as in such a case the assent when given will be retroactive. Smith v. Millett, 11 R. I. 528.

In McFerran v. Davis, 70 Ga. 661, there was no provision in the deed that it was to take effect when the creditors accepted its terms, and it was stated that a general assignment, bona fide made by a debtor, and assented to by the assignee was a valid conveyance founded upon a valuable consideration, and good against creditors proceeding adversely to it unless all the creditors for whose benefit it was made, repudiated it, and that where the creditors are not required to be made parties to the deed, they may take the benefit by notice to the trustee within the time named within the deed, or if none be named, within a reasonable time before the distribution of the property.

Unless the creditor disclaims the benefits conferred thereby within a reasonable time after the deed came to his knowledge, the deed is valid. Major v. Hill, 18 Mo. 247.

Even as against third parties, upon acceptance within a reasonable time. McEwen v. Bamberger, 3 Lea, 576, 583.

Where the assignment was made in trust for the payment of preferred creditors, with a proviso for the distribution of the balance of the estate among such creditors, as should assent within one year, and for the release of the debtor, a creditor who had no notice until after the expiration of such period, and applied as soon as he was acquainted of the assignment, was held to have an equitable right, he having assented as soon as he had notice. 24 L. R. A.

De Caters v. De Chaumont, 2 Paige, 490, 2 L. ed. 1001.

In Smith v. Millett, 11 R. I. 528, it was held that an assignor had no power to revoke an assignment for the benefit of creditors, giving a certain time within which the creditors were to accept, before such time had expired.

In Owen v. Ramsdell, 38 Ohio St. 439, decided under the 6th section of the Act, regulating the mode of administering assignments in trust for creditors, which required a creditor to present his claim to the assignee within a specified time after notice of the assignment, it was held that such provision was no bar to the creditor's claim presented after the period had expired, and that he had a right to come in at any time before the trust was wound up, so long as the trustee had funds in hand.

In Coe v. Hutton, 1 Serg. & R. 368, where a release was executed three months after the date of the assignment, which was executed in trust for creditors who should sign it within such period of three months, it was held such creditor was bound, even though he could take nothing under it.

In Gale v. Mensing, 20 Mo. 461, 64 Am. Dec. 197, it was held that the deed of trust for the benefit of creditors was not void as a mere matter of law, by reason of the omission of the creditors to sign it, as they were required to do before they could take the benefits thereof.

Where the benefit of an assignment in trust for creditors was not accepted, or even known to the creditor for two years after its execution and attachment by other creditors, the court held the claim of the creditors thereunder void as against the attaching creditors. Dewa v. Olwill, 3 Raxt. 432.

In Wheeler v. Sumner, 4 Mason, 133, it was contended that the assignment was void because the preferred creditors were not parties nor assenting to it at the time of its execution. The court held it was not necessary to the validity of the assignment, that the creditors should be technically parties to it, nor that their assent should in any manner be given to it at the time of its execution, that it was sufficient if they assented before the property was attached by other creditors.

Where a deed of assignment was for the benefit of creditors executing the same within a specified period, or such further period as might be allowed by the trustees "in and by writing," which was to be indorsed upon the assignment, it was held that the words "and writing" did not mean only one extension of time. National Union Bank of Boston v. Copeland, 141 Mass. 237.

VIII. Effect of assent.

a. In general.

When a debtor voluntarily assigns property for the security and benefit of creditors, if the creditors choose to accept the assignment, they must abide by its terms or provisions; they must take it as an entirety, and cannot take in part or repudiate in part; they must either reject or accept it as a whole. Hatchett v. Blanton, 72 Ala. 433.

They must either accept or reject it in toto. Frierson v. Branch, 30 Ark. 453.

Creditors who assent and affirm an assignment sent of the creditors necessary, and refuse to presume it from the fact that a beneficial assignment is made directly to them. Under these classes of decisions, all the essentials of contract must exist between an assignor and a creditor, which involves, not only the agreement of parties, express or to be implied from conduct, but also the existence of sufficient consideration. All these classes of decisions negative the sufficiency of the assent of the assignee, or even his actual acceptance of the trust, to bind the creditor. If the same rule could be applied to the mortgage in question which, under the decisions referred to, may be applied to assignments for benefit of creditors, then the rule applied by the court of civil appeals and by the trial court cannot be sustained; for both courts hold that assent of with knowledge of the facts cannot afterwards assail it. Aberle v. Schlichenmeir, 51 Minn. 1.

By accepting such a deed the creditors tie their hands, and after an express disclaimer of such a deed, a creditor could not accept it without informing the other creditors in time to enable them to accept within a time specified in the deed. Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 487.

And having elected to stand by the deed, he cannot subsequently contest its provisions on the ground of fraud. Frierson v. Branch, 30 Ark. 453.

Unless the deed contemplates the assent of all the creditors intended to be provided for, the assent of a less number will, as it respects themselves, be sufficient to validate it pro tanto. Mauldin v. Armistead, 14 Ala. 702; Elmes v. Sutherland, 7 Ala. 282; Hodge v. Wyatt, 10 Ala. 271; Robinson v. Rapelye, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 86; Ashurst v. Martin, 9 Port. (Ala.) 568.

Where an assignment was made to a trustee for the benefit of the creditors signing the same within a certain time and granting a release, it was held good in favor of creditors accepting within the time, and in the absence of deceit operated as a transfer for their use. Lippincott v. Barker, 3 Binn. 174, 4 Am. Dec. 433.

In Elling v. Kirkpatrick, 6 Mont. 119, where a preferred creditor consented in writing to the assignment which was made in trust, and subsequently sought to attach the debtor's property, it was held that inasmuch as he did not attack the assignment upon the ground of fraud, and was certain to receive his proportion of the property assigned, which was the whole property of the debtor, which statement such creditor did not question, he was prohibited from applying for and procuring an attachment.

Where the intention was that the deed was to operate as to those who should execute it in its then present condition, and be binding upon them, although it was understood that other creditors named were also to execute it, it was held that the instrument was effectual and operative, and its provisions binding upon such as executed it. Moore v. Hinnant, 89 N. C. 455, where the deed authorized the trustee to divide the property pro rata "amongst the said subscribing creditors, parties of the third part," the deed only being signed by the assignor and trustee.

Where a deed of assignment to a trustee, for the benefit of all the creditors, was set up against an execution issued by a creditor who had not assented to it, it was held, the deed not being recorded, that it was not binding upon such creditor, even though he might have verbally assented thereto. Paul v. Logansport Nat. Bank, 60 Ind. 199.

Where it was objected that the assignment was fraudulent, because the creditors were not originally parties thereto, the court held the contention could not prevail, it being sufficient to uphold the assignment that the creditors assenting thereto before attachment, and that a subsequent assent notified to the assignees, gave the creditors not only an equitable but a legal title to their proportion of the trust deed. Brown v. Minturn, 2 Gall. 557.

Upon the question whether or not in point of law such an assent was necessary to uphold the 24 L. R. A.

assignment, supposing it good in other respects, no opinion was given. Ibid.

In the case of an express stipulation with the assignee, for a pro rata distribution of the estate, the creditor will not be permitted to subsequently dispute the assignment. Aberle v. Schlichenmeir, 51 Minn. 1.

Before the creditors have elected to take under the deed, the assignee is rather a trustee for the debtor than for them; when they have accepted the assignment by claiming or taking a benefit under it, he is their trustee and they assume the character of lien creditors. Sharp v. Fly, 9 Baxt. 4.

b. After attack.

A party attacking an assignment for fraud and endeavoring to destroy its validity, cannot afterwards come in with other creditors and present his claim for allowance and share equally with the other creditors. Epiphright v. Kauffman, 90 Mo. 25.

In Ewing v. Cook, 85 Tenn. 332, it was held that the creditors who had resisted an assignment made for their benefit were not entitled to subsequent claim thereunder.

In Ingram v. Kirkpatrick, 41 N. C. 462, 51 Am. Dec. 423, it was held that the rules of trustee and cestui que trust, were constituted by the execution of a deed of assignment in favor of a creditor assenting at the time, or in a reasonable time afterwards, and that such assent was to be presumed until the contrary was shown.

IX. Effect of assignment.

Deeds of trust are often made for the benefit of persons who are absent, and whether they are for the payment of money or for any other purpose, no expression of the assent of the persons for whose benefit they are made has ever been required as preliminary to the vesting of the legal estate in the trustees, such trust having always been executed on the idea that the deed was complete when executed by the parties to it. Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 78, 6 L. ed. 423.

If the assignment be to trustees for the use of creditors, the legal estate passes and vests in the trustees, and chancery will compel the execution of the trust for the creditors benefit, even though they do not assent at the time and immediately become parties to the conveyance, no expression of assent on the parties of the cestui que trust ever having been required as a preliminary to the vesting of the estate in the trustee, and in such cases the assent of the creditors to an assignment will be presumed unless their dissent be expressed. Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill & J. 490; Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522, 1 L. ed. 223; Wallis v. Beauchamp, 15 Tex. 308; Montgomery v. Culton, 18 Tex. 736, 747.

In Brown v. Burrell, 1 Root, 252, a general assignment was held not conclusive against creditors dissenting to it.

The effect of an ordinary transfer of property from one person to another, with an agreement on the part of the one who receives such, as contained in the case of Wallis v. Beauchamp, supra, was upheld in McMahan v. Harbert, 35 Tex. 460, the court approving of the principles therein laid down.

In Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 124, 51 Am. Rep. 446.

creditors was not necessary, and that acceptance by the trustee was sufficient to bind creditors, although the beneficiaries named in the mortgage were ignorant of its existence at the time attachment was levied. The American decisions holding that assent of creditors is not necessary to bind them by an assignment made for their benefit, and that the acceptance of the trustee is sufficient, are not numerous, although many are cited by elementary writers as sustaining that proposition. Among those sometimes cited for that purpose are the following: Brashear v. West, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 613, 8 L. ed. 803; Tompkins v. Wheeler, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 118, 10 L. ed. 909; Marbury v. Brooks, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 558, 5 L. ed. 522; Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 78, 6 L. ed. 428.

But, in view of the facts and questions init was held that notice to the cestui que trust of a trust created for his benefit was not necessary, the interest sufficiently passing as between the grantor and the trustee.

The legal estate passing and vesting in the trustee who are compellable, in equity, to execute the trust, even though the creditors be not at the time assenting and parties to the conveyance, their assent not being necessary to legalize and give efficacy to the assignment. Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill & J. 480, 482.

An assignment for creditors once accepted by the assignee, is vested for the benefit of the creditors and a subsequent renunciation will not affect its validity. Clapp v. Shirk, 13 Pa. 589.

The doctrine follows from the common-law rule, that it is not necessary to the creation of a trust by deed in favor of any persons, that the cestui que trust should either be a party or assent to it. Valentine v. Decker, 48 Mo. 583.

Such a deed may be valid, although the creditors have not been consulted beforehand, and will vest the estate in the trustee with or without assent. Dance v. Seaman, 11 Gratt. 778, 781.

A deed of assignment is in no sense a contract between the debtor and his creditors, and does not depend for its validity in law upon their assent; such a deed is a means or mode permitted by statute for the distribution of the debtor's estate among his creditors, and if executed without fraud in fact, or in law, and the prescription of the acts complied with, it is effectual, even though opposed by a creditor. Mills v. Parkhurst, 126 N. Y. 89.

Where an assignment is fair and valid the legal estate passes to the assignee without any express assent by the creditors, so that neither a subsequent judgment or lien creditor can acquire any interest in the property assigned, neither can he attack the assignment except by fraud. Valentine v. Decker, supra.

The filing and recording of the deed is necessary in order to pass the property to the trustee under the Indiana laws. Paul v. Logansport Nat. Bank, 60 Ind. 199; Eden v. Everson, 65 Ind. 118.

It is competent for any one to dissent, but such dissent will not destroy the assignment, and if a dissenting creditor summons the trustee, he can only take such surplus as may remain after paying those who did not dissent. Spinney v. Portsmouth Hosiery Co. 25 N. H. 9; Eppright v. Kauffman, 90 Mo. 25; Fellows v. Greenleaf, 43 N. H. 421; Sharp v. Fry, 9 Bart. 4.

It must be affirmed, however, before a revocation is made by the debtor. Galt v. Dibreil, 10 Yerg. 184; Robertson v. Sublett, 6 Humph. 818; Wallis v. Beauchamp, 15 Tex. 308.

If the creditors, for whose benefit the deed of trust is made, are not privy thereto, and its existence has not been made known to them, the deed operates merely as a power to the trustee which may be revoked by the assignor. Mills v. Haines, 3 Head, 332; Isaham v. Bolaware, L. & W. R. Co. 11 N. J. Eq. 227.

Where a bill in equity was filed for the purpose of compelling a trustee under a deed of assignment of personal estate for distribution among creditors of the assignor, it was held that the creditors had a lien upon the fund in the hands of the 24 L. R. A.

trustee, though not parties to the deed, and were entitled to relief in equity, to compel the performance of the trust. Weir v. Tannehill, 2 Yerg. 57.

The creditors, however, do not merely by force of the execution of the deed, acquire a lien, or become vested with any absolute rights, it being at their option either to accept or repudiate the trust, to make themselves parties, or to refuse to do so. Mills v. Haines, 3 Head, 333.

The lien, however, of a vendor for unpaid purchase money has been held to prevail against a voluntary assignment in trust, for the benefit of antecedent creditors, the bill being filed before anything had been done in execution of the trust and before it was executed, the court holding that the creditors had, at their election, either to accept or repudiate the assignment. Brown v. Vanler, 7 Humph. 239.

In Hudson v. Eisenmayer Sr., Mill & Elevator Co., 79 Tex. 407, it was said that where the property was assigned for the benefit of creditors, it ceased to be the subject of seizure and sale, as it ceased to be the property of the debtor, and that the creditors might then enforce such rights as they might have through the assignment, or in the manner prescribed by the statute.

Where a debtor executed mortgages in favor of his creditors without their knowledge, and delivered them to an attorney for the use of the creditors, and the same were filed and the creditors notified, it was held that an attachment issued by other creditors before notice, and assent by such mortgages prevailed as against the mortgages. Weich v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243.

An instrument in these words, "Know all men by these presents: That I [the grantor], bargain, sell, and convey the merchandise in my two houses, situated in . . . to the undersigned parties, to satisfy a part of all or certain claims held by them against me, for the following amounts,"—setting out the names and amounts to the creditors, the instrument being signed by the debtor but not by the creditors, was held not to exist, as against attaching creditors even though the creditors assented thereto. Wallis v. Taylor, 67 Tex. 431.

In the above case it did not appear that there was any prior undertaking, that a mortgage should be executed until after the attachment was levied, and there was no rule of law by which a subsequent assent could fix a lien on the attached property, which would override the lien on the attaching creditor, but that if there had been an undertaking between the debtor and his creditors, that a mortgage should be executed, it was held that the delivery of the instrument to the clerk of the court for the purpose of recording, would be a sufficient delivery. Ibid.

X. The Massachusetts doctrine.

a. Principles of.

Independently of insolvent laws or assignments for the benefit of creditors authorized by statute, voluntary assignments by a debtor in trust for the payment of debts, without other adequate consideration, are invalid as against attachment, except so far as assented to by the creditors for whose benefit they were made. Pierce v. O'Brien, 129 volved in each case, such is not the effect of these decisions. The following decisions, however, are understood to so hold: Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 529, 1 L. ed. 925; Halsey v. Fastbanks, 4 Mason, 206. Fed. Cas. No. 5,964; Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill & J. 480; Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 288; Cunningham v. Freedborn, 11 Wend. 250.

The grounds on which these decisions are based are that by such conveyances the legal title passes to and vests in the assignee or trustee, and that a court of chancery will compel the execution of the trust for benefit of creditors, although they may not have assented to the conveyance. There can be no doubt that, under such conveyance, title vests in the trustee, and that his acceptance of the trust is a sufficient consideration, as between the as-

Mass. 814, 87 Am. Rep. 360; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 1.

In Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 389, it is stated that in consequence of the Massachusetts' statutes authorizing attachments and the want of chancery jurisdiction in that state, that a debtor could not convey his estate in trust for his creditors generally, without their consent given to such conveyance, but that to creditors consenting, and parties to the conveyance, he might grant all his estate for the payment of their debts, or so secure them, exercising only his right of preference and not defrauding others.

As the debtor may convey property to one or more of his creditors in satisfaction of their debts, so he may convey to a third person, appointed by such creditors and for their use, or appointed in the first instance by the debtor, if the creditor afterwards assents to and ratifies such assignment. Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408.

Such assignment, not assented to by the creditor, is void by the common law. Edwards v. Mitchell, 1 Gray, 239; Grocer's Bank v. Simmons, 13 Gray, 440.

If assented to by the creditors, they are good at common law, as against attachment, to the extent of the amount due the assenting creditors, unless the assignment is made upon a condition to take effect only with the assent of all, or of a prescribed number. May v. Wannemacher, 111 Mass. 303.

In cases of assignments by a tripartite instrument, it is generally necessary that creditors should execute it, such being the intention of the instrument. Ibid.

The validity of such assignment must depend upon the assent of the creditors, nothing being paid by the assignee, the consideration as to them must consist in their covenants to execute the trusts. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11.

Independently of the Laws of 1836, such assignments without other adequate consideration, are invalid as against attachment, except so far as assented to by the creditors for whose benefit they are made. May v. Wannemacher, supra.

A trust created for the benefit of another, of which he has no knowledge, may, however, be affirmed and enforced by him. Ward v. Lewis, 4 Pick. 518.

Creditors are not obliged to become parties, nor is their assent to be presumed. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, supra.

In the case of an assignment made by the debtor and trustees, not intended for the signature of the creditor, giving no preference and containing no release, the assent of the creditors was not presumed. Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408.

They may prefer to resort to attachments, and the option is to be exercised by them and to be evidenced by some overt act on their part. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, supra.

There must be some affirmative act, such as presenting claims, or becoming parties to the written assignment. Pierce v. O'Brien, 129 Mass. 814, 87 Am. Rep. 360.

The creditor must be a party, or assenting to the conveyance. If not, nothing will pass to him from 24 L. R. A.

the debtor, and the debtor's estate, intended to be conveyed, will remain liable to attachment by any other creditor. Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 1.

Assignments in trust for the benefit of creditors, the only consideration for which is the acceptance of the trust, are of no effect against creditors who do not assent to them, and who by trustee process or otherwise attached the property described in the instrument of assignment. Swan v. Crafts, 124 Mass. 453; Russell v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 408; Edwards v. Mitchell, 1 Gray, 239; Wyles v. Beale, 1 Gray, 233; Battles v. Fobes, 21 Pick. 239; Dedham Bank v. Richards, 2 Met. 105; Stanfield v. Simmons, 12 Gray, 442.

Such conveyance must be accepted in payment or satisfaction by the creditors and sureties. Russell v. Woodward, supra.

If they decline or omit to join in the assignment, there are no cestui que trust, and so no trusts to be executed, and the consideration fails. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11.

A creditor not being bound, may proceed by way of attachment, for being no party to the conveyance in trust, he can have no remedy upon it at law, and there is no equitable jurisdiction to which he may apply. Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 389.

And there is no distinction between a conveyance to creditors with their assent, whether it be by way of pledge, or in trust for their use. Ibid.

The assent will not be presumed upon the ground of the apparent benefit and adoption, an affirmative acquisition must be shown. May v. Wannemacher, 111 Mass. 303; Russell v. Woodward, supra.

When execution is not required by the form of the instrument, it is only necessary that creditors should give assent to its provisions, sufficient to recognize and frame the acceptance and possession of the property by the assignee, according to the terms of the assignment. May v. Wannemacher, and Russell v. Woodward, supra; Everett v. Walcott, 15 Pick. 94.

Where a verbal assent is shown to the assignment, it is sufficient, where no written assent is called for. Jones v. Tilton, 189 Mass. 418.

If creditors present their claims for allowance, for the purpose of distribution according to the terms of the deed, they thereby assent. May v. Wannemacher, supra.

The mere fact of a debtor informing some of his preferred creditors of his intention to make an assignment, showing them a sketch of the same, was held not to make them parties to it, nor to be evidence of their assent to its provisions. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11.

The evidence of assent to the provision of an assignment is equally cogent, in cases where the deed is of two parties, as it is where it was in three parties. Everett v. Walcott, supra.

But if the creditors elect to become parties, and their debts amount to as much as the assigned property, the consideration will be complete and the conveyance effectual, even as against other creditors, and the whole property will vest in the assignee. Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, supra.

Where an assignment was made by an insolvent debtor in trust for the payment of debts, it apsignor and himself, to support it; and it has never been held necessary, to give validity to such a conveyance and to secure right to creditors, that they should actually be parties to it, or assent to it, at the time of its execution; but, can it be said that creditors become entitled to take benefit under it, in the absence of contract, express or to be implied from conduct, to be bound by it? All courts hold that they may repudiate it, and, so long as the right to do this exists, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion reached by the English courts,—that the conveyance is revocable until assented to by creditors. In considering such a question, the inquiry necessarily arises, What is it that binds assignor, trustee, and creditors? To this there can be but one answer. They are bound by contract, or not at all. Assent of appeared that the debtor had propounded the scheme to one of his creditors, and the assignment practically carried out such scheme, the court held that such creditor could not be taken to have assented, even though preferred, and that an attachment by another creditor prevailed. Ibid.

If the debts of the creditors who assent to the assignment, are of less amount than the property assigned, they will constitute a good consideration pro tanto. Ibid.

In Shattuck v. Freeman, 1 Met. 10, it was contended that nothing passed by the assignment, because no creditor had become a party thereto, by expressing formally his assent, but it was held that under the Statute of 1836, chapter 223, such express assent was not necessary, the act having modified the common-law rule which made such formal assent necessary to the validity of the assignment, and rendered it invalid against attaching creditors, until one or more of the creditors had assented thereto.

The first section of the statute referred to, authorizes an assignment of property to the debtor's creditors, or to an assignee for the use of the creditors, and provides that it shall be valid and effectual against any attachment thereafter made. Shattuck v. Freeman, supra.

The fourth section of the Act also furthers the view above taken, providing that any creditors may become a party to the assignment, provided they apply before the final dividend is declared, but so as not to disturb any dividend already declared. Ibid.

In construing the above section, the court in Shattuck v. Freeman, supra, held that it contained no provision, making the assent of any creditor a prerequisite to the vesting of the property in the assignee, and that it was doubtless so framed, for the purpose of avoiding the evils arising from the old common-law doctrine. Ibid.

Where the plaintiff claimed under a mortgage made by a debtor without the plaintiff's knowledge, and which had not been ratified before the debtor assigned his property, under the Insolvent Laws of 1838, it was held that no ratification after such assignment could be of any avail as against the assignees. Dole v. Bodman, 3 Met. 139.

In National Mechanics & Traders Bank of Portsmouth v. Eagle Sugar Refinery, 100 Mass. 38, the question involved was, the validity of an assignment of property by a debtor to trustees for distribution among creditors, who had become parties to the instrument, where the claims exceeded the amount of the property, and it was held that since the repeal of the Statute of 1838 such a deed could not be avoided by a creditor for his individual benefit without proof of fraud at common law, even though he had not assented.

An assignment of bank funds, the proceeds of the sale of goods consigned to the assignor for sale upon commission, the acceptance of the trust being the only consideration, the court held void as to non-assenting creditors. Swan v. Crafts, 124 Mass. 453.

Where the assignment was in trust for such creditors as should, within four months from the date of the assignment, execute a full release of all their demands, the surplus to be distributed pro rata among the other creditors, and the remainder, if any, to be paid over to the debtor, the court held there was only one party to such deed, namely the assignor, the persons named being his agents, until all creditors signed the instrument. Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 146, 7 Am. Dec 132.

In Marston v. Coburn, 17 Mass. 454, the plaintiff claimed, as a trustee for creditors, by virtue of an assignment and as against an attachment upon the debtor's property, made by the defendant after the date of such assignment. The assignment was signed by the assignor and trustees and by some of the creditors, and it was contended that it was incomplete and fraudulent, and void against creditors not parties thereto, and the court held such attachment prevailed over the title of the trustee under the deed.

The court's opinion in the above case was based upon the fact that the manifest intention was that the deed should not stand good unless signed by the creditors, that it was void, and that even if there had been an express agreement that it should be good and absolute without the creditor's assent, yet it was still fraudulent and void, being without consideration. Marston v. Coburn, 17 Mass. 454.

In the case of an assignment made to a creditor, in trust for himself and the other creditors who should come in under the deed, it was held that his signature to the deed must be considered as having a double effect, both as trustee and as creditor, and that therefore the deed was formally good and there was no legal necessity, the transaction being bona fide, why such creditor should lose his security because the other creditors refused to come into the measure. Hastings v. Baldwin, 17 Mass. 552.

Where the indenture, under which the plaintiff claimed, was a tripartite between the debtor and such other creditors as should sign and seal the same, and was executed by the debtor, it was held a valid assignment, even though not executed by any other creditor, the property assigned not exceeding in value the debt of the creditor to whom the assignment was made. Ibid.

Where the indenture was of two parties and executed by two parties only, no creditors executing it professedly as such, although one of the assignees was a creditor, it was held that his signature, although sufficient to make him a party in the character of a creditor, had no effect where the assigned property was much greater than was needed to pay the whole of his debt. Full River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11.

An assignment to trustees for the benefit of creditors, in consideration of certain covenants on the part of the creditors and the trustees, intended to be signed by all creditors whose debts were over or above a certain amount, and securing release from the same, and providing that the execution of the deed by the creditors should perfect it and containing covenants by the trustees to execute the trust, and further, a ratification by the creditors and an agreement to accept the dividends in full satisfaction and discharge, to which end the deed was to be full evidence, the unsecured creditors being paid pro rata, it was held that such deed parties to be bound by a contract is essential to its existence, and it is clear that no assent of assignor or assignee, or of both, can bind creditors, unless authority to act for them exists. Such a contract is valid between assignor and assignee, when they assent to it, and because they assent to it; and to hold creditors bound when they have not thus incurred obligation is to disregard the fundamental principles on which such obligation rests. One reason for holding assent of creditors necessary, and for refusing to presume this when property is assigned directly to them, is because, in such case, the burden of executing the trust is imposed upon them, which cannot be done without their consent, even though the instrument make provision for compensating them. This is not the only reason, however; for such assignments, in common with those made to trustees, necessarily involve, on the part of creditors, surrender of right to enforce payment of sums due them through sale of the debtor's property under legal process. Sometimes this may be more advantageous and less expensive than sale through trustee under the terms of the instrument. Can a creditor be compelled to surrender such a right without his consent, even as to property conveyed to a trustee, unless the assignment be under a statute?

A general assignment may enumerate debts to be paid, and some of these may be such as could not be enforced against the debtor, or against his property, in a contest with other creditors; but, if the assent of creditors be not necessary to the validity of such a conveyance, such claims must be paid, or other creditors must refuse to take under it, and institute proceedings to set it aside, or hostile to it. That a creditor has a right to institute such proceedings would seem to be conclusive that he is not bound, unless by his own assent. If such a conveyance is binding on creditors, without only bound the creditors who were parties to it, and that they alone could recover the dividends. Hewlett v. Cutler, 137 Mass. 285.

Where a debtor and assignee executed a bipartite deed, containing provisions for the sale of the property, and for payment of the expenses of certain debts with the proviso that the balance should be divided between the other creditors ratably, there being no release or provision for the other creditors becoming parties, the court held that such assignees were bound, both as creditors and in their official capacity, and that such assignment,—the whole property being absorbed by the preferred creditors,—was valid as against subsequent attaching creditors. Everett v. Walcott, 15 Pick. 94.

b. Time of assent.

Where the terms of the assignment explicitly confined its operations to those creditors only who became parties thereto within a limited time, the cases treated the time as of the essence of the contract, in refusing the creditors the privilege of acceding to or executing the deed after such time has elapsed. National Union Bank of Boston v. Copeland, 141 Mass. 237.

Thus under an assignment made to trustees, in trust for the creditors who should execute the instrument within six months, public notice being given so that all had an opportunity of coming in it was held that a creditor, having had such notice could not afterwards become a party to the deed, or share in the distribution. Phenix Bank in Connecticut v. Sullivan, 9 Pick. 410.

The trustee is bound to permit such creditors, who applied within the time to execute the deed, and any refusal on his part is a breach of trust for which he is responsible. Pinagree v. Comstock, 18 Pick. 46.

In New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113, the principal question was, whether the plaintiff who it was contended had not assented within a reasonable time, had any interest in the trust fund in the hands of the trustee, for the benefit of creditors. The court held that, there being no sufficient evidence to show the plaintiffs had refused or waived the trust in their favor, they had a right in equity to claim the benefit of the trust and the trustees were bound to execute it and pay their demand out of the proceeds.

c. Comity.

There is no comity requiring force to be given to the laws of another state, directly in conflict with the laws of the state wherein the action is brought, to allow the acts of a debtor, resident 24 L. R. A.

in another state, in disposing of his property against his creditors in the latter state, which would not have been allowed if he had lived therein. Pierce v. O'Brien, 129 Mass. 314, 37 Am. Rep. 360; Swan v. Crafts, 124 Mass. 453; Osburn v. Adams, 18 Pick. 245; Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Croade, 15 Pick. 11.

An assignment made by a debtor himself in another state, which, if made in Massachusetts would be set aside for want of consideration, will not be sustained against an attachment by a Massachusetts creditor, although valid in the place where it is made, and in such cases the subsequent assent of the foreign creditor to the assignment, by proving claim under it, cannot defeat the title to the property acquired by a creditor in this state by reason of attachment. Pierce v. O'Brien, supra.

In Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 144, 7 Am. Dec. 132, the question was whether the assignment made by a debtor in Philadelphia was valid in Massachusetts so as to defeat an attachment of the debt in the latter state under the trustee process, and it was held void and as against the creditor in that state who proceeded after the date of the assignment, with notice to the debtor, for the recovery of his debt.

Where a bipartite deed was executed in Rhode Island and signed by the debtor and the assignee, who were citizens of that state, it was held that such deeds were not valid according to the laws of Massachusetts, for the want of assent; yet it was valid according to the laws of Rhode Island, as against a citizen of that state, and that therefore he could not avoid such deed by attachment. Daniels v. Willard, 16 Pick. 36.

The same conclusion was arrived at in Burlock v. Taylor, 16 Pick. 335, upon an assignment valid according to the laws of New York, wherein it was sought to subject property in Massachusetts to an attachment by a New York creditor.

Where the assignment was made by a bipartite deed with reference to the laws of Pennsylvania, by which such assignment was valid, upon which the creditors to an amount larger than the total assets, presented and proved claims and accepted dividends, thus signifying their adoption, the court found in the acts of the parties sufficient to constitute a legal and valid assignment, good wherever made and effectual to pass the rights of the debtors, even as to property not subject to the local laws of Pennsylvania. May v. Wannemacher, 111 Mass. 232.

XI. English decisions.

In Biron v. Mount, 24 Beav. 642, 27 L. J. Ch. 191, 4 Jur. N. S. 43, it was held that it was not necessary reference to their assent, no place is left for election, which implies power and right to assent or dissent. "When a debtor voluntarily assigns property for the security and benefit of creditors, if the creditors choose to accept the assignment, they must abide by its terms and provisions. They must take it as an entirety. They cannot accept in part, and repudiate in part. Perry, Tr. § 596; Burrill, Assignm. 8d ed. § 479. The creditor may have rights with which the assignment, so far as it confers rights upon others, is inconsistent. The assignment may derogate from, instead of extending to him, the measure of right to which he is entitled. If that be true, he must elect whether he will accept the assignment, or whether he will reject it, and stand upon the right he may have independent of it. He cannot elect to claim under the assignment the right given by it, and repudiate it so far as it passes rights to others which are inconsistent with independent, distinct rights to which he may be entitled." Hatchett v. Blanton, 73 Ala. 483; Frierson v. Branch, 80 Ark. 453; Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 641, 4 L. ed. 811.

No decision made by this court supports the proposition that assent of creditors is not necessary to the validity of assignments for their benefit. In Baldwin v. Peet, 23 Tex. 723, 75 Am. Dec. 806, it was said that "the American decisions hold, that the assent of creditors to a general assignment will be presumed, so as to give it effect, although they may know nothing of it when it is made." But there was no intimation that this presumption was other than one of fact, to be indulged in the absence of evidence to the contrary. The case of Wallis v. Beauchamp, 15 Tex. 803, involved no such question. The question in that case was whether certain property bought from Joseph Wallis by John O. Wallis was subject to a trust in the latter's hands for the payment of his vendor's debts, in consequence of an agreement made at the time of the pur-for a creditor to execute the deed, provided he acquiesced therein by some act, that the mere standing by and taking no part was not sufficient.

Where an assignment executed by a debtor to a creditor in trust for himself and other creditors, was sent to the creditor, who had no notice thereof, for signature, who received the deed the next day, and on that day an execution was delivered to the sheriff, and the creditor signified his assent in writing, it was held in an issue between such creditor and the execution creditor, the deed being honest and bona fide, that the creditor under the deed was entitled, that the deed being irrevocable the assent of the creditor was not necessary for the purpose of vesting the property in him. Signers v. Evans, 5 El. & Bl. 367, 3 C. L. R. 1209, 24 L. J. Q. B. 705, 1 Jur. N. S. 851.

In Re Baber's Trusts, L. R. 10 Eq. 554, an assignment was executed, the consideration being a covenant by the creditors not to sue for three years, and contained a proviso that creditors not executing it within six months should be excluded from its benefits, it was held that a creditor who neglected signing but acquiesced in the deed, and took no proceedings against the debtor, treated the deed as valid and was entitled to its benefits.

In Acton v. Woodgate, 3 Myl. & K. 422, where property was conveyed in trust for creditors, not parties nor privies, it was held the deed operated merely as a power to apply the property in payment of debts, and was revocable by the debtor, but the court questioned whether such a deed could be revoked, where it had been communicated to the creditors.

In Brady v. Sheil, 1 Campb. 147, an executor called a meeting of the insolvent's creditors, who agreed to a ratable distribution of the estate in consideration of which he executed a deed of assignment, it was held that a creditor could not afterwards refuse to accept such assignment and commence action against the executor.

In Garrard v. Lauderdale, 3 Sim. 1, it was held that a deed of assignment to a trustee, for the benefit of schedule creditors who did not execute, or conform to the terms of the deed, could not be enforced by the creditors. Wallwyn v. Coutts, 3 Meriv. 707, 3 Sim. 14, to the same effect.

In Forbes v. Limond, 4 DeG. M. & G. 296, 18 Jur. 83, it was held that a creditor could not be said in any sense to have acceded to the provisions of a composition deed, unless he put himself in the same situation with regard to the debtor, as if he had actually executed the deed.

But where a composition deed executed by a debtor and trustee was not signed within the specified time by the creditors, it was held that though such a deed would be void at law, yet the creditors acting under it, even though they had not signed it, could enforce it in equity. Spottiswoode v. Stockdale, Coop. Ch. 102.

In Collins v. Reece, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 675, where an assignment was executed by a debtor to a trustee, for the benefit of creditors, signing or assenting thereto within three months, the court questioned whether a creditor, not signing or assenting until after the date named, could claim under such deed.

In Watson v. Knight, 19 Beav. 890, it was held that a creditor prevented by accident from signing a composition deed, within the specified period, might obtain relief in equity, but that such relief would not be granted where he had been guilty of negligence and had set up an adverse title.

In Dunoh v. Kent, 1 Vern. 220, a deed of trust was executed by a debtor in favor of creditors, and provided for the payment of such creditors as came in within the year. It was held that it did not exclude a creditor not coming in after that time.

In the above case it was also held that a bill might be had after the time mentioned, for the purpose of compelling creditors to come in and renounce the benefits of the trust. Dunoh v. Kent, supra.

Where the assignment excluded creditors not executing it or assenting thereto in writing before a given date, or such further date, not exceeding a certain number of days as might be specified by the trustee, and the trustee advertised the extended time, the creditor, absent at the time, assented through his attorney, who subsequently received power to execute the deed and apply to the trustees for permission to do so, it was held that such creditor was entitled to come in under the deed, and that the trustee should permit the attorney to execute the instrument. Raworth v. Parker, 2 Kay. & J. 163, 25 L. J. Ch. 117.

Where a time is specified in a deed, within which a creditor must become a party in order to avail himself of its benefits, the English courts hold, time is not of the essence of the contract, and permit creditors to accede to, or execute the deed after the time limited has expired. Whitmore v. Turquand, 3 DeG. F. & J. 107, 7 Jur. N. S. 377, 30 L. J. Ch. 345, 9 Week. Rep. 483, 4 L. T. N. S. 38.

chase. The property was held to be subject to the trust, and it was held: "It may be that the trust was unknown to the creditor in this case at the time of its creation. Yet that would not deprive him of the right of its benefit. When a trust is created for the benefit of a third person, although without his knowledge, he may afterwards affirm it, and enforce the execution of it in his favor; at least if not, in the intermediate time, revoked by the person who created the trust." The case of Montgomery v. Culton, 18 Tex. 746, involved practically the same question, and it was decided the same way; and the case of McMahan v. Harbert, 85 Tex. 460, without having a case before it, approved the ruling made in Montgomery v. Culton. The great weight of American authority makes assent of some of the creditors essential to the validity of assignment for their benefit, and recognizes the rule that such assent may be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, if the instrument entitles all to share pro rata, and imposes no terms which will deprive creditors of some material right.

There is a class of trusts, however, in reference to which it is held by the English and American courts that assent of beneficiaries is not essential to the full vestiture of legal title in the trustee and equitable title in the beneficiary, and that, when so vested, it will continue, in the absence of repudiation by the beneficiary, which, in such cases, is held to operate a retrocession of the equitable right to the creator of the trust. A gift or voluntary conveyance of property in trust, when fully completed and executed, is valid, and will be enforced against all persons except creditors or bona fide purchasers, even though the beneficiary may not have been in existence at the time, or, if in existence, may not have known of or assented to the conveyance. Such has been recognized to be the law in England for more than two centuries. Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198; Siggers v. Evans, 5 El. & Bl. 880; Newton v. Askew, 11 Beav. 150; Standing v. Bowring, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 282; Patterson v. Murphy, 11 Hare, 88; Ellison v. Ellison, 6 Ves. Jr. 656; Keenich v. Manning, 1 De G. M. & G. 176.

The same rule as to such trusts is sustained by the American courts, and even by those which hold assent of creditors necessary to validity of assignments made for their benefit, and refuse to presume it. Viney v. Abbott, 109 Mass. 800; Newall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 272; Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray, 290; Sargent v. Baldwin, 60 Vt. 17; Martin v. Funk, 75 N.Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446; Garner v. German L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 266, 1 L. R. A. 256; Light v. Scott, 88 Ill. 289; Gulick v. Gulick, 89 N. J. Eq. 401.

In the case last cited, it was said: "If a voluntary trust, in which the settlor has reserved no power of revocation, is once perfectly created, and the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is once established, it will be enforced, though the settlor has destroyed the deed, or has attempted to revoke it by making a second voluntary settlement of the same property, or if the estate, by some accident, becomes re-vested in the settlor. In all these cases, the first perfectly created trust will be upheld, with all its consequences, and the settlor will be declared 24 L. R. A.

to be a trustee. Nor is notice to the cestui que trust or to the trustee, and acceptance by him, essential to the validity of a voluntary trust, if it is otherwise perfectly created. Perry, Tr. §§ 104, 105; Ishman v. DeLaware, L. & W. R. Co. 11 N. J. Eq. 227; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 881, 882." Some of the expressions in Marbury v. Brooks would be applicable to this class of trusts, but evidently were not called for in that case; for, before attachments were levied, one or more of the creditors had knowledge of the assignment, and had accepted under it, and on the faith of it the trustee had advanced money. The difference between such trusts and trusts arising from assignments to trustees for benefit of creditors is obvious and substantial. In one case the transaction is a gift, involving on the part of the donee no surrender of any existing right whatever, while in the other the creditor may, and most frequently will, be compelled to surrender rights more or less valuable, if, by force of law or his own assent, the assignment be made binding upon him. In the one case, necessity for consideration or contract between donor and donee does not exist, while in the other the trust and right to receive benefit cannot become complete without contract actually made, or to be implied from conduct. "In case of a voluntary declaration, the obvious inference is that it is made for the benefit of the persons in whom the maker of the declaration means thereby, for the first time, to create an interest in the property to which it relates. A provision for payment of the debts of the party making the declaration is wholly different in its nature. The trustee of the property of the settlor, which is directed to be applied in payment of debts, may be regarded as standing in the position of a steward or agent of the debtor whose duty is to satisfy the debts according to the directions which he may receive, and hand over the balance to his principal." Patterson v. Murphy, 11 Hare, 91. The instrument in question, however, was not an assignment for benefit of creditors, but was simply a mortgage with power to sell. Wootton v. Wheeler, 22 Tex. 838; Molane v. Paschal, 47 Tex. 866; Blackwell v. Barnett, 52 Tex. 338; Stiles v. Hill, 62 Tex. 480; Jackson v. Harby, 65 Tex. 715; Watterman v. Silberberg, 67 Tex. 108; Hudson v. Eisenmayer, Sr., Mill. & Elevator Co. 79 Tex. 407; Willis v. Thompson, 85 Tex. 801; Jones, Chatt. Mortg. 852; Jones, Mortg. 62, 1769.

By assignment, title passes to the trustee, while mortgage does not pass title, even though power to sell the mortgaged property may thereby be conferred on the mortgagee or a third person, whereby the lien given may be enforced. Any other conclusion as to the effect to be given a mortgage with power to sell would have rendered the conclusion reached in Robertson v. Paul, 16 Tex. 472, and in other cases following that, wholly inadmissible. By the exercise of a power thus conferred, title of a mortgagor may be divested and passed to a purchaser, but the person who exercises such a power, having no title himself, must be deemed, in so far, the agent of the mortgagor, although under obligation to exercise the utmost good faith and fair dealing towards creditors intended to be secured, for whom he may be deemed a trustee as to funds received from sale of mortgaged property. He is under no obligation to undertake to exercise the power, and his refusal will not invalidate the mortgage; but his acceptance of such an agency, which is his true relation to the mortgagor, cannot render unnecessary the acceptance of the mortgage by mortgagee. The existence or nonexistence of a mortgage contract must depend upon principles applicable to other contracts, and, to their existence, assent of parties is essential. Wallis v. Taylor, 67 Tex. 481; Tuttle v. Turner, 28 Tex. 773; Hubbard v. Cox, 76 Tex. 242; Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 433; Welch v. Sarlett, 13 Wis. 256; Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 104; Dole v. Rodman, 8 Met. 189; Goodell v. Stinson, 7 Blackf. 437; Ornard v. Blake, 45 Me. 602; Poster v. Perkins, 42 Me. 183; Jewett v. Preston, 27 Me. 404; Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 509; Woodbury v. Fisher, 20 Ind. 387, 88 Am. Dec. 325; Jackson v. Phelps, 12 Johns. 421; Jackson v. Rodle, 20 Johns. 187; Hulick v. Scott, 9 Ill. 175; Younge v. Guillebeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 641, 18 L. ed. 263; Parmelee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 86, 18 L. ed. 543; Com. v. Jackson, 10 Bush, 429; Bell v. Farmers Bank of Kentucky, 11 Bush, 34, 21 Am. Rep. 205. This was expressly held in Wallis v. Taylor, and the only difference between that case and this is that in this the instrument confers powers on a third person to sell the mortgaged property and apply the proceeds as therein directed, while in the former case the power was to be exercised by the creditors named. Both instruments would have created mortgages, if consummated; and to hold that the assent of the real parties in interest was not essential in the one case, and essential in the other, would be to disregard substance and give effect to form. To hold that delivery to and acceptance by the person on whom power to sell is conferred will bind the beneficiaries named in such an instrument, in the absence of some prior agreement, is to hold that one person may be bound by the act of another not authorized to act for him.

There are some decisions, however, which seem to hold that assent of mortgagee is not essential. Among them are the following: Merrills v. Swift, 18 Conn. 257, 46 Am. Dec. 315; Ensforth v. King, 50 Mo. 477; Furman v. Fisher, 4 Coldw. 626, 94 Am. Dec. 210; First Nat. Bank of Emporia v. Ridenour, 46 Kan. 207.

In Merrills v. Swift it appears that Swift signed a mortgage to secure a debt due to Merrills, in the absence of, and without the knowledge or consent of, the latter, which was delivered to an attorney for his benefit. After this, and before Merrills had knowledge of the existence of the paper, another creditor of Swift caused attachment to be levied on the property. It is not claimed that the paper was signed and delivered to the attorney in pursuance of any prior understanding, nor that the attorney was authorized to represent Merrills. The court, however, while recognizing that delivery and acceptance were essential to the validity of every deed, and that there could be no delivery without acceptance, held "that neither the presence of the grantee, nor his previous authority to a third person to receive it on his behalf, nor his subsequent express assent to it, is necessary to make the delivery of a deed valid. When there is no such previous authority to receive it, his assent is presumed, when the deed is beneficial to him, although his dissent may be shown, and the deed thereby rendered ineffectual." Such a rule may have application in the class of cases before noticed, but it seems to us wholly inapplicable to mortgages. As before said, mortgages rest on contracts,—contracts between mortgagors and mortgagees,—and, so long as one has right to refuse the security on terms offered, the other is not bound. The reasons suggested why assent of creditors to assignments would seem to be necessary to their validity apply with more force to mortgages such as that in question.

The case of Bank of California v. Marshall, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 704, grew out of the same instrument involved in this; but the question presented to the court of civil appeals in that was whether the transaction was fraudulent. From the agreed statement on which the case was tried, we do not see that the question was raised, but in the course of the opinion the court said: "The trustee accepted the terms of the trust, and, in the absence of a repudiation of its terms by the beneficiaries, his acceptance will inure to their benefit." On application here for writ of error, no such question was presented or considered.

In view of the finding before referred to, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the District Court will be reversed; but, as the record stands, it is believed that a proper judgment could not be rendered, that would fully and correctly determined the rights of all parties. The cause will be remanded to the district court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Arapahoe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the enticing away of plaintiff's wife. Reversed.

Statement by Hayt, J.:

Plaintiff, in his complaint, alleges, inter alia, his marriage with Clara R. Deane in the year 1870. "That said plaintiff has at all times from the date of his said marriage lived in the city of Denver, with his wife, and has provided her with a comfortable home, and at all times his said wife has lived with him at his said home happily and contentedly until the occurrence of the matters hereinafter set forth. That said defendant about the year 1876 became and was acquainted with the said wife of this plaintiff and shortly afterwards the said defendant commenced to acquire and did acquire and since then has had and now has an improper influence over the wife of said plaintiff; and the said defendant by means of said undue influence, did, maliciously and with the intent to injure the plaintiff, and to deprive him of the comfort, society, and assistance of his said wife, seduce the said wife, and seduce and alienate her affections away from the plaintiff, and to the defendant; and the said defendant, further intending to injure this plaintiff, and to deprive him of the comfort, society, and assistance of his wife, did on or about the 1st day of December, A. D. 1889, entice her away from the said plaintiff, against his consent, by means whereof, among other things, his home has been made desolate and ruined. That by reason of the premises the plaintiff has been, and still is, wrongfully deprived by the defendant of the comfort, society, and aid of his said wife, and has suffered great distress in body and mind in consequence thereof, and is damaged in the sum of $100,000. Wherefore, the said plaintiff prays judgment against the defendant in the sum of $100,000, and costs of suit."

The answer puts in issue the allegations of the complaint.

Messrs. O'Donnell & Decker and Benedict & Phelps for appellant.

Messrs. Wells, Macon & Furman for appellee:

The law does not require that the acts, promises, deceptions, or artifices used to accomplish seduction should be either alleged or proven.

Rees v. Cupp, 59 Ind. 566; Brown v. Kings- ley, 88 Iowa, 220; State v. Bieres, 27 Conn. 820.

The law does not prescribe any fixed amount of damages to be awarded in such cases. The extent of the damages depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Under some circumstances the injury might be slight. Under others it might be overwhelming. The damages should correspond to the injury. The object of the law is to get all of the facts that would throw any light upon the case fully before the jury.

Cooley, Torts, 224; Hutchins v. Kimmel, 31 Mich. 128, 18 Am. Rep. 164; Wood's Mayne, Damages, §§ 690-692; Hilliard, Torts, 515; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 55; Whart. Ev. § 225; Taylor, Ev. p. 1208, also § 533, p. 518; 8 Phillips, Ev. p. 441.

Although it is conceded that the courts have the power of granting a new trial in cases of criminal conversation, still, it seems the power has never been exercised. Even in cases where rules of law have been disregarded, or where, for any reason, the verdict of the jury cannot be supported, the power of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury will not be exercised without regard to the justice of the case. The justice of this case is overwhelmingly with appellee.

Sedgw. Damages, 6th ed. p. 765.

The amount of damages depends upon the husband's circumstances and conduct, the terms upon which he and his wife lived together, and the wife's general character.

Moak's Underhill, Torts, p. 327, and authorities there cited.

The amount of damages is left to the discretion of the jury.

8 Sutherland, Damages, p. 744.

The rank and quality of the plaintiff, the condition of the defendant, his being a friend, relation, or dependent of the plaintiff, or being a man of substance, proof of the plaintiff and his wife having lived comfortably together before her acquaintance with defendant, and of her having always borne a good character then, and proof of a settlement or provision for the children of the marriage, are all proper circumstances of aggravation.

Wood's Mayne, Damages, § 690, p. 664; Cooley, Torts, p. 224.

Courts will set aside verdicts for excess.

8 Sutherland, Damages, 744; Duberley v. Gunning, 4 T. R. 651; Torre v. Summers, 2 Nott & McC. 267, 10 Am. Dec. 597.

The pecuniary ability of the defendant is peculiarly the proper subject of inquiry. If the jury are permitted to awe others, by way of example, and to punish the defendant, his wealth and standing in society will in a considerable degree determine the amount of damages. A verdict which, as against one individual, would be sufficient for all purposes, would, as against another, be scarcely felt, by reason of the difference in their ability to respond to damages.

The especial interest of the present decision is in 24 L. R. A.

applying the constitutional provision against ex post facto laws to exemplary damages in a civil case.

Considered as a civil injury (criminal conversation), the law gives a satisfaction to the husband for it by action of trespass vi et armis against the adulterer wherein the damages recovered are usually very large and exemplary.

When exemplary damages are claimed, the defendant's pecuniary condition is then a matter for the consideration of the jury, on the ground that a given sum would be a much greater punishment to a man of small means than to one of larger. For this purpose actual wealth only can be material.

All that the courts of this state have ever attempted to decide is that, when not controlled by legislation, exemplary or punitive damages, as a punishment or example, should not be awarded in civil actions for injuries resulting from torts, when the offense is punishable under the criminal laws.

3 Bl. Com. 139.

It is not true that if a husband, in order to retain his wife's affections or to save her and his children from scandal, lives with her after he learns of her seduction, that he thereby condones with the seducer.

Foot v. Card, 6 L. R. A. 829, 58 Conn. 1; Clouser v. Olapp, 59 Ind. 548.

Hayt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Among the fundamental rights of husband and wife is that each has the right to the society and companionship of the other. At common law there were two forms of action that might have been maintained by the husband for offenses against the marital relation,—one for enticing the wife away, and the other for seduction,—and these actions, subject to some modifications by statutes in a number of the states, still exist. Whether the present action be treated as one for enticing the wife away, or for seduction, it is sufficient, in either event, to allege in the complaint the ultimate facts, without a statement of the arts made use of to accomplish the illegal purpose. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa, 220; Hodges v. Bales, 102 Ind. 494; Rees v. Cupp, 59 Ind. 566.

No objection was made to the complaint by demurrer or motion in the court below. If the defendant desired a separate statement of the causes of action alleged, he should have interposed a motion for that purpose at the first opportunity. At the trial the jury were instructed that the plaintiff might recover without proof of seduction, but that such proof was competent for the consideration of the jury in determining whether or not the affections of the plaintiff's wife had been alienated, and also in aggravation of damages. Counsel for appellant seem to have been in doubt, until the instructions of the court were read, as to the precise charge upon which damages were claimed. Their requests for instructions contain repeated references to the charge of seduction, and specific instructions are asked thereon. The court, in its charge, however, treats the action as one simply for enticing away the plaintiff's wife. Much uncertainty and confusion might have been avoided, had the issues been clearly defined and understood at the outset. Upon a charge of seduction, we do not think that there is room for serious contention for vindictive or punitive damages, as the law stood at the time the seduction took place, if at all. In fact, if such damages may properly be given in this case at all, it is because of the Act of 1889.

The question of the measure of damages is by far the most serious question for consideration in this case. Dependent upon and secondary to it are many questions with reference to the admissibility of evidence, such as of the financial standing and ability of the defendant. If recovery in this case must, at best, be limited to a liberal rule of compensatory damages, it will be apparent that the financial ability of the defendant has no right place in the controversy, as it is only where exemplary or punitive damages may be recovered that such evidence is admissible. Prior to the change made by the Statute of 1889, no principle was better settled in this state than that punitive or exemplary damages could not be allowed in any civil case.

Murphy v. Hobbs, 7 Colo. 541, 49 Am. Rep. 866; Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. v. Yeager, 11 Colo. 845. The Murphy-Hobbs Case is properly regarded as the leading case upon the subject in this state. The opinion was written by Judge Helm. The court, upon a careful review of the authorities, reached a conclusion against the right to award such damages in any civil case where the offense is punishable under the criminal law. The logic and reason of the argument not only served to weave the conclusion into the warp and woof of our law, but to cause the rule to be extended in subsequent cases to the exclusion of punitive damages in all civil actions, of whatsoever nature. In the case of Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. v. Yeager, supra, it is expressly determined that punitive damages should not be allowed in any civil action. The opinion was written by the experienced judge presiding at the trial of the present case in the district court, who was then one of the supreme court commissioners. In the course of the opinion, which was concurred in by this court, the writer says (speaking of the measure of damages): "The rule of compensation is sufficient to give the injured party all that he is entitled to; and to go beyond that, and usurp the powers of the state in the infliction of punishment, may well be challenged as a 'sin against sound judicial principle'; a sin which cannot be made to stand for the right by an adherence to it." The same rule has been announced in a number of recent cases. See Republican

Pub. Co. v. Miner, 12 Colo. 77; Republican Pub. Co. v. Mearns, 15 Colo. 399; Honblett v. Tuttle, Id. 454. This was the state of the law at the time of the convening of the seventh general assembly. Before considering the change made at that session, we pause to say that the law, as theretofore construed by the court of last resort, was protected by the constitutional inhibitions against ex post facto and retrospective laws equally as well as if the decisions had been enacted into statutes. Wade, Retroactive Laws, § 177; Lambertson v. Hogan, 2 Pa. 22; Lee County v. Rogers, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 181, 19 L. ed. 160; Chicago v. Sheldon, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. ed. 594; Kenoisha v. Lamson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 477, 19 L. ed. 725.

If exemplary damages are proper in this case, it is because of the following statute passed by the general assembly, and approved by the governor, upon the 19th day of February, 1889. The statute does not contain an emergency clause, and hence did not go into effect until May 20, 1889. It reads as follows: "Section 1. That in all civil actions in which damages shall be assessed by a jury for a wrong done to the person, or to personal or real property, and the injury complained of shall have been attended by circumstances of fraud, malice or insult, or a wanton and reckless disregard of the injured party's rights and feelings, such jury may, in addition to the actual damages sustained by such party award him reasonable exemplary damage." Sess. Laws 1889, p. 64. The substance of this statute is embodied in the charge given at the trial, but, in addition thereto, the jury were instructed: "In law, a wrongful act, done intentionally, without a legal justification, is done maliciously." This instruction is erroneous. To justify exemplary damages, there must be some wrong motive accompanying the wrongful act, or a reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights. Even when the wrongful act results in the death of a human being, malice is not necessarily to be implied. Sedgw. Damages, § 863; Miller v. Kirby, 74 Ill. 242; Inman v. Ball, 65 Iowa, 543.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff to support his cause of action shows, among other things: That plaintiff and Mrs. Deane were married in the year 1870. That they lived as man and wife until some time in the fall of 1889, when a separation took place. That defendant, French, became acquainted with Mrs. Deane some time in the year 1877. That for ten years they were more or less intimate. That during this time the defendant frequently took Mrs. Deane out riding, sometimes returning late in the evening. That he frequently called at her residence in the absence of Mr. Deane, and occasionally accompanied her to the theater. One witness testified to seeing Mr. French kiss Mrs. Deane upon one occasion, and that he was seen with her in the sleeping room occupied by Mrs. Deane. That his attentions to her continued without interruption until the fall of 1887. That in the fall of that year the plaintiff and his wife visited St. Louis, upon the occasion of the holding of the annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic. That the defendant took the same train, and several times engaged Mrs. Deane in conversation on the train. That he took rooms near the rooms occupied by the Deanes, and that he did so by a previous arrangement made with the landlord, and that his attentions to Mrs. Deane during their sojourn of a few days in the city of St. Louis were quite marked. That these attentions continued during at least a part of the year 1888. That in the spring of 1889 Mrs. Deane went east, and made a protracted visit, not returning to Colorado until the month of August following. It is but fair to the defendant to say that he denies absolutely the more serious circumstances in evidence against him; claims that his relations with the Deanes were those of intimate friendship; that his relations with Mrs. Deane were known to and acquiesced in by Mr. Deane, and that they were prompted solely by motives of friendship, and not improper; that no inducement was ever held out by him for her to separate from her husband. Other evidence was introduced by the defense tending to show that Mr. Deane was addicted to the use of liquors and morphine; that he quarreled with his wife about property the title to which was in the name of Mrs. Deane; and that he commenced suit to recover the same, or an interest therein. Deane admits the using of morphine, but says that it was prescribed by his physician. The evidence shows that the Deanes separated in October, 1889; that afterwards a reconciliation took place, and the marital relations were resumed; but that a final separation took place in April, 1890. It is not our purpose to enter into the details of the evidence adduced by the parties, except as the same is necessary to show the nature of the proof introduced.

The Act of 1889, in relation to exemplary damages, went into effect May 20, 1889. The evidence shows that defendant discontinued his visits to Mrs. Deane some time in the year 1888. One witness testifies that on an afternoon in April, 1889, he saw them together; that they rode in a street car from some point down town to the Deane residence, where they alighted, and stood for some minutes, talking together, near the front gate. With this single exception, there is no evidence that plaintiff in error met Mrs. Deane after the year 1888, or that any intercourse, of any kind or character whatsoever, took place between them after that date, while the evidence shows affirmatively that no communication passed between the parties after the Act of 1889 took effect. In this state of the record, we are to consider the proper measure of damages in case of recovery. On behalf of appellant, it is claimed that the Statute of 1889 does not apply in this case, that it was not the intention of the legislature to make it applicable to past transactions; and that, if such had been the intention, it would be in violation of both the state and national constitutions. On the contrary, the appellee argues that the facts show a continuing tort, that the cause of action did not accrue to appellee until the separation actually took place, and that the law in force at the time of such separation should control. It is also contended that the statute is remedial in character, and is applicable to past as well as future transactions. The statute does more than change the form of the remedy. It provides for an increase of the measure of damages ad libitum. It is penal in character. Exemplary or punitive damages are allowed as a punishment to the wrongdoer, and as an example to others. Such damages rest upon the right to punish, and not the right of the injured party to compensation for the wrong done. In the case of Murphy v. Hobbs, supra, it is said, with reference to the form of the action, in considering another provision of the constitution: "When the convention framed, and when the people adopted, the constitution, both understood the purpose of this clause to be the prevention of double prosecutions for the same offense. Yet, under the rule allowing exemplary damages, not only may two prosecutions, but also two convictions and punishments, be had. What difference does it make to the accused, so far as this question is concerned, that one prosecution takes the form of a civil action, in which he is called 'defendant?' He is practically harassed with two prosecutions, and subjected to two convictions, while no hypothesis, however ingenious, can cloud in his mind the palpable fact that for the same tort he suffers two punishments." See also Sedgw. Damages, § 860, and cases cited. Although the prohibition against ex post facto laws is aimed at criminal cases, it cannot be evaded by giving a civil form to that which, in its nature, is criminal. The Act of 1889 changed the existing law by authorizing punitive damages in certain cases and, as incidental thereto, it changed the rules of evidence, to the disadvantage of the defendant, by allowing evidence of his financial standing, the admissibility of such evidence depending upon the right of allowing punitive damages. In the Test-Oath Cases the Supreme Court of the United States says: "The constitution deals with substance, not shadows. Its inhibition was leveled at the thing, not the name. It intended that the rights of the citizen should be secure against deprivation for past conduct by legislative enactment, under any form, however disguised. If the inhibition can be evaded by the form of the enactment, its insertion in the fundamental law was a vain and futile proceeding." Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 377, 18 L. ed. 356. To hold that such a statute as the one under consideration can be made applicable to past transactions would be in violation of the national constitution prohibiting the passage of any ex post facto law, and in violation of, not only a similar provision of the constitution of this state, but also of the inhibition against retrospective legislation. It not only permits the damages, in cases controlled by it, to be doubled and trebled, but, as we have said, they may be increased at the will or caprice of the jury. Moreover, in cases of this character, upon a finding by a jury that the defendant was guilty of malice, fraud, or wilful deceit, the plaintiff would be entitled to an execution against the body of the defendant. Mills' Anno. Stat. § 2164. Section 11 of article 2 of our Constitution inhibits the passage of any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or retrospective in its operation. The word "retrospective," as here used, has reference to civil cases; and, as to such cases, it is synonymous with the term "ex post facto," as applied to the criminal law. In Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, it is said: "This term [ex post facto] necessarily implies a fact or act done, after which the law in question is passed. Whether it is ex post facto or not relates, in criminal cases,—to which, alone, the phrase applies,—to the time at which the offense charged was committed. If the law complained of was passed before the commission of the act with which the prisoner is charged, it cannot, as to that offense, be an ex post facto law. If passed after the commission of the offense, it is as, to that, ex post facto, though whether of the class forbidden by the constitution may depend on other matters. But, so far as this depends on the time of its enactment, it has reference solely to the date at which the offense was committed to which the new law is sought to be applied. No other time or transaction but this has been, in any adjudged case, held to govern its ex post facto character." "A statute which takes away or impairs any vested right acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations already past, is to be deemed retrospective or retroactive." Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 2d ed. p. 160.

It is contended that the offense charged in this case was not completed until after the Act of 1889 took effect. As we have already said, the charge in this case is not only for alienating the affections of Mrs. Deane, and enticing her away from her husband, but it also includes seduction. The evidence introduced tends to establish both charges. If there was, as a matter of fact, seduction, it was consummated long before the enactment of the statute allowing punitive damages; and it has not been, and cannot be, maintained that upon this charge such damages are warranted in this case. Is it possible that the plaintiff, after bringing forward evidence upon such a charge, may in any case, at the last moment, when met by the rule against punitive damages, shift his base, and evade the law, by instructions such as were given in this case? The charge of seduction is not directly withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, but it is said that seduction, if found, is only to be considered in aggravation of damages. We think this amounts to an evasion of the law which ought not to prevail. While this court has no disposition to curtail the legitimate operation of the Act of 1889, it cannot, on the contrary, extend the statute so as to make the same applicable to transactions that took place before the passage of the act. To do so would be to overturn the fundamental rule requiring all statutes to be construed prospectively, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifest, and also to violate one or more provisions of the national and state constitutions. Here the entire transaction of which complaint is made took place before the statute took effect. No spoken or written word, no act of French with reference to Mrs. Deane, is shown to have occurred thereafter.

Our conclusion is that, under the facts as presented upon the record, the Statute of 1889 with reference to exemplary or punitive damages has no application; that the plaintiff must be limited in his recovery to a liberal rule of compensatory damages. Under such a rule he may recover "for all direct and proximate losses occasioned by the tort; for the physical pain, if any, inflicted; for his mental agony, lacerated feelings, wounded sensibilities." But he is not entitled to damages assessed merely as a punishment to the defendant, or as an example to others. Murphy v. Hobbs, supra.

Of the instructions refused, the twelfth should have been given. By it the defendant sought to have the jury informed that the law of this state did not permit Mrs. Deane to be called as a witness without the consent of her husband, and that, consequently, nothing unfavorable was to be inferred against the defendant from her failure to testify.

The judgment of the District Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

The building of a viaduct over railroad tracks in a public street, which practically closes abutting property to access by teams from the street, is such an extraordinary and unusual use of the street as could not have been reasonably anticipated at the time of its dedication, and therefore the abutting owner is entitled to consequential damages, under the Colorado constitution, requiring compensation for property taken or damaged, although it is limited by the courts of that state to unusual or extraordinary uses.

Statement by Hayt, Ch. J.

It is alleged in the complaint: "That on the 14th day of March, 1890, plaintiff was, and still is, the owner of lots 1 and 2 in block 79 in the former city of South Pueblo, now part of the city of Pueblo, said lots being situate at the corner of C and Mechanic streets, and having a frontage of 140 feet on the former and 50 feet on the latter street. That said lots were improved with valuable buildings, and prior to the grievance complained of said property was valuable and desirable for business purposes, and readily rented for such purposes. That the defendant is a municipal corporation. That on or about the 14th day of March, 1890, the city council of Pueblo duly passed and adopted an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance providing for the construction of an iron viaduct or steel viaduct upon C street, in the city of Pueblo, and for granting certain easements and rights to the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company.' [Here follows the ordinance in full]. That in pursuance of said ordinance the building of said viaduct 'has been begun, and is now being prosecuted, by authority of the defendant; and that by reason of its height and proximity to the said property of plaintiff abutting on C street the aforesaid buildings are and will be greatly darkened and shut out from the natural light, the free circulation of air, natural to said property, materially obstructed and diminished, and that the approaches to said property are and will be greatly obstructed and hindered; that said viaduct and approaches thereto are being built and will be maintained directly in front of plaintiff's property, whereby the same has been and will be greatly injured and damaged, and the market value thereof reduced and impaired.' That in consequence of the wrongs and injuries complained of the plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of $8,000. Prayer for judgment." To this complaint a demurrer was filed and overruled. Afterwards an answer and amended answer were filed. The first, second, and third defenses set up in the amended answer were stricken out on motion. As no error has been assigned to any of the foregoing matters, these defenses will be omitted. The fourth defense reads as follows: "That it [the defendant] admits that it is a municipal corporation, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint; that the C street mentioned in the complaint is a public street in the city of Pueblo, extending from the eastern to the western limits thereof; that the Mechanic and Plum streets mentioned in said complaint are public streets in said city, crossing said C street at right angles, and lying parallel to and distant from each other about twelve hundred feet; that the portion of said C street between said Mechanic and Plum streets is crossed by a large number of railroad tracks, which, long prior to the construction of said viaduct, at the time thereof, and now were and are constantly used by the Denver & Rio Grande and other railroad companies in the prosecution of their business; that prior to the construction of said viaduct, by the frequent passing and repassing of the engines, cars, and trains of said companies over and across said portion of C street, public travel along said C street between said Mechanic and Plum streets was greatly hindered, impeded, and rendered dangerous; that, in order to make public travel over and along said portion of C street safe and convenient, it became and was necessary for the defendant to erect the viaduct mentioned and described in the complaint; that said viaduct was carefully and properly constructed; that both it and its approaches were built wholly within the lines of public streets in said city of Pueblo, and without physical invasion or injury to the property described in the complaint as the property of the plaintiff; that the construction of said viaduct was both lawful and necessary, and was a reasonable and proper improvement and change of said portion of C street and Mechanic street adjacent thereto. Wherefore defendant, not admitting that plaintiff has sustained the damage complained of, says that if the plaintiff's property has been injured, as alleged, by the construction of said viaduct, this defendant is not liable therefor. And for a fifth defense defendant admits that it is a municipal corporation; admits plaintiff's ownership of the property described; admits the passage of the ordinance set forth in the complaint, and the construction of the viaduct pursuant to the ordinance; denies that by the construction thereof the plaintiff's property is injured as complained of, or at all; denies that plaintiff has sustained damage thereby in the sum of $8,000, or in any sum whatever." The fourth defense was also stricken out upon motion of plaintiff. A jury was thereafter impaneled to determine the issues raised by the complaint to the fifth defense. The only question submitted to the jury was upon the question of damages. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $8,000. A motion for a new trial having been interposed and overruled, the cause was brought into this court by appeal.

Messrs. A. M. Nicholas, City Atty., and Dixon & Dixon, for appellant:

Cases recognizing a liability in such cases as this were all decided subsequent to the adoption of our constitution. Consequently it cannot be said that we borrowed the words "or damaged," from any other state with a construction ready made. Such cases, therefore, are not binding upon this court and they are the identical cases with which this court has emphatically said that it could not agree.

Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 118.

As highways are established principally for the public benefit these private rights of access and of light and air are subordinate to the rights of the public in the street, and it follows that the abutting owner cannot complain of any interference with those rights which result from a proper and legitimate use of the streets by the public as a public highway.

McQuaid v. Portland & V. R. Co. 19 Or. 535.

The municipal authorities by virtue of the paramount right of the public had the right to take without compensation.

The logic of the main opinion in Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, leads to the conclusion that the effect of the words "or damaged" was to invert the relations of the public and abutting owners to a street and declare the rights of the latter paramount to those of the former.

The law presumes an abutting owner to anticipate changes and improvement which, as to their character and means employed, could not possibly be anticipated because not invented.

In cases arising out of street improvements, the words "or damaged" add nothing in effect to the word "taken" in the constitutional provision and this for the reason that the immunity of municipal corporations in such cases rests upon a distinct substantive ground, to wit, the paramount rights of the public arising out of condemnation proceedings or the contract of dedication.

The rights of an abutting owner in a street are superior to those of all persons or corporations who may seek to subject a street to extraordinary uses or subject it to servitudes foreign to street purpose. As against such uses, his easements are property, and if they are cut off wholly or partially by changes or improvements made for such purposes, it is a taking of this property which entitles him to compensation. But when the public steps in with its paramount rights the abutting owner cannot complain if his rights are cut off or impaired by improvements made for the purpose of rendering a street suitable, safe, and convenient for the uses to which it was dedicated.

An original purchaser of an abutting lot, and all subsequent purchasers, take with the implied understanding, or as tacitly agreeing, that the public shall have the right to thus improve or alter the street, so far as it may be necessary for its use as a street, and they can sustain no claim for damages resulting to their lots or property from the impairment or destruction of such incident rights, as a mere consequence from the use or improvement of the streets as highways.

Selden v. Jacksonville, supra.

The views herein advocated have been sustained by this court.

Mr. Charles E. Gast, for appellee:

Every state constitution adopted in recent years has limited the power of eminent domain in language similar in import to that contained in the Colorado constitution.

Illinois led the way in 1870; West Virginia followed in 1872; Pennsylvania in 1873; Arkansas in 1874; Missouri, Alabama, and Nebraska in 1875; Texas and Colorado in 1876; Washington in 1889.

An injury such as is counted upon in this suit gives a cause of action.

Rigney v. Chicago, 103 Ill. 64.

This court has on several occasions cited the Rigney Case, and approved it, as containing a sound exposition of the constitutional provision. Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 118; Denver v. Vernia, 8 Colo. 400; Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Ayres, 106 Ill. 518.

Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 81 L. ed. 688.

A distinction was intended between those uses to which every street is primarily and reasonably dedicated, and those extraordinary uses which are tolerated in but very few, probably not more than one in a hundred of the many streets required for its convenience by the local public.

Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 424.

It is not by any means settled law in Colorado that municipal corporations may raise and lower the grade of public streets at will, and stand exempt from liability to property owners.

Denver v. Vernia, supra.

The rule now is, in states having a constitutional prohibition against the damaging of property to give a right of action against cities for a change in street grade.

Hayt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record may be stated as follows: Is a municipal corporation liable in damages for an injury to abutting property, occasioned by the building of a viaduct in a public street over railroad tracks? The evidence in this case shows that plaintiff's property is located on the corner of O and Mechanic streets in the city of Pueblo; that it was improved, and valuable for business purposes, prior to the erection of the viaduct; that this viaduct was elevated 8 feet above the old sidewalk at one end of plaintiff's property and 22 feet at the other, and that by reason thereof the property was closed to access by teams from either O or Mechanic streets; that by the construction of the viaduct the property was rendered practically inaccessible, except from an alley in the rear. That the property was damaged by the erection of the viaduct is shown by the uncontradicted evidence introduced at the trial. It is claimed by appellant that the viaduct is a necessary street improvement, and that the injury complained of is not actionable; while the appellee contends that, the injury being conceded or proven, a right of recovery is guaranteed by the following provision of our state constitution: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged, for public or private use, without just compensation." Article 2, § 15. This provision of the fundamental law has received consideration from this court in a number of cases. The result of these cases may be fairly summarized as follows: For injuries resulting from reasonable and ordinary or usual change and improvement of the street by the municipality, the abutting owner cannot recover, provided the change or improvement is made in a careful and skillful manner for the benefit of the public. Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 118; Denver v. Vernia, 8 Colo. 399; Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 403; Denver & S. F. R. Co. v. Domke, 11 Colo. 247; Gilbert v. Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. 13 Colo. 501.

The doctrine of damnum absque injuria has not, however, been applied where the municipal authorities have made an unreasonable change in the street, or put it, or allowed it to be put, to an extraordinary or unusual use. See, in addition to the cases above cited, Jackson v. Kiel, 13 Colo. 378; Longmont v. Parker, 14 Colo. 886. The insertion of the word "damaged" in addition to the word "taken" first appears in the amended constitution of Illinois adopted in 1870. It has since been incorporated into the constitutions of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Arkansas, Missouri, Alabama, Nebraska, Texas, Georgia, California, Colorado, Kentucky, Montana, and the Dakotas. In a majority, if not all, of these states, except Colorado where a construction has been had, the courts have given the provision a literal interpretation, allowing a recovery in all cases where private property has sustained substantial damage by the making of a public improvement. We shall not undertake to cite the cases supporting this conclusion, as the number forbids it. Reference to a majority of such cases may be found in the recent case of Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 18 L. R. A. 161. In that case, after review of the authorities, the conclusion is stated as follows: "Every court in which the point has been raised has decided in favor of the private citizen; but, were it now presented to us for the first time in the history of the phrase, we should not be disposed to view it in any way different from that expressed in the cases we have cited. If private property is damaged for the public benefit, the public should make good the loss to the individual. Such always was the equity of the case, and the constitution makes the hitherto disregarded equity now the law of it." Denver v. Bayer, supra, is the leading case in this state upon the question. Although the right of recovery was somewhat restricted from the rule announced in Illinois and some other states, it was expressly held that the word "damaged" was inserted in the constitution for a purpose, which purpose was to add an additional right of action. In Colorado the right of recovery has been limited to those unusual uses to which but few streets are subjected. This construction has been influenced to some extent, no doubt, by the peculiar wording of our constitution, under which just compensation is also required where private property is damaged for private use. This novel provision is relied upon by the writer of the opinion in the Bayer Case, Mr. Justice Helm, in the Nestor Case, in 10 Colo., at pages 524 and 525, as a ground for qualifying the rule announced in other states. The opinion concludes as follows: "A distinction was, in my judgment, intended between those uses to which every street is primarily and necessarily dedicated and those extraordinary uses which are tolerated in but very few—probably not more than one in a hundred—of the many streets required for its convenience by the local public." The court, as then constituted, while expressly refusing to extend the recovery in accordance with the rule in Illinois and a few other states, in which the provision had at that time received judicial consideration, was of opinion that it was a recognition of a new right of action, not necessarily known to the common law; and this principle has been recognized since in several of the cases cited supra. In the Bayer Case a right of recovery was recognized for any injury or annoyance occasioned by a railroad to an abutting property owner, injuriously affecting his property without injuring that of his neighbor; and it was held that the owner of property abutting on a street had a special property—an easement—in the street not common to the general public, that entitled him to free ingress and egress from the street to his property, and that, if such easement was taken away or injuriously affected, he was entitled to just compensation therefore. In the case of Jackson v. Kiel, supra, a railroad company was held liable for damages occasioned by blocking the space or intersection with another street, thereby preventing ingress and egress to plaintiff's property for a considerable portion of the time. In Longmont v. Parker, supra, it was decided that the owner of abutting property had rights in the street not shared by the general public, and that, if the highway was obstructed or impaired as a means of ingress and egress to his property, the abutting owner was entitled to recovery for the depreciation of the value of this property occasioned thereby. See also Union Pac. R. Co. v. Foley, 19 Colo. —. Under these decisions the plaintiff is entitled to recovery in this class of actions in cases where the damages suffered are different in kind from those suffered by the general public, while a recovery is denied for those damages common to all; and when damages are occasioned an abutting owner by an improvement in the street in front of his property, whereby ingress and egress to the premises is injuriously affected, this is a kind of injury not common to the general public.

By the fourth defense it is alleged, in substance, that the viaduct was a reasonable and proper street improvement, and it is claimed 24 L. R. A.

that this constituted a complete defense to plaintiff's action. This claim is not supported by the decided cases in jurisdictions having a constitutional provision similar to the one under consideration. In the case of Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, like arguments were advanced to those urged by appellant. The conclusion was that the building of a viaduct in a public street by the city rendered the city liable in damages to the owner of abutting property where the effect was an impairment of some right which the private owner enjoyed in connection therewith; such, for instance, as the right of ingress to and egress from the same. Although the result was concurred in by only a bare majority of the court, it has since been recognized as the settled law in the state of Illinois. In Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, — also a viaduct case,—the Supreme Court of the United States reached a similar conclusion without a dissent. Although this result may have been influenced by the prior decisions of the state court, the opinion declares that the constitutional provision could have been inserted with no other intention than that expressed by the state court. The case of Selden v. Jacksonville, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 370, not necessarily opposed to the foregoing views, the decision in that case being based upon a constitutional guaranty that private property shall not be "taken" or "appropriated" without compensation. It was held that this provision did not embrace mere consequential damages resulting to property abutting on a street from a change of grade of the street or other improvement thereof, made by municipal authorities acting within the scope of their charter powers, but only to a trespass upon or physical invasion of the property. It is not necessary to question the correctness of the foregoing decision, based as it is upon a dissimilar constitutional provision from that here in force. It is not controlling under the peculiar provisions of our constitution. Moreover, it narrows the right of recovery within limits not universally recognized, even where constitutional provisions are in force similar to that found in the state of Florida. Spencer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Mo.) 22 L. R. A. 668. A strict application of this rule would hold the dedicant as having consented to a use of the street that totally destroys the value of his property although no human foresight could have anticipated such an unusual use. Under it the results of a life of toil and frugality, if invested in town or city property as a provision for old age or dependent families, might be lost as the result of an improvement erected for the benefit of the general public. The rule is certainly more reasonable and just which requires compensation to be made by the municipality out of the common fund for an injury occasioned by an improvement for the public convenience, than to require the individual to suffer the entire loss. Moreover, the constitutional provision in force in this state is remedial in character and for the purpose of giving property holders additional security; and, under well-settled canons of construction, it should be liberally construed. Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, supra; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746. The building of a viaduct in a public street is such an extraordinary and unusual use of the street as could not have been reasonably anticipated at the time of the dedication, and we think the owner of the property abutting on the street is entitled to consequential damages occasioned to such property by the improvement. It follows that the facts alleged as a fourth defense constituted no defense to plaintiff's action, and the defense was, therefore, properly stricken out. Nothing remained for the jury to determine but the amount of the damages.

It is not claimed that the damages allowed are excessive, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Robert GARRETT, Appt.,
v.
LAKE ROLAND ELEVATED R. CO.

(.....Md.....)

1. There is no "taking" of the property of an abutting owner by the erection in the bed of the street by an elevated railroad company of a stone abutment nine feet high, which reduced the width of the street in front of his premises to less than ten feet, interfering with light and air and nearly destroying access to his property from the street.
2. The abutment and elevated structure of an elevated railroad, built under legislative authority, are not a nuisance, although they may create a liability for consequential damages.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City dismissing his bill in a suit brought to enjoin the maintenance of a bridge approach in a public street in front of his premises, until compensation should be made to him for the injuries caused to him by it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. John E. Cowen and E. J. D. Cross for appellant.

Messrs. Steele, Semmes & Carey for appellee.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was argued during the last October term, and then, by direction of the court, it was argued at the present April term. Upon both occasions the discussions at the bar displayed great research and signal ability, and the briefs show unusual care, skill, and thoroughness in their preparation. After several consultations a majority of us have reached the conclusions which, having first briefly stated the material facts, we will proceed to announce.

The appeal is from a decree dismissing the appellant's bill of complaint filed by him in the circuit court of Baltimore city, against the Lake Roland Elevated Railway Company. The record shows that Mr. Garrett is the owner of certain unimproved lots situated on and bounded by the west side of North street, and fronting four hundred and thirty-six feet thereon, and lying between the north side of Eager street and the south side of Chase street in Baltimore city. He also owns other lots likewise fronting on the west side of North street, between Chase and Biddle streets; but with these we are not now concerned. North street is sixty feet wide between the building lines and thirty-six feet between the curbs; and no part of it is included within the outlines of Mr. Garrett's deed. By section 5 of Ordinance No. 23, approved April 8, 1891, the North Avenue Railway Company, one of the several roads by the consolidation of which the Lake Roland Elevated Railway Company was formed, was authorized to bridge the Northern Central Railway Company's tracks on North street by means of an elevated structure extending, including the necessary approaches thereto, along North street from the corner of that and Eager streets to the corner of North and Saratoga streets. A stone abutment, forming an inclined plane, to carry on its perpendicular or highest side the iron superstructure and to serve, on its surface, as the northern approach to the elevated road, has been erected nearly in the centre of North street, between Chase and Eager streets, directly in front of part of the first named lots of Mr. Garrett. It is eighty-three feet and two and a half inches in length and fifteen feet and eight-tenths feet in width, and starts at the street grade and gradually rises to a height of nine feet, and leaving a distance or drive way between its western face and the curb line contiguous to Mr. Garrett's property of nine feet and eight and a quarter inches. It is alleged that the construction of this abutment of solid masonry in the bed of North street and the elevated structure will, by reducing the width of the street in front of the appellant's lots to less than ten feet, destroy the access to his property from North street, and prevent him from reaching the same with vehicles ordinarily used in Balti-

NOTE.—As to whether or not there is a "taking" of property by destroying access of an abutting owner to the street the cases from different states are in conflict, see note to Egerer v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 381, also Selden v. Jacksonville (Fla.) 14 L. R. A. 370.

there is no constitutional provision in that against taking for public use without compensation.

Compare also the preceding case of Pueblo v. Strait, ante, 392, in which compensation was allowed for injuries caused by a similar structure under a constitutional provision requiring compensation for damaging property.

more. It is charged that the destruction of his right of access to his property as aforesaid renders such property entirely unsalable and deprives him of the market value thereof, and constitutes in fact and in law a taking of his property without making compensation therefor, as required by the constitution of the state of Maryland. It is further claimed that this structure deprives the premises of light and air, and that this, too, is a taking of the property within the prohibition of the constitution. It is averred that the mayor and city council of Baltimore and the General Assembly of the state had no power to authorize the construction of the said abutment or to permit the operation of the road thereon, because these acts create a new and additional servitude upon the street and upon the appellant as an abutment thereon, and are a nuisance. It is likewise insisted that Ordinance No. 23 and the Acts of Assembly of 1892 chapter 112, confirming that ordinance, are in conflict with section 40 of article 3 of the constitution and void. The bill prays for an injunction to restrain the completion of the abutment and a mandatory injunction requiring the appellee to demolish and remove so much of it as had then been built.

The appellee answered the bill and considerable evidence was taken.

The proposition distinctly presented by the record and earnestly contended for by the appellant's distinguished counsel is, that the erection by the appellee of this abutment on property not owned by the appellant, but in the bed of a public city thoroughfare upon which his lots abut, destroys the access to his land, interferes with light and air, imposes a new and additional servitude upon his property and deprives him of the benefit of the use of the same; and amounts in law to a taking of his property, that is in fact not trespassed upon or touched, and is illegal until compensation shall have been first made therefor.

Though there has been no physical invasion of the appellant's property, still if the act complained of constitutes, by reason of its consequences, a taking of the appellant's private property for a public use within the meaning of section 40 of article 3 the constitution of Maryland which prohibits the taking of private property for public use except upon just compensation being first paid or tendered, then the injunction should have been granted. But if, on the contrary, this was not such a taking as the constitution has reference to and injury has been done the appellant, then his remedy is in another and a different forum; and the ninth section of the ordinance heretofore alluded to makes ample provision for the prompt and effective enforcement of such judgment, as a court of law, in an appropriate proceeding, may pronounce.

That there was no actual appropriation of, or entry upon, a single foot of land contained within the outlines of the appellant's deed is admitted and could not be denied; and, therefore, to support the theory of the bill, the consequences which it is asserted will result to the appellant from the occupancy by the railway of contiguous land, forming part of the bed of a highway and owned by some one else but subject to an easement in the public and which consequences are not physical invasions of the plaintiff's soil nor an ouster of him therefrom, are treated by the appellant as a taking of that which is confessedly neither encroached upon nor used at all. The consequential damages resulting from the act complained of—the incidental injuries to the owner—are thus charged to be a taking of private property for a public use though the property itself remains unappropriated and unapplied to that use in any way whatever.

While the constitution of the state has prohibited the taking of private property for a public use without compensation being first paid or tendered, it has not undertaken to define or declare what shall be a taking within its terms.

True, there is some conflict among adjudged cases as to what amounts to such a taking, but the overwhelming weight of authority accords with the conclusions which this court announced in two cases that will be fully referred to later on. Apart from the decisions of the supreme court of Ohio (see Crawford v. Delaware, 7 Ohio St. 460), which rest upon a doctrine peculiar to that state and the recent New York decisions in the Elevated Railway Cases (Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268), which are hopelessly in conflict with the principles announced in other cases in the same state (Radoliff v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 195, 53 Am. Dec. 357; Fobes v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 121 N. Y. 505, 8 L. R. A. 453), and the decisions in Minnesota (Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 89 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493; Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 71, 10 L. R. A. 268), and a few cases in Mississippi (Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 66 Miss. 279, 4 L. R. A. 785), and possibly one or two other states, all substantially following the New York Elevated Railway Cases; there is practically an unbroken current of adjudged cases broadly and clearly marking and defining the difference between an incidental injury to and an actual taking of private property. An injury to and a taking of such property are distinct things. Every taking involves an injury of some kind, though every injury does not include a taking. "Property is taken by entry upon and appropriation of it, as in the ordinary case of location. It is injured by obstructing access, as in Duncan's Case, 111 Pa. 352, or drainage as in Ziemer's Case," 124 Pa. 560; Jones v. Erie & W. V. R. Co. 151 Pa. 80, 17 L. R. A. 758. In Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 836, the court said: "Persons appointed or authorized by law to make or improve a highway are not responsible for consequential damages, if they act within their jurisdiction and with care and skill, is a doctrine also universally accepted alike in England and this country. British Cast Plate Glass Mfrs. v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794; Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29; Boulton v. Ormerod, 2 Barn. & C. 708; Green v. Reading, 9 Watts, 882, 86 Am. Dec. 127; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 187; Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418; Smith v. Washington, 61 U. S. 20 How. 185, 15 L. ed. 858.

The decisions to which we have referred were made in view of Magna Charta, and the restrictions to be found in the constitution of every state, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation being made. But acts done in the proper exercise of the government powers, and not directly encroaching on private property, though their consequences may impair its use, are universally held not to be a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision. And this was affirmed in Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638. The constitutional right to compensation for private property taken for public use does not extend to instances where the land is not actually taken, but only indirectly or consequently injured. Ottawa, O. & C. G. R. Co. v. Larsen, 40 Kan. 801, 2 L. R. A. 59; Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tramway Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 727; Heiss v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co. 69 Wis. 555; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heissel, 88 Mich. 62, 81 Am. Rep. 806; Crosby v. Ouenaboro & R. R. Co. 10 Bush, 289; Dorman v. Jacksonville, 18 Fla. 545, 7 Am. Rep. 253; Bradley v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 21 Conn. 294; Spencer v. Pt. Pleasant & O. R. Co. 23 W. Va. 407; Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 25 Vt. 465, 60 Am. Dec. 283; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 817, 27 L. ed. 337.

This distinction between consequential damages and an actual taking, thus firmly settled, was frequently severe in its results, particularly when the power of eminent domain had been exercised by municipal corporations, and with a view of relaxing its rigors to some extent, many of the states of the Union changed their organic law so as to require compensation to be made for incidental injuries, precisely as though there had been a physical taking of the property. Thus the constitutions of Pennsylvania of 1878 and of Alabama of 1875 provided that when private property is taken for public use, just compensation shall be made for the property taken, injured, or destroyed; that of Arkansas of 1874, that private property shall not be taken, appropriated or damaged; that of Illinois of 1870, West Virginia of 1872, Missouri of 1875, Colorado and Texas of 1876, Georgia of 1877, and California of 1879, that it shall not be taken or damaged. Selden v. Jacksonville, 28 Fla. 558, 14 L. R. A. 375. Such changes would have been wholly unnecessary if the view of the appellant as to what constitutes a taking of private property had prevailed.

But the immunity which protects from liability governmental agencies in the proper and skillful performance of their public functions does not extend to private persons or mere quasi public corporations, and therefore, whilst in both instances the same distinction between an actual taking of private property and consequential injuries to it when not taken is applicable, a private person or a quasi public corporation is liable in damages to the individual incidentally injured, though the act complained of and occasioning the injury was itself lawful. Hence, for such injuries as are complained of here, though they do not amount to a taking of property, if found to exist, there is a remedy in a court of law. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 117.

The ninth section of the ordinance authorizing the construction of the abutment and the elevated road expressly provides that if any judgment recovered against the company for such injuries as are here complained of shall remain unpaid for sixty days, "all the rights" of the company under the ordinance "shall cease and be in abeyance until the judgment shall be paid," and the right to operate the road "shall only be revived after the payment thereof."

In the case of Cumberland v. Willson, 50 Md. 148, the distinction between consequential injuries and an actual taking of property was considered, and it was distinctly held that damages done to a water-power of a mill by means of an increased flow of water, carrying debris into the race caused by the grading and paving by the city of one of its public streets, was not a taking of property. Property thus injured is not, in the constitutional sense, taken for public use," p. 148. And again in O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co., 74 Md. 368, 13 L. R. A. 126, the question now before us was directly presented. There the plaintiff was an abutting owner on the east side of Howard street, in Baltimore city, with no freehold or leasehold estate in the bed of the street, and he claimed that by reason of his abutting proprietorship he had such an interest in the street as to entitle him to compensation according to the provisions of article 8, section 40 of the Constitution, for the injury occasioned him by the act of the railroad company in constructing its road in an open cut on the west side of Howard street and opposite his property. Because he had not been paid or tendered compensation he filed a bill in equity praying for an injunction to restrain the construction of the open cut. The precise question for determination was "whether the use of the street by the railroad company, in the manner proposed and under the conditions stated, would be such taking of private property of the plaintiff as is forbidden by the constitution of this state, except upon payment of just compensation being first made." And in the course of the opinion it was said: "But, notwithstanding the railroad company may be liable on common-law principles, the question still remains to be answered, will the cutting and use of the street, as proposed by the railroad company, be the taking of private property, in respect of the rights of the plaintiff as abutting lot owner, within the meaning of the constitution? As already stated, it is not charged that there will be any invasion of or physical interference with any part of the plaintiff's lot, in the construction of the road. The most that he claims for is that he will be deprived of the full use of the street, as it now exists, and that his property will be depreciated in value by the construction of the road. This, however, is but an injury, to whatever extent it may be suffered, of an incidental or consequential nature. . . . In such case as this, therefore, it would seem to be clear, both upon principle and authority, that there is no such taking of private property for public use as is contemplated by the constitution of the state; and hence there is no ground for any preliminary proceeding by way of condemnation."

We must either adhere to these two decisions in 50 and 74 Md., strictly in accord as we have shown them to be with the decided weight of judicial opinion on this subject, or else, receding from them, adopt the Ohio or the New York doctrine. We see no reason for departing from or for modifying our former deliberate judgments. The Ohio doctrine is peculiar to that state alone, O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, North Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, supra, and is so admitted to be in Crauford v. Delaware, supra. The New York doctrine involves this inextricable dilemma, viz: If the grading of a street by a municipal corporation cuts off all access to a person's house, albeit his property is thereby destroyed and rendered valueless, it is not taken in the constitutional sense but if a railroad company in lawfully constructing its road does precisely the same thing that the city did in grading the street, then the abutter's property is taken though not physically entered upon at all.

"The house and lot are the same; the street is the same; the acts done are the same; the use for which they are taken is a public use in each case, and yet the court must hold that there is a taking of property in one case and not a taking of property in the other." Mr. Cowen's brief in O'Brien's Case, supra.

The abutment and elevated structure having been built under legislative authority are not a nuisance. O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co. supra.

"That cannot be a nuisance such as to give a common-law right of action, which the law authorized." Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, supra.

"It may be stated as a general rule that whatever is authorized by statute within the scope of legislative powers is lawful and therefore cannot be a nuisance." 2 Wood, Railway Law, 970. The structure is, therefore, a lawful one. It does not destroy the street as a street, though it may cause the plaintiff greater inconvenience in gaining access to his lots than he encountered before it was built. But this and the other injuries complained of are purely incidental and consequential; though the appellant is not without a remedy therefor. Whilst it is stated as a general rule that no action will lie by an abutting lot owner, who does not own the fee in the street; for injuries which merely result from the legal and reasonable use of a public street by a railway company and which leaves his rights of egress and ingress reasonably sufficient (Iron Mountain R. Co. v. Bingham, 87 Tenn. 522, 4 L. R. A. 622), still, the statute law of Maryland and the ordinance to which we have alluded (and the terms of which the appellee has accepted) provide an ample remedy for all such damages as the appellant may be able to show he has sustained. The North Avenue Railway Company, one of the corporations forming the Lake Roland Elevated Railway, was incorporated under article 23 of the Code, and section 169 of that article holds every railroad company laying its tracks upon any public street responsible for "injuries done to private property" lying upon or near to such street "by such location;" and the damages thus occasioned may be recovered by civil action. Section nine of the ordinance No. 28, already referred to makes the payment of such damages, when judically ascertained, absolutely certain or suspends the operation of the road.

Upon a full and most careful consideration of the whole case we are of opinion that the decree dismissing the bill of complaint was properly passed and it will therefor be affirmed.

Bryan, J., dissenting:

Robert Garrett is the owner in fee simple of a lot of ground in the city of Baltimore, situated on the west side of North street, between the north side of Eager street and the south side of Chase street, fronting about four hundred and thirty-six feet on North street, with a depth of one hundred and sixty-eight feet westerly to Hunter alley. He also owns in fee another lot on the western side of North street, with a frontage thereon of about three hundred and fifty-six feet, and running back westerly about one hundred and sixty-eight feet to Hunter alley, and extending from the north side of Chase street to the south side of Biddle street. He does not own the fee in the bed of North street. The Lake Roland Elevated Railway Company has erected on North street a stone abutment in front of the first mentioned lot. This abutment is eighty feet long and fifteen feet and eight tenths wide, and is distant about nine feet and eight inches from the curb-line on the western side of the street. It commences at grade at the northern end, and ascends at an inclined plane until it reaches the height of nine feet at its highest point. It is distant about ten feet six inches from the curb-line on the eastern side of the street. North street is a public highway, having a width of thirty-six feet between the curb lines on the opposite sides of the street.

The stone abutment above-mentioned was erected shortly before the commencement of proceedings in this case. Since that time an iron superstructure has been placed upon it for an elevated railroad. Garrett filed a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the Lake Roland Company from placing its elevated railroad structure on the abutment and praying for its demolition and removal and for general relief. The Lake Roland Company claims the right to erect this abutment under the authority of an ordinance of the mayor and city council of Baltimore. The court below dismissed the bill of complaint. Before we examine the ordinance let us inquire what are the rights of the complainant independently of its provisions. When North street was opened two thirds of the expense of its construction was assessed upon the property benefited by the opening of the street. The existence of the street enhanced the value of the coterminous property, and the proprietors were required to pay the price of this enhancement by contributing two thirds of the expense of the improvement. They paid for something quite distinct from the rights which all other inhabitants of the city had in the street. They of course, had the same right of using the street as belonged to the general public; but beyond and in addition to this right they acquired great advantages and conveniences by having a wide public street in front of their lots of ground. These advantages and conveniences were bought and paid for; and the money was paid for the purpose of increasing the value of their property. These advantages and conveniences, comprising among other things facility of access, adapted the ground to those uses for which in a large city is most desirable. Ordinance No. 23 of the mayor and city council of Baltimore (approved April 8, 1891), authorized the construction of an elevated railway by the corporation to whose rights the Lako Roland Company has succeeded.

The fifth section of this ordinance enacted that the said corporation should have power to bridge the tracks of the Northern Central Railway Company, from the corner of Eager and North streets to the corner of Saratoga and North streets; and to make the proper and necessary elevated structure for the purpose of effecting said crossing and the approaches thereto. This ordinance has been ratified and confirmed by the Act of 1892, chapter 112. We may assume for all the purposes of this discussion that the structure in question has been erected in conformity with the requirements of the ordinance. Its effect upon the condition of the street is very obvious. It very seriously impedes travel and transportation. And with respect to the complainant it erects an impassable barrier in front of a portion of his property, and takes away from it the value derived from a frontage on an open public street thirty-six feet wide. The available space is reduced to about ten feet. We do not at present find it necessary to make an estimate of the damage thus inflicted. The testimony shows it to be very great. If this structure had not been authorized by legislative authority it would have been a public nuisance of aggravated character. But as a matter of course it cannot be so regarded after it has received the sanction of the general assembly and the mayor and city council of Baltimore. Private rights, however, are not affected by any legislation, which has taken place. They are amply secured against infringement by the declaration of rights. According to the nineteenth article "every man for an injury done to him in his person or property, ought to have remedy by the course of the law of the land, and ought to have justice and right . . . according to the law of the land." And the twenty-third article declares that "no man ought to be . . . deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land."

The legislature has paramount authority over all public highways, and may direct the mode in which they are to be used. It has seen fit to confer on the mayor and city council of Baltimore the power to regulate the use of the streets in that city. But it has never been supposed that either the legislature or the mayor and city council could exempt a private corporation from responsibility for any wrongs done in using the streets under their authority. And no such proposition has been maintained in the argument of this case. When the city in the exercise of its corporate powers proceeds to close a street it is required to ascertain by due process of law the amount of damage which will be done by closing it, and to pay over to each one who is injured the amount he is entitled to receive, or invest it in city stock for his benefit, before the street is closed. Public Local Laws, art. 4, § 806. In this way those persons are indemnified, who, by the closing of a street, are deprived of the advantages, conveniences and valuable legal rights dependent on its existence as a public highway. It is true that North street has not been closed by the proceedings in this case. But other injuries are to be redressed by the remedies which the law has prescribed as appropriate to their particular circumstances. Where a railroad company had a right to make a tunnel in a street, and in the careful exercise of this right it damaged the walls of a house, it was held that the owner of the house was entitled to recover compensation for the injury, even although it were the natural or inevitable consequence of the act which was authorized by law. Reaney's Case, 42 Md. 117. In the present case the abutment to the extent of its dimensions subverts and destroys every possible use for which a street is intended; it obstructs the access to the property adjacent to it, and makes it impossible for the owner to use it in the manner in which he has a right to use his property.

The street for a distance of eighty-eight feet has disappeared, and a narrow alley has been substituted in its place. Now, admitting this to be an injury which must be redressed, the inquiry is, what remedy has the law declared to be appropriate to such a case. If the ordinance and the ratifying statute cannot exempt the Lake Roland Company from responsibility for injuries committed, it must follow as a consequence that it is liable to the same proceedings as any other wrong-doer under similar circumstances. The appropriate remedy for obstructing a right of way is an injunction to remove the obstruction. This was clearly decided in White v. Flannigan, 1 Md. 525, 54 Am. Dec. 668. In general terms, the rule in equity is stated to be that an injunction will not be granted "when a trespass is fugitive and temporary, and adequate compensation can be obtained in an action at law." But the rule does not imply that where a trespasser is destroying the property of another person, equity will refuse to interfere, because the value of the property might be recovered in an action at law. Every man is entitled to the use and enjoyment of his property in any lawful manner which suits his wishes and purposes. Hence there is a necessary limitation or explanation to the general rule. An injunction will be issued where the trespass reaches to the substance and value of the estate, and goes to the destruction of it in the character in which it enjoyed, or where it would impair the just enjoyment of it in the future. White v. Flannigan, 1 Md. 545, 54 Am. Dec. 668; Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 418-415, 61 Am. Dec. 871; Story, Eq. Jur. § 928. In White v. Flannigan it was said: "We have seen that the complainant is entitled under an implied covenant to a right of way over the forty-five foot street. Any obstruction which denies the exercise and use of this right works irreparable mischief to the street, as a street. The thing ruined by the obstruction is a street, and as in the case of the mine, the complainant on the principle there recognized has a right to the aid of a court of equity. What he complains of is the destruction of the street. He is entitled to the enjoyment of it as a street."

In Corning v. Lowerre, 6 Johns. Ch. 439, 2 L. ed. 178, a bill was filed for an injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing Vestry street, in the city of New York, averring that he was building a house upon it, to the great injury of the plaintiffs, as owners of lots on and adjoining that street. Chancellor Kent granted the injunction, saying that it was "a special grievance to the plaintiffs, affecting the enjoyment of their property and the value of it. The obstruction was not only a common or public nuisance, but worked a special injury to the plaintiffs." Of course, in the present case the complainant cannot maintain that the obstruction is a public nuisance, but he is entitled to protection against "a special grievance affecting the enjoyment of his property, and the value of it." In Hart v. Buckner, 2 U. S. App. 488, 54 Fed. Rep. 925, the court says: "Owners of lots abutting on and adjacent to a public street of a city, even if not owners of a fee in the street, have the right of access and the right of quiet enjoyment, and such rights are property which may be protected by injunction when invaded without legal authority." From many other cases illustrating this point, we will select two from the Supreme Court of the United States.

In St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74, the complainant alleged that the railroad company was constructing a railroad track over and along a public street, levee and landing in front of certain real estate in the city of St. Paul, belonging to him, and that the purpose was to run cars thereon for the transportation of freight and passengers, and if this purpose should be carried into effect the street, levee and landing could not be occupied and used for the purposes for which they were constructed, and to which they were dedicated, and that his premises would be rendered useless and valueless. The railroad company denied that Schurmeier was the owner of the fee in the street, and set up title in itself as grantee of the state of Minnesota. It was shown in evidence, among other things, that the person under whom Schurmeier claim title had by certain formal proceedings dedicated to the public the street, levee and landing; and it was contended that thereby under the laws of Minnesota the entire fee was vested in the state. It was also shown that the city of St. Paul claimed entire control over the said premises, and had established a grade for the same. In reference to the statute which was alleged to vest the fee in the state, the court said: "Suppose the construction of that provision, as assumed by the respondents, is correct, it is no defence to the suit, because it is nevertheless true, that the municipal corporation took the title in trust, impliedly, if not expressly designated by the acts of the party in making the dedication. They could not, nor could the state, convey to the respondents any right to disregard the trust, or to appropriate the premises to any purpose which would render valueless the adjoining real estate of the complainant."

It was decreed that the railroad company should be enjoined from the further prosecution of its work, and that it should remove from the street, levee and landing in front of Schurmeier's premises all tracks, trestle works, buildings and obstructions of every kind which it had constructed for railroad purposes. In Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, it appeared among other things that a railroad company had erected in Water street, in the city of Keokuk, a permanent and substantial building, and that it covered the whole of the front of the plaintiff's lots binding on the street. The circuit court decided that the railroad company had acquired from the municipal authorities a right to lay down their tracks in the street, but the assent of the municipality could not confer the right to erect this building in the street. The supreme court said: "The construction of a permanent freight depot in Water street was an unauthorized and improper occupation of that street. It was a total obstruction of the passage; and this, as we have said, cannot be created or allowed. It is subversive of and totally repugnant to the dedication of the street, as well as to the rights of the public." It may be said that in this case the complainant is not entirely deprived of the use of the street. This is true. But there is a very serious impediment to the use of the street by vehicles; although the obstruction is not total. A solid stone structure eighty-eight feet long and about sixteen feet wide, ascends from the grade of the street to a height of nine feet. Before its erection there was an open street in front of Garrett's lot measuring thirty-six feet from curb to curb; the open space in front of his lot has been so much reduced that it measures less than ten feet. He is not deprived of all use of his lot, but he is prevented from the advantageous use of it which he has a right to make, and upon which its value very largely depends.

It cannot be said that his property has been destroyed; but in the language of the authorities the injuries reaches to the very substance and value of the estate, and goes to the destruction of it in the character in which it has been enjoyed. And it impairs the just enjoyment of the property in the future. This last circumstance is one of the tests given by Judge Story to determine the propriety of an injunction. Story, Eq. Jur. § 928. If an individual should blockade the access to the complainant's lots, and say to him, "you may sue me for damages and recover full compensation for the injury which I have done to you;" a court of equity would not tolerate such an excuse for the trespass, but would order the removal of the obstruction. In whatever way the city council may authorize the public use of the streets for railroad purposes, it can in no manner diminish or disparage private rights in connection with them. These are under the protection of the law of the land and any invasion of them must be redressed by the ordinary process of the tribunals of justice. It is not competent for the city council (with or without the sanction of the legislature) to debar an injured party from a resort to the ordinary remedies provided by the law of the land for the protection of property, and to restrict him to an action for damages. If any such effect be attributed to the ninth section of the Ordinance of the mayor and city council of April 8, 1891, it must be determined that for such purpose it is simply void.

In O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co., 74 Md. 363, 13 L. R. A. 126, it was decided that as there had not been a physical invasion of the property of the complainant by the railroad company there was no taking of private property within the meaning of the constitution, and that therefore there was no ground to require a condemnation before proceeding with the work of the railroad. The complainant was the owner of property abutting on a street in which the railroad company was making a cut so as to provide an entrance to a tunnel, which it was authorized to construct. The injury to the complainant was not regarded as serious. It would not therefore, according to the principles above stated, have justified an injunction. Let us quote from the language of the court: "It is not charged or in any way claimed that the plaintiff will be deprived of, or seriously hindered in the right of access to his property from the street by the making of the cut. The street after the cut is made, will still remain in front of the plaintiff's property on the east side of the cut, about forty one feet wide. There is no question therefore, presented here as to the right of the plaintiff to compensation for obstructing access to his property from the street," page 371. This passage shows a marked difference between that case and the present case.

I see nothing to defeat the complainant's right to such relief as a court of equity is able to give him, unless he has lost it by delay in instituting these proceedings. The evidence does not show the precise time at which the abutment was completed; but the plans for the elevated road were approved by the city commissioner July the twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, and the bill of complaint was filed November the fifteenth, of the same year. The superstructure was placed on the abutment after the filing of the bill. There could not have been much delay on the part of the complainant in instituting these proceedings; certainly not so much as would defeat his right to relief on the ground of laches, or acquiescence in the construction of the abutment. The usual course would be to decree a removal of the obstruction, and this ought to be done in the present instance, if it were necessary, for the protection of the complainant's interests. But a court of equity, in the exertion of its powers, is always governed by a benignant sense of justice, and never even in the redress of wrongs inflicts needless injury. The removal of the abutment would prevent the Lake Roland Company from making efficient use of its road, and would cause incalculable damage to its business. We ought, therefore, to forbear to order the removal if it will repair the injury which it has produced. It has been often said that the granting or refusing an injunction is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court. This may, perhaps, be considered rather a vague statement. But, however, in exercising this jurisdiction, the courts take into view all the facts affecting the rights of the parties concerned, and frame their decisions in such manner as to do complete justice between them.

They may grant an injunction on terms, and they may dissolve it on terms. We do not fail to see that in this case a rigid application of abstract rules of procedure would do more injustice than it would remedy. But by reason of the plastic character of equity practice, we are enabled to mould our decree in this case in such manner as to attain substantial justice. A notable instance in which the relief was modified to suit the circumstances of the case may be found in Green v. Drummond, 31 Md. 71, 1 Am. Rep. 14, although it was entirely different from that prayed in the bill of complaint. A bill in equity was filed for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of real estate. The court decided that specific performance could not be decreed; but, nevertheless, as the complainant had expended money on the faith of the contract, it decreed him pecuniary compensation. The complainant contends that the Lake Roland Company has no right to deprive him of the means of access to his property, and of the other benefits of the street, without first making him compensation to be agreed upon between them, or to be ascertained by condemnation under the right of eminent domain. According to the decision in O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co., we cannot sustain his position that this is a case for the exercise of the right of eminent domain. If, however, there had been a condemnation of this kind, he would have been awarded a sum of money sufficient to compensate him for the rights taken from him. If we render a decree in his favor for this amount, we will satisfy the demands of justice as fully as we are able to do under the circumstances of this case. We ought, therefore, to compute from the evidence the amount of the damage which has been done to him, and decree that the Lake Roland portion thereof, which, in their opinion, the public welfare or convenience may require.

There being a grant by the legislature of express power to the mayor and city council to close up, in whole or in part, any street or alley in Baltimore city, which, in their opinion, the public welfare or convenience may require; and the mayor and city council having declared, by the passage of the ordinance, that, in their opinion, the public welfare or convenience requires the closing of Jew alley in part, this court cannot inquire into the question as to whether or not that discretion was properly exercised unless it be charged that the ordinance was the result of fraud, or a corrupt bargain, and this having been disclaimed by the plaintiff's counsel, there is nothing to give this court jurisdiction.

The ordinance having provided due compensation for the damage done the appellants by the closing of the alley, the effect of said closing is to vest the fee of the bed of that portion of the alley either in the heirs of the original grantor or in the owner of the abutting property absolutely free from any claim for any public or private right therein, and may be used by such owner as any other property.

It is somewhat difficult to understand how an ordinance passed in the precise terms of the act, giving the power, can be in excess of the power so given.

The legislature has given the power. The city has declared that the necessity for its exercise exists. What more is needed? Wherein lies the excess?

Conceding for the sake of the argument that Mrs. Gutman does derive a peculiar benefit from the closing of the alley, still this does not make the ordinance bad.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants were complainants in the court below. They filed a bill in equity in the circuit court No. 2, of Baltimore city against Mrs. Bertha Gutman. It was alleged that she was engaged in erecting a permanent stone and brick wall across the southern part of Jew alley in the city of Baltimore, and that this wall will completely deprive complainants of their right of way over a portion of said alley. The prayer of the bill of complaint was that the defendant should be perpetually enjoined from obstructing the alley, and that she should be required to take down and remove the wall which had been erected. The defendant filed her answer, and after testimony and hearing, the court dismissed the bill with costs.

All of the parties to this suit deduce their title from the same grantors through sundry mesne conveyances. In 1839, the trustees for the owners of a tract of land in the city of Baltimore made a plat of the property, and on said plat laid off and designated certain lots, and an alley running through said property from north to south. Mrs. Gutman is now the owner of ten of these lots; five of them bounding on the east side of the alley, and five lying directly opposite on the west side. The complainants own other lots bounding on the eastern side of the alley. The first deed in point of time, mentioned in the record, which conveys any of these lots is a lease from the trustees to Skipwith H. Coale for ninety-nine years, with the usual covenants for renewal. It is dated October 31, 1839. It described one of the lines as running "to a public alley laid out by the trustees, and called Jew alley; thence bounding on said Jew alley southerly, etc., etc." All of the conveyances under and through which the complainants claim contain certain references to this alley as one of the boundaries of their lots. This alley runs from Marion street on the south to Lexington street on the north, and is eighteen feet wide at the southern end and twelve feet wide at the northern end. Mrs. Gutman's lots lie at the southern end, fronting seventy-three feet five inches on each side of it. Her deeds do not appear on record, but her title is admitted by agreement of counsel. We infer that it is leasehold, but its character is not distinctly stated; nor is it of any consequence in enabling us to decide the question in this case. On May 3, 1893, the mayor and city council of Baltimore passed two ordinances. The first authorized and directed the condemnation and closing of that portion of Jew alley which bounds each side of the lots of Mrs. Gutman. Proceedings for the closing of the alley have been conducted according to the regular forms required by law. And claiming authority from the ordinance and the proceedings thereunder, Mrs. Gutman has commenced to build the wall in the bed of the alley, which the complainants seek to abate. She also claims the title to the bed of the alley in fee. The mayor and city council of Baltimore have kept this alley in repair for more than twenty years, and have exercised control over it during all that time.

The questions in the cause have been argued on both sides with remarkable ability by the respective counsel. The court is fully mindful of their great importance, and of the delicate nature of the duty which it is required to perform. We think that the alley in question was dedicated to the public as a highway by the lease to Coale in 1829. The lot is described as bounding on a "public alley," designated as Jew alley. Now, under the accepted authorities, there ought to be no question as to the meaning of this description. It was in legal effect an implied covenant that Coale should have a right of way over the alley as a public alley. This question was decided in Flannigain's Case, 1 Md. 525, 54 Am. Dec. 668; and in Moale's Case, 5 Md. 814, 61 Am. Dec. 276. In McMurray v. Baltimore, 54 Md. 108-112, the legitimate consequences of this ruling was stated. The court said: "Where an owner of land exhibits a map of it, in which a street is defined, though not yet opened, and sells building lots with front or rear on the street, and makes no express reservation, he dedicates the street for public use, and if in a city surrenders it for all public purposes." And in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gould, 67 Md. 60-63, it was considered as settled that under such circumstances there was a dedication of a street to the use of the public as a street. It is thought that no one will suppose that there can be any difference between the modes of dedicating a public alley and a public street. As a matter of course, whatever rights in the alley may have been conveyed subsequently to the lease to Coale, they were subordinate to the public right acquired by the dedication. The city of Baltimore accepted the dedication, and dealt with the alley as one of its highways. The mayor and city council of Baltimore has the general power to close any street or alley, or any part of any street or alley, according to their discretion. They are to be governed by their own opinion of the public welfare and convenience. But they must provide for ascertaining the amount of damages to any owner or possessor of land, which will be caused by the closing, and for paying compensation to him, or investing the amount of it in city stock for his benefit, before the closing shall take place. Public Local Laws, art 4, § 806. It is recognized by the statute that abutting owners have interests in the street or alley which are valuable, and that these cannot be taken for the public use without compensation. It is believed that no one will contend that they can be taken for private use on any terms whatsoever. Certainly such a doctrine has never at any time found any toleration in this state. The Supreme Court of the United States in Wilkinson v. Leland, 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 667, 7 L. ed. 553, said: "We know of no case in which a legislative act to transfer the property of A to B without his consent, has ever been held a constitutional exercise of legislative power in any state of the Union." Another high authority has said that such a transaction would be a robbery and not legislation. As the appellant's property cannot be taken from them by any power known to the law, except for the public use, they must necessarily have a right to the protection of the courts, if an attempt should be made to take it for any private purpose. Wherever the legislative body has not unlimited power, every suitor must have a right to obtain from the courts the decision of the question whether it has exceeded its powers in dealing with his property. And wherever this power is limited, the courts must so declare, and restrain it within its legitimate boundaries. There seems to be a general concurrence of opinion that the court must determine whether the use for which a citizen's property is taken be public or private. It is so held by the Supreme Court of the United States, Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 298, 37 L. ed. 184. And it is certainly the doctrine of this court. It was very tersely expressed by Chief Justice Alvey in New Central Coal Co. v. George's Creek Coal & Iron Co. 37 Md. 537. He said, "Whether the use, in any particular case, be public or private, is a judicial question; for otherwise the constitutional restraint would be utterly nugatory, and the legislature could make any use public by simply declaring it so, and hence its will and discretion become supreme, however arbitrarily and tyrannically exercised." After this decision of our court, it is unnecessary to cite any of the multitude of other cases to the same effect. The mayor and city council of Baltimore is required to condemn, among other things, the rights of the abutting owners on a street or alley before it can be closed. This condemnation cannot be made except for a public use, and therefore in the case only of such a use is the closing lawful. We will proceed to inquire into the character of the use for which these interests have been condemned. And we shall lay out of our view all the testimony respecting the arguments made before the committee of the city council, when the advocates and opponents of the ordinance appeared before them. We shall found our opinion upon the facts and circumstances which exhibit the nature and character of the ordinance and the objects and results which it would accomplish. As has been already stated, Mrs. Gutman owns lots on both sides of this alley at its southern extremity. The ordinance enacts that the portion of the alley shall be closed which lies between her lots. And on the same day another ordinance was passed, which directed the same alley to be widened for a distance of twenty-five feet northerly from Mrs. Gutman's property, so as to add seven feet to its width; and it was provided that Mrs. Gutman was to convey the land to the city for the purpose of this widening. These two ordinances relate to the same subject, tend to consummate the same object, and must be considered as parts of the same transaction. The result of them would be that Mrs. Gutman would have access to her property by Marion street on the south, and immediately north of her property the alley would be twenty-five feet wide for a distance of twenty-five feet, from that point, the original width of the alley would continue to Lexington street; while all the other lots on the alley would be debarred from the access to them from Marion street. It is shown by the condemnation proceedings, and by agreement of counsel, that Mrs. Gutman is to pay the whole expense incurred by the closing of the alley, including the benefits arising therefrom. The money paid her for benefits is, of course to be applied in satisfaction of the damages sustained by the complainant and others in consequence of the closing. They lose their easement in the closed portion, and she is thereby enabled to erect a building upon it. This is palpably and plainly taking their private property for her private use. In other words it is a forced sale to her of their property. The extinguishment of their interests does not appear to inure in any way to the public service; nor tend to the relief of any public necessity; nor to promote any public interest; nor to subserve any public purpose; nor to be connected with anything used by the public; nor in short, to have, any relation to the public convenience or welfare. The legislature has power to direct that private property shall be taken for the public use, if just compensation be made in the manner prescribed by the constitution. It lies in its discretion to determine to what extent, on what occasions, and under what circumstances this power shall be exercised. The courts have no right to review or control its decisions on these points; but it is indispensable that the use for which private property is taken should be of a public nature. And as we have said whether the use is public or private, is a question for the judiciary to decide. In the opening and closing of streets, the mayor and city council of Baltimore is the legislative power invested with the right to determine when private property shall be taken for the public use. In this matter its judgment and discretion are final and exempt from the control of the courts. But where its ordinances are drawn in question, it is the duty of the judiciary to decide whether the use for which private property is taken, is public or private, in the same manner and on the same principles as it would decide in the case of an act of the state legislature.

It will be seen that we consider the ordinance for closing Jew alley invalid. The decree of the circuit court must be reversed with costs, above and below, and the cause remanded, in order that a decree may be passed in accordance with the prayer of the bill of complaint.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Marshall FIELD et al., Appts.,

Henry A. BARLING et al.

(149 Ill. 556.)

1. The right of an abutting owner who has bought with reference to a dedicated public alley or street, to have it forever kept open, includes the enjoyment of light and air from the space above extending unobstructed to the sky.
2. The right to make a bridge or overhead crossing over a public alley for private use cannot be granted by city authorities, although the fee of the alley belongs to the city.
3. Special damages are caused to an abutting owner by an overhead bridge across a public alley or street, when the light and air passing to his property over such alley will be seriously diminished by the structure.

(April 2, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County enjoining defendants from maintaining a bridge over an alleged highway in such a manner as to interfere with the light and air coming from the highway to complainant's property. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—The above case is an attempt to accomplish a similar result in a somewhat different way from that resorted to in the preceding case of Van Witsen v. Gutman. For references to authorities on the subject of closing or obstructing a highway, see the note to that case.

Mr. John P. Wilson for appellants.

Messrs. Wilson, Moore & McIlvaine, for appellants:

Appellees are not entitled to a decree in a court of chancery enjoining any bridge across Holden place, without alleging and proving that they would sustain a special and substantial injury therefrom.

McDonald v. English, 85 Ill. 232.

The title to the land in Holden place vested in fee in the city of Chicago.

Illinois v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 146 U. S. 462, 36 L. ed. 1046.

A private party can not obtain relief in a court of equity for an alleged obstruction of a public street, unless he sustains a special injury, different in kind from the public, and substantial in its nature.

Union Coal Co. v. LaSalle, 12 L. R. A. 326, 186 Ill. 128; Quincy v. Bull, 106 Ill. 849; Chicago Municipal Gas Light & F. Co. v. Lake, 180 Ill. 54; McDonald v. English, supra.

The special injury is the gist of the action, and unless it is alleged and proved there can be no recovery.

Dunning v. Aurora, 40 Ill. 481; Francis v. Schoellkopf, 58 N. Y. 155; Pierce v. Dart, 7 Cow. 609; Lake View v. Lets, 44 Ill. 81; Clark v. Donaldson, 104 Ill. 639.

There is no difference or distinction in the rights or interest of an abutting owner in a street dedicated, from that acquired by condemnation.

Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 289; Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 28 Kan. 625; Mercer v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 86 Pa. 103.

The permanent occupation of a part of the surface of a street, even for a municipal purpose, is an unauthorized and illegal obstruction of the street.

Morrison v. Hinkson, 87 Ill. 587, 29 Am. Rep. 77.

The rights of the public and of the abutting lot owners extend to the air and light above, as well as to the surface.

Barnett v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Eq. 481; Reimer's App. 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 123, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Schworer v. Boylston Market Assn. 99 Mass. 285; Salisbury v. Andrews, 128 Mass. 336; Atty. Gen. v. Algonquin Club, 11 L. R. A. 500, 153 Mass. 447.

The power of a city to regulate the use of a street is limited to regulations affecting its use for the particular purpose for which it was dedicated.

Morrison v. Hinkson, 87 Ill. 587, 29 Am. Rep. 77; Slack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619.

If the owner of land exhibits a plat of a town or addition or subdivision, on which a street is defined, and sells lots abutting on such street, and with clear reference to the plat, the purchasers of such lots acquire, as appurtenant to their lots, the right to have the street kept open as a street.

Earll v. Chicago, 136 Ill. 285; Zearing v. Raber, 74 Ill. 409; Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 118 Ill. 61; Lake View v. LaBahn, 120 Ill. 92; Newell v. Saxe, 142 Ill. 104.

The right thus passing to the purchasers is not a mere right that the purchaser may use the street, but that all persons whatever, as their occasion may require or invite, may so use it.

The sale and conveyance of lots according to the plat imply a grant or covenant to the purchasers of lots, and their grantees, binding on all abutting lot owners claiming title from the original proprietor as the common source, that the public street indicated upon the plat shall be forever open for use as a street, free from all claim or interference of the proprietor, or those claiming under him inconsistent with its use.

Appellees' right is not a mere common-law right to light, air, and passage. It rests on grant and covenant. The jurisdiction of equity to protect, by injunction, a legal right of this character from continuous infringement, is well established.

Earll v. Chicago, Zearing v. Raber, Schworer v. Boylston Market Assn. Salisbury v. Andrews, and Newell v. Saxe, supra; Dill v. Camden Board of Education, 10 L. R. A. 276, 47 N. J. Eq. 421.

The right vested in appellees is in the nature of an easement in the land itself—an easement of light, air, and passage.

Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 123, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268; Lake View v. LaBahn, supra.

The right to an injunction to prevent a threatened interference with an easement is well settled.

Newell v. Saxe, 142 Ill. 104.

In case of a dedication by plat, the title, whether vested in the municipality or remaining in the original proprietor, is held in trust and the abutting lot owners are beneficiaries, as well as the public at large, and have a vested estate, which a court of equity will protect by enforcing the trust.

Carter v. Chicago, 57 Ill. 288; Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. 67 Ill. 540; Maywood Co. v. Maywood and Earll v. Chicago, supra.

The very fact that the injury will be continuous, and that the only remedy at law will be repeated actions, each of which may only result in a recovery of nominal damages, is in itself a recognized ground of jurisdiction in equity.

Clowes v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co. L. R. 8 Ch. App. 125; Wahle v. Reinbuch, 76 Ill. 326; Newell v. Saxe, 142 Ill. 104; Dill v. Camden Board of Education, 10 L. R. A. 276, 47 N. J. Eq. 421; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 497.

Mr. George L. Paddock, for appellees: "Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad celum; et ad inferos." This maxim is applicable to the rights of the public in the streets or alleys of a city.

The proposed construction would be contrary to the statute and the ordinance on the subject of constructing streets.

R. S. Crim. Code, chap. 88, §§ 221, 222; Charter, City and Village Act; art. 5, § 1; Chicago Mun. Code, para. 1643, 1649.

By the plat and the making of sales thereunder to the respective grantors of the parties to this suit, there has resulted a relation, based upon grant or contract, establishing mutual rights and duties among the different owners of the lots, and entitling complainants, as owners of one of such lots to an interest in the nature of an easement appurtenant to their lot not only to use Holden place as a street, but to demand that all persons may use it within the limits marked on the plat free from obstruction on the part of any other lot owner.

Herbert v. Rainey, 54 Fed. Rep. 250; Carter v. Chicago, 57 Ill. 288; Zearing v. Raber, 74 Ill. 409; Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 118 Ill. 61; Earll v. Chicago, 136 Ill. 277; Newell v. Saxe, 142 Ill. 104; Frewin v. Lewis, 4 Myl. & C. 249; Smith v. Bangs, 15 Ill. 400; Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 45; Green v. Oakes, 17 Ill. 250; Snell v. Buresh, 123 Ill. 151.

Nor is it an element of special damage that it must result in all cases from some obstruction in the street in front of the party's land.

Rigney v. Chicago, 103 Ill. 64; Green v. Oakes, Peoria v. Johnston, Smith v. Bangs, and Snell v. Buresh, supra.

Injury to the freehold, even if slight, would be deemed in law material if to be suffered in perpetuity.

Kerr, Inj. 388.

Mr. J. J. Herrick also for appellees.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill brought by Henry A. Barling, Edward H. Green, and Edward D. Mandell, trustees under the will of Edward Mott Robinson, deceased, against Marshall Field et al. to enjoin them from building or constructing any building, bridge, passageway, or other construction on, upon or across the alley known as Holden place or Court, between the north line of Washington street and complainant's property described in the bill. The block in the city of Chicago bounded by Wabash avenue, Randolph, State and Washington streets is known as block 13 of Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago. The land when platted belonged to the United States, and the plat of Fort Dearborn addition was executed and recorded in June, 1839. The following plat shows State street, Washington street and Wabash avenue and Randolph street as originally laid out; also Holden place. The plat also shows the location of complainant's property and the location of Field's old building and the new one, and the point where it was proposed to erect the bridge across Holden place connecting the two buildings.

the answer was to be eighteen feet above the surface of Holden place, three stories in height, extending north from Washington street over the alley, the entire width of the alley, the distance of forty-five feet, and upward fifty-five feet, or seventy-three feet above the ground. It is charged in the bill that the effect of said construction of such connecting building, if the same be not prevented by this honorable court, will be to deprive your orator's said building and the occupants thereof, to a great extent, of sunshine, light, air and warmth, which they have hitherto enjoyed by reason of the opening and keeping open of said court or alley from the time of said platting and subdivision down to the present; will give said alley an appearance of a private gateway and pas-

Holden place as will appear from the plat is forty feet wide extending north and south through blocks 18 and 14 with lots on each side. Those on the east fronting on Wabash avenue, those on the west fronting on State street. Holden place has been used as a public place or street for many years. The defendants' lots on the northeast corner of Washington and State streets have a frontage of 160 feet on State extending back to Holden place, covered by a six story building occupied by Marshall Field & Co. for several years as a dry goods house. The defendants have acquired lots on northwest corner of Wabash avenue and Washington street with a frontage of 108 feet on Wabash avenue extending back to Holden place. On the latter lots the appellants commenced the erection of a new building nine stories high. At the time of the filing of the bill the new building had been erected six stories high, and the appellants were about to commence the erection of a bridge or passageway over Holden place connecting the old and new buildings. The bridge or passageway as disclosed by sage; will hinder and deter traffic, and in many other ways cause serious and continuing damage to your orators and their property; that such damage will amount to many thousands of dollars, and will be beyond legal remedy or relief if not prevented by this court.

It is also alleged that orators and Marshall Field & Company and the other defendants held their respective lands on said block 13, under a common source of title, viz.: The United States by patents made by the United States, in pursuance of a subdivision, plat and sales by the United States. That by reason of the exhibition and publication of the said subdivision and plat, and by the sale of lots thereunder to the respective grantors of your orators and the said defendants. Marshall Field & Company or said Marshall Field, for their use, there has resulted, as between your orators and the said Marshall Field & Company, or such of them as own the said properties so fronting south on Washington street, on either side of said alley, a right in law to have the said alley remain absolutely and wholly open forever, of the same dimensions and to the same extent as delineated by the United States upon the subdivision and plat aforesaid, viz.: from the north line of Washington street forty feet in width to the south line of Randolph street, and upward to the sky.

In the answer the appellants admit the intention to build the proposed bridge or structure over and across Holden place, but deny that it will interfere with the light, air and ventilation of complainant's premises, or that it will in any manner injure complainants. The appellants also set up and rely upon an ordinance set out in complainants' bill passed by the city of Chicago, June 6, 1892. Section 1 of the ordinance is as follows: Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Chicago.

Section 1. That permission and authority be and is hereby given to John M. Pashley and his assigns to construct and use a bridge or covered passageway across the alley running between lots 9, 10, and 11 on one side, and lot 6, in assessor's subdivision of lots 6, 7 and 8, etc., on the other, all in block 18, Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago: Provided, the lowest portion of said bridge or passageway shall not be lower than eighteen feet above grade of alley, and shall be so constructed that free and unobstructed passage may be had under the same, and provided, that said bridge or passageway shall be constructed of incombustible material and to the satisfaction of the commissioner of buildings.

Section 2 provides that Pashley or his assigns and all persons who shall occupy the buildings which the bridge is to connect shall indemnify and save the city of Chicago harmless from all damages which it may become liable for by reason of the passageway granted. It will not be necessary to cite authorities in support of the proposition that a private individual can not appropriate to his own exclusive use a portion of the surface of a street dedicated to the public use. Before Holden place was dedicated to the public as a street, the title of the United States, the original proprietor was not confined to the surface of the ground, but its title extended upward embracing the light and air as well as the soil. And the dedication of the strip of land for a public street embraced not only the surface of the ground, but the light and air above, and an individual has no more right to obstruct the light and air above the street than he has to obstruct the surface of the soil. In Barnett v. Johnson, 15 N. J. Eq. 481, where it was proposed to obstruct light and air over ground dedicated to the public, it is said:

"When the strip of land is declared a public highway the adjoining owner has the right to light and air from it. The column of light and air above the roadbed, whether of land or water, is as much a part of the highway as the roadbed itself. Take them away and there would be left no public passage. By its being declared a highway by the sovereign power, the light and air above it become again the common property of all, which all may breathe and use whenever they may legally touch it, whether in the road or along its sides. . . . When cities and villages have been built up along a public highway, the right to light and air from it become vested, and even the legislature would have no more right to deprive them (abutting owners) of it without compensation than they would have to draw off the water from a navigable stream."

But the city of Chicago passed an ordinance which purported to authorize the construction of bridge or passageway, and it becomes competent to argue in what manner the ordinance affected the rights of the parties' interest. The ordinance does not purport to grant the right for any public purpose. The use to be made of the street is a private one, solely for appellants' benefit in the transaction of their private business. Clause 7, § 62, chap. 24, Rev. Stat. confers power on cities organized under the general incorporation act as is the city of Chicago to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave or otherwise improve streets, alleys, avenues, sidewalks, wharfs, parks, and public grounds and vacate the same. But there is nothing in this section of the statute or in any other portion of the general incorporation act which confers the power on the municipality to devote a street or any part thereof to a mere private use. By the making of the plat in conformity to law there was a statutory dedication. The fee of the street passed to the city of Chicago, but the city held the fee in trust for the public and for no other purpose.

While the city had ample power to control, regulate, and improve the street in such manner as the demands of the public required, the law conferred no authority on the city to devote the alley to private uses. In the late case of Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 23 L. R. A. 393, where a city passed an ordinance to vacate a portion of a street for the purpose of allowing a private individual to use that portion for a part of a building about to be erected, it was held that the city had no power to devote the streets to that purpose. It is there said:

The municipality, in respect of its streets, is a trustee for the general public, and holds them for the use to which they are dedicated. The fundamental idea of a street is not only that it is public, but that it is public in all its parts, for free and unobstructed passage thereon by all persons desiring to use it. In Alton v. Illinois Transp. Co., 12 Ill. 88, 53 Am. Dec. 479, we said, in treating the subject there under consideration: "Whatever title to these public grounds may be vested in this city, she has not the unqualified control and disposition of them. They were dedicated to the public for particular purposes, and only for such purposes can they be rightfully used. For these purposes the city may improve and control them, and adopt all needful rules and regulations for their management and use, but she can not alien or otherwise dispose of them. At most, she but holds them in trust for the benefit of the general public." In Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 231, 20 Am. Rep. 243, after quoting with approval the foregoing language, it is said: "It is the unquestioned duty of the city, in controlling and improving the streets, to prepare them for public use as streets, . . . as the public necessity may require. Holding them in trust for the public, and having no authority to convey or divert them to other uses, it would seem inevitably to follow that they can have no power to grant to individuals rights or easements in the streets, which might in any way interfere with the duty of preparing them for public use." And in Chicago Dock & Canal Co. v. Garrity, 115 Ill. 155, in considering the power of the municipality to grant rights in the public streets of the city, it was said: "It is not claimed that the use of the streets can be permanently granted for private purposes, and we recognize as unquestionable law that the use of the streets . . . must be for the public, and that no corporation or individual can acquire an exclusive right to their use, or to the use of any part of them, for private purposes." In Glasgow v. St. Louis, 87 Mo. 678, under power "to establish, open, vacate, alter, widen, extend, pave, or otherwise improve all streets," etc., it was held that an ordinance to vacate a portion of one of the streets of the city for the use of private parties was ultra vires. See also Reimer's App. 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373; St. Vincent Female Orphan Asylum of Troy v. Troy, 76 N. Y. 108, 32 Am. Rep. 286; State v. Berdett, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117; Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co. 82 Mo. 127; Dubach v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 486. And we held that the city cannot acquire land by condemning the same for a street when the real purpose is to devote it to private use: Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46. In Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. Case, supra, the court held that the corporation could not condemn property for a public use, to be appropriated to a private use.

But it is claimed that appellees are not entitled to a decree unless they allege and prove they would sustain a special and substantial injury. It is conceded that both parties in this case derive title to their lots from a common source, the original proprietor of Kinzie's addition; that the conveyances were made with reference to the plat; that the streets and the alley in question, Holden place, all appear on the plat. It is claimed on behalf of appellees that where the owner of lots exhibits a plat of a town or addition, on which a street has been laid out and dedicated, and sells and conveys lots abutting on such street with a clear reference to the plat, the purchasers of such lots acquire as appurtenant to their lots the right to have the street kept open and maintained as a street. In Zearing v. Raber, 74 Ill. 409, where a similar question arises, the court quotes from and indorses what is said in Smith's Leading Cases, as follows:

"If the owner of land lays out and establishes a town, and makes and exhibits a plat of the town, with various plats of spare ground, such as streets, alleys, quays, etc., and sells the lots with clear reference to that plan, the purchasers of the lots acquire, as appurtenant to their lots, every easement, privilege and advantage which the plan represents as belonging to them as part of the town, or to their owners as citizens of the town. And the right thus passing to the purchasers is not the mere right that such purchaser may use these streets, or other public places, according to their appropriate purposes, but a right vesting in the purchasers, that all persons whatever, as their occasion may require or invite, may so use them; in other words, the sale and conveyance of lots in the town, and according to its plan, imply a grant or covenant to the purchasers that the streets and other public places, indicated as such upon the plat, shall be forever open to the use of the public, free from all claim or interference of the proprietor inconsistent with such use."

In Earll v. Chicago, 136 Ill. 277, the above case is quoted with approval and the same doctrine is announced.

In Lake View v. LeBahn, 120 Ill. 92, when a lot owner filed a bill to enjoin the town from prosecuting him for an alleged obstruction of a strip of land, in what was deemed to be a platted street, on the ground that the dedication was invalid. The court directed the dismissal of the bill, and among other things, said:

"Each block was thus (by the plat and conveyance with reference to it) burdened with the easement of a street upon a strip of land thirty-three feet wide around it, and entitled to the benefit of the easement of a street of like width upon the adjoining side of the opposite block, so far as there was a block opposite, thus making a street sixty-six feet wide around each block. . . .

In taking the several blocks of land with the arrangement of this system of streets, there were implied mutual agreements that the streets should ever remain as platted, a dedication to the public use of the ground laid out as a street as effectual as could have been made by deed solemnly executed. . . .

He (the adjoining lot owner claiming to the center of the street) took and held an estate upon the condition of its being burdened with the easement of the streets, and the public authorities on opening and improving the streets, act as for the representatives of the lot owners with others in so doing." Newell v. Sans, 142 Ill. 114, is also a case in point. There a bill was filed by a lot owner to enjoin the owner of another lot in the same subdivision from obstructing an alley. The defendant set up among other things that complainant was not injured; that she had no right to an injunction, and that there was a remedy at law. In the decision of the case it was among other things, said:

"Appellants invoked, as against this decree, the rule that equity will only interpose to prevent a threatened nuisance where the injury will be irreparable, where the complainant's right is clear, and where proof of the facts upon which the complainant rests is of the most convincing character. There is here no question as to the character of the act threatened, and complainant's right does not seem to be seriously contested. The execution of the plat under which complainant claims her easement and the sale of lots afterwards in conformity therewith, are clearly proven. . . . Appellants seem, at the time of filing the answer, to have been under the impression that appellee could derive no rights under the plat unless it had been accepted by the city or the public, and hence denied that there had ever been such acceptance. But appellee's right is established by showing that she owns an easement—the right of passage as an incident to her ownership of her lot. It is not necessary, in such case, that the easement claimed by the grantee must be really necessary for the enjoyment of the estate granted. It is sufficient if it is highly convenient and beneficial therefor. Oihak v. Klekr, 117 Ill. 648.

"Irreparable injury," as used in the law of injunctions, does not necessarily mean that the injury is beyond the possibility of compensation in damages, nor that it must be very great; and the fact that no actual damages can be proved, so that in an action at law the jury could award nominal damages only, often furnishes the very best reason why a court of equity should interfere in a case where the nuisance is a continuous one. Elliott, Roads & Streets, 497. . . . And this court has, in harmony with these authorities, held that injunction will lie to prevent obstruction to a private way, on the ground that the party has no adequate remedy at law. McCann v. Day, 57 Ill. 101."

The same rule has been adopted in other states. In Dill v. Camden Board of Education, 47 N. J. Eq. 421, 10 L. R. A. 276, an injunction, at the suit of a lot owner was sustained, restraining an obstruction of the light and air from an alley dedicated by plats. In the decision of the cases it is said: "The right to have the alley thus described, forever preserved as a street, is a private right annexed as an appurtenant to the ownership of the land conveyed, and is entirely distinct from and in addition to the rights of the owner as a citizen at large, to use the street after it should become a public street by acceptance by the public authorities. But while it is a private right, it is, in my judgment, co-extensive with the public right just mentioned, in that it goes the length of requiring that the alley should be preserved in all respects as if it were actually a public street." See also Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 123, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Salisbury v. Andrews, 128 Mass. 386; Schworer v. Boylston Market Assn. 99 Mass. 285.

We do not understand that appellee's right to have Holden place kept free and clear of all obstruction, rests on any personal covenant of the appellants, although that expression may be found in some of the cases. But when the original proprietor of the subdivision made the plat dividing the land into blocks and lots, streets and alleys, and sold and conveyed the lots with reference to that plat, a right arose in favor of the purchasers of lots fronting on Holden place of having the street forever kept open; not that it should be kept free from obstruction on the surface of the soil alone, but to the sky. No grant or covenant was required to create this right. The dedication of the street by the plat, the sale of lots with reference to it, conveyance of abutting lots and the payment of the money for the conveyances were elements sufficient to create the right. The right may be regarded in the nature of incorporeal hereditament; it became appurtenant to the lots. As to the rights secured they are plain. To have the street kept open so that free access may be had to and from the lots abutting on the street, and that light and air may pass unobstructed across the open space between the surface of the street and the sky.

Whether this right extends to all the streets in a subdivision or is confined to streets which afford direct access to or egress from a particular lot is a question which does not arise in this case. Here appellee's lots front on Holden place, and the obstruction is placed in the street between appellees' lots on Washington street at a point affording the only means of access to and from Washington street, from which also light and air are derived.

We have been referred in the argument to McDonald v. English, 85 Ill. 232, and many other cases of that character holding as to obstructions in streets not resulting in special injury to the individual, the public only can complain. Under the facts as they appear in McDonald v. English, we find no fault with the law as laid down in that case, and the same may be said of other similar cases cited by counsel; but in those cases the question presented by the record in this case did not arise. No question arose in regard to the effect of a plat and conveyances in reference to the plat, and the rights and obligations of lot owners who had purchased with reference to streets and alleys appearing on the plat, and no such question was considered or decided.

One other question remains to be considered, and that is, whether the erection of the proposed structure will result in special damage to appellee's property different in character from that sustained by the public at large. The proposed bridge or structure as has been seen was to be built from a point eighteen feet above the surface of the alley, fifty-five feet high and forty-five feet wide, extending from the north line of Washington street to within seventy-five feet of the south line of appellees' building. The character of the structure as disclosed in the answer is as follows:

It will be built of steel, supported by steel and cast-iron columns of the old and new buildings; the columns in both buildings, the steel girders, and the steel beams in all floors will be fire-proofed with hard burned fire-clay; the north and south walls will be of terra cotta, and the roof covered with three inch book-tile of fire-clay; the roof will be framed heavily, like a floor, and the fire-clay supported on "T" irons, on eighteen-inch centers. The windows on the north side will be protected with rolling steel shutters. Each wall on each story will be practically a continuous window so as to intercept light as little as possible.

In view of the size and character of the structure erected over the entire street, a main entrance to appellees' property for the transaction of business, and so near the property it would seem that much additional evidence could not be required to establish that appellees would sustain special damages. But evidence was introduced tending to prove that the obstruction would seriously interfere with the light and the circulation of air at appellees' building. R. W. Hyman, a real estate agent in Chicago, of many years' experience, who was well acquainted with this property, testified that the erection of the structure would materially diminish the amount of air and light passing into said alley, and of the light and air derived by complainants' said building from said alley, and would darken and impede the approach to said building from Washington street, by way of said alley and in different ways would prevent the public from entering said alley as a means of access to said building from Washington street; "that the erection and maintenance of such a structure will, in affiant's opinion, materially damage said complainants' property, and materially diminish its rental and other value, and that the damage to said property and its value will be continuous, and of such a character that it is not practicable to estimate the amount of the same with accuracy." Other evidence of a similar character was introduced. And on the other hand there was evidence that appellees' property would not be damaged but would be benefited. But from an examination of all the evidence, we are satisfied that erection of the structure would result in serious damage to appellee's property, different in character from that sustained by the public. In the bill of complainant it was alleged, that appellants intended to construct a certain bridge or passageway connecting the old and new buildings which was described according to the information shown in the possession of the appellees.

The answer of appellants admitted the intention to build the proposed bridge or passageway for the purpose alleged, and described in detail the particular structure proposed to be built, giving the location, the height, width and other dimensions of the proposed structure, Abst. 21-23, but denied appellees' right to an injunction.

The court on the hearing rendered a decree enjoining appellants from construction of any bridge across Holden place and it is claimed the decree should have been confined to the particular kind of a bridge described in the answer.

The object of the bill was to prevent the threatened injury, and a decree confined to a bridge or passageway of some particular description or dimensions, might have opened the door to litigate this whole controversy over again by an attempt on the part of appellants to construct a bridge a foot narrower or two feet lower or varying slightly in some other respect from the bridge first contemplated. If, under the facts presented by the records, appellees were entitled to an injunction to prevent the threatened obstruction, as we think they were, it was the duty of the court to render a decree which would settle the controversy, and we think the decree rendered was the proper one, and it will be affirmed.

William BLAIR.

(149 Ill. 310.)

1. The determination of corporate authorities as to what is a local improvement is the subject of review by the courts.
2. The basis of a special assessment or a special taxation is the enhancement in value of the property to the extent of the burden imposed.
3. The sprinkling of streets is not a local improvement for which a special assessment can be laid on abutting property.

(October 31, 1893.)

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Cook County Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to enforce payment of a special assessment for sprinkling streets. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Right to impose on abutting owners the duty or expense of sprinkling, sweeping, and cleaning streets or sidewalks.

That the right to charge an abutting owner with the expense of improving property in front of his premises is based on special benefits received by him, is established in most jurisdictions. See note to Re Bonds of Madera Irrigation Dist. (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 755.

That the apportionment of benefits may be made by the frontage rule has been also quite generally decided. See note to Raleigh v. Peace (N. C.) 17 L. R. A. 380.

The further question whether abutting property may be charged with the expense of the improvement in front of it specifically is, on the other hand quite generally denied, except in the case of sidewalks. On this subject, see note to Davis v. Litchfield (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 563.

Very few decisions have yet been made in respect to charging the abutting owner with the duty or expense of cleaning, sweeping, and sprinkling streets or sidewalks in front of his premises. And while the decisions are very few, they are not agreed. But it will be noticed that in each case of difference the Illinois decisions are the only ones that are out of harmony with the rest.

Street sprinkling.

The main case, CHICAGO v. BLAIR, denies that street sprinkling is an improvement, within the meaning of the constitutional provision for special assessments to pay for local improvements. While it recognizes the rule that special taxation or assessment are based on special benefits to the property, it denies that such benefits are received by street sprinkling, because the sprinkling is only useful while the work is continued, and in a few hours the beneficial effects are gone and the property worth no more than before. In respect to the claim that occupation of adjacent property is, by sprinkling the street, rendered more enjoyable and comfortable, and that the property is therefore enhanced in value, it compares street sprinkling with the placing of vases of flowers in the street, or open air concerts. The court does not mention the Minnesota case decided directly to the contrary, and which is the only prior case on the subject.

This Minnesota case (State v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371), expressly decided that street sprinkling is "a local improvement," for which assessments may be made, under the Minnesota Constitution, article 2, section 1, authorizing legislation under which mu-

Statement by Shope, J.:

This was a proceeding to confirm a special assessment upon the property of appellee and others for local improvement of the street upon which the property was situated. The objectors appeared in the county court and filed objections, which, among the questions raised, deny the power of the city to make the assessment for the purposes designated in the ordinance. The ordinance provided that the roadway of certain named streets, between specified points thereon, should be sprinkled with water four times a day during the period commencing April 15, 1893, and ending November 15, 1893; the first sprinkling each day to be completed before 9 o'clock A. M., the second between 9 A. M. and 12 M., the third between 12 M. and 3:30 P. M., and the fourth between 3:30 and 6 P. M.,—there being at least an hour's time between the sprinklings of any street. The ordinance then provides for the manner of sprinkling, and that it shall be at the rate of at least one gallon for every 40 square feet of roadway; the work to be done under the superintendent of public works. Section 2 of the ordinance provides that said improvement shall be paid for by special assessment upon property benefited, in accordance with article 9 of the Cities and Villages Act. Section 3 appoints commissioners to make an estimate of the cost of said improvement, including labor, materials, and all other expenses attending the same, and the cost of making and levying the assessment, etc. The commissioners appointed returned an estimate as follows: "Cost of the improvement, $12,000.80; inspection and superintending, $360; cost of making and levying assessment, $370; total cost, $12,730.80,"—which was approved by the city council. A petition was filed in the county court for the municipal corporations may levy assessments for local improvements upon property fronting upon, or to be benefited by such improvements, without regard to cash valuation of the property, and in such manner as the legislature may prescribe. The court, in respect to the claim made also in that case, that the benefits were not permanent said: "If permanence or durability is to be the test, how long must the beneficial results last in order to constitute an improvement?"—and added that it was "unable to see any difference in principle between the work of street sprinkling, the results of which, unless repeated, last but a day, and the construction of a block pavement or wooden sidewalk, which wears out or decays or has to be built every few years."

The Minnesota court laid down the rule that "the only essential elements of a local improvement are those which the term itself implies, that it shall benefit the property on which the cost is assessed in a manner local in its nature and not enjoyed by property generally in the city."

That street sprinkling did thus benefit the abutting property was regarded by the court as a matter of common knowledge.

Street sweeping.

Substantially like street sprinkling in principle is the case of street sweeping, in respect to which the supreme court of Indiana in Reinken v. Fuehring, 15 L. R. A. 624, 130 Ind. 382, decided that assessments upon abutting property owners for the expenses of sweeping streets, including crossings, could be upheld on the ground of special benefit to such abutting property, even when the abutting owners were taxed generally with the balance of the public for cleaning other streets in which the public alone have an interest. The court said if the abutting owner has a special interest in the improvement of the street and sidewalk, and in keeping them free from snow and ice, he has a special interest in keeping them free from accumulating filth. Also that keeping a street clean adds to the rental if not to the permanent value of property located thereon, thereby giving the abutting property owner a special interest in such cleaning not enjoyed by the general community.

It was also said: "It is matter of common observation, of which we must take notice, that property located upon well improved streets, kept clean, is more desirable than property on unimproved streets where mud and filth are permitted to accumulate and obstruct their use."

Compelling removal of ice and snow from sidewalks.

attempt to levy assessments on abutting owners, but like them in respect to the charge on abutting owners for keeping passageway in front of their premises in proper condition, are the cases concerning ordinances which compel abutting owners to remove snow and ice from sidewalks, or in default thereof to pay a fine, or at least the expense of procuring it to be done.

In respect to such ordinances the Illinois courts have held that the abutting owner cannot be compelled to clean the sidewalks of snow and ice, and that such an ordinance cannot be supported on the principle under which assessments are made against the owner for building sidewalks. Gridley v. Bloomington, 88 Ill. 554, 30 Am. Rep. 566; Chicago v. O'Brien, 111 Ill. 582, 58 Am. Rep. 640.

But elsewhere such ordinances have been upheld. The leading case on the subject is Carthage v. Frederick, 10 L. R. A. 173, 122 N. Y. 268, in which an ordinance compelling property owners to remove ice and snow from sidewalks within a certain time after it accumulates is held a valid exercise of police power and not unconstitutional as a taking of private property for public use without just compensation.

An earlier decision to similar effect was Re Goddard, 16 Pick. 504, 28 Am. Dec. 259, in which such a municipal by-law, requiring owners to clear off snow from sidewalks, was held sustainable by reason of the special benefit to their property, and not void on the ground that it was partial or unequal.

In People v. O'Brien, 45 Hun. 540, such an ordinance was involved, and it was held to be within the power of the city of Albany to enact, but the question raised was merely in respect to the charter power, and not with respect to the constitutionality of the ordinances, which was evidently assumed.

Such ordinances have also been considered in other cases, which did not present any question of their constitutionality. Thus, it has been held that such an ordinance does not relieve a city from liability for injuries sustained by a person in consequence of the failure of the abutting owner to remove the snow or ice. Hartford v. Talcott, 48 Conn. 525, 40 Am. Rep. 189; Taylor v. Yonkers, 105 N. Y. 202, 50 Am. Rep. 492.

And that such ordinances does not make the abutting owner liable to the person who is thus injured by the owner's failure to remove such snow or ice. Moore v. Gadsden, 98 N. Y. 12; Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn., 14 Gray, 232, 74 Am. Dec. 682; Van Dyke v. Cincinnati, 1 Disney (Ohio) 533.

B. A. R.

appointment of commissioners to extend the assessment upon property benefited. Commissioners were appointed, who returned an assessment roll, apportioning said cost upon property by them deemed specially benefited by the proposed improvement. On motion of objectors the assessment was annulled by order of the court, and the petition dismissed. The city appeals.

Messrs. Adolph Kraus and M. W. Robinson, with Mr. F. W. C. Hayes, for appellant:

The common council has the power to determine that the cost of any local improvement be paid by special assessment.

Section 9, article 9, of the State Constitution of 1870 (Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 149): "The general assembly may vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns, and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessments, or by special taxation of contiguous property, or otherwise."

Section 1, article 9, chapter 24, of the Cities and Villages Act, passed April 10, 1872 (Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 487) reads as follows: "That the corporate authorities of cities and villages are hereby vested with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation, or both, of contiguous property or general taxation or otherwise, as they shall by ordinance prescribe."

By that act the general assembly vested the corporate authorities of cities, towns, and villages with full power to make local improvements.

It is solely for the local authorities to determine which method shall be adopted for paying the cost of such improvement.

White v. People, 94 Ill. 604; Falch v. People, 99 Ill. 187; Lake v. Decatur, 91 Ill. 596.

The term "local improvement" is defined as signifying improvements made in a particular locality, by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is specifically benefited.

13 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 986, and authorities there cited; Wilson v. Chicago Sanitary Dist. Trustees, 183 Ill. 443; Guild v. Chicago, 83 Ill. 472; Sterling v. Galt, 117 Ill. 11.

The term "improvement" signifies changes in the condition of property, by which changes its value is increased.

Bouvier, L. Dict.; Abbott, L. Dict.

Street sprinkling is a local improvement.

State v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371.

The question "local improvement" is a question of fact and not of law—one to be determined, and only, upon evidence and testimony as to the character and effect that the proposed improvement will have upon the market value of property assessed therefor.

It is for the corporate authorities to determine the question as to what shall be considered a local improvement, and not for the courts.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. East St. Louis, 134 Ill. 656; Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227; Murphy v. Peoria, 11 Ill. 509.

Section 7 of article 5, confers the power "to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave, or otherwise improve streets, alleys, avenues, sidewalks, wharves, parks, and public grounds, and vacate same.

Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 463.

Section 13 also grants the power "to provide for cleansing of the same."

The power thus given is broad and comprehensive. It would be unnecessary and quite impossible for the legislature to specify each and every method of improvement, or manner of cleansing the same. The power to otherwise improve and cleanse includes all methods that the common council deem wise.

Murphy v. Peoria, supra.

The effect upon the market value of property must be ascertained from evidence.

The court below, in granting the motion of appellee without hearing evidence, was compelled to assume the fact that the proposed improvement would have no effect upon the market value of the property assessed. This was erroneous.

Wilson v. Chicago Sanitary Dist. Trustees, supra.

The influence of the proposed improvement upon the market value of the property assessed in this case was clearly one for a jury, and to be determined upon evidence.

Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227; Kankakee Stone & Lime Co. v. Kankakee, 128 Ill. 176.

Messrs. Wilson, Moore & McIlvaine, for appellee:

The right to levy special assessments on private property depends upon the question of benefits; in other words, upon the question of compensation by increase in value of the land assessed, and special assessments can be maintained on no other theory.

If a special assessment were levied without benefits or without reference to benefits, it is then a tax pure and simple, and cannot be sustained unless uniform.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record is whether the municipal authorities in cities and villages, organized under the general law for the incorporation thereof, have power to provide that the cost of sprinkling the streets of the city or village shall be paid by special assessment. In other words, is the sprinkling of streets a local improvement within the meaning of the statute authorizing cities and villages to make local improvements by special assessment? Section 9, article 9, of the Constitution authorizes the general assembly to vest corporate authorities of cities, towns, and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessment or by special taxation of contiguous property, or otherwise; and, in pursuance thereof, the legislature has vested such authorities "with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or special taxation, or both, of contiguous property, on general taxation or otherwise as they shall by ordinance prescribe."

It is contended that under this statute the corporate authorities alone are to determine what is and is not a local improvement, and, they having determined in this case that the sprinkling of the streets designated in the ordinance was a local improvement, their decision is final, and not the subject of review. The case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. East St. Louis, 184 Ill. 656, is cited in support of this contention. There the city passed an ordinance for the construction of a viaduct in one of the streets of the city over the tracks of the railway, and also spanning Calokkia creek. The objection was that the building of the viaduct in the street was "not a local improvement within the meaning of the statute authorizing the levy of special assessments;" and it was held that, the city being empowered "to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave and otherwise improve streets," and "to construct and keep in repair bridges, viaducts and tunnels, and to regulate the use thereof" (Rev. Stat., pars. 7-28, § 1, art. 5, chap. 24), the city council had power to determine that the construction of the viaduct in the street was a local improvement, and to order the same to be paid for by special assessment. The language quoted by counsel was used in respect of the facts of that case, and, as applied thereto, was entirely accurate, but the decision cannot be regarded as authority for the contention in this case. The power of the city council to declare what shall be local improvements is necessarily implied from the power to make the same in the mode and by the means prescribed. But this implication can arise only in respect of improvements they are authorized to make by special assessment or special taxation. So long as the attempted exercise of the power relates to such public work as was within the legislative contemplation when giving the authority to the municipality, a reasonable exercise of the implied power in declaring such work a local improvement will be sustained (Bloomington v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 134 Ill. 451), and in such cases the method of construction, the materials used, and whether it shall be treated as a local improvement, to be paid for in whole or in part by special assessment or special taxation, or is to be paid for out of the general revenues of the city or village, are matters resting within the legislative discretion of the municipal authorities. Pagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. East St. Louis, 184 Ill. 656. Improvements authorized to be made by this species of taxation are public improvements (Cooley, Taxn. 67-416; Burroughs, Taxn. 10 et seq.; Davis v. Litchfield, 145 Ill. 827, 21 L. R. A. 563), and an attempt by the municipal authority to declare a purely private work a local improvement within the meaning of the statute would be ultra vires, and the courts would be compelled to so declare. A local improvement within the meaning of the statute is a public improvement which, by reason of its being confined to a locality, enhances the value of adjacent property as distinguished from benefits diffused by it throughout the municipality. The only basis upon which either special assessment or special taxation can be sustained is that from the proposed local improvement the property subjected to the tax or assessment will be enhanced in value to the extent of the burden imposed. Cooley, Taxn. chap. 20; Dill. Mun. Corp. 596; Davis v. Litchfield, supra; Kuehner v. Freeport, 148 Ill. 92, 17 L. R. A. 774; Chicago v. Larned, 34 Ill. 287; Chicago v. Baer, 41 Ill. 306. If, therefore, from an inspection of the ordinance authorizing the making of the improvement it appears, from the nature of the work proposed, that the market value of abutting or adjacent property would not be increased thereby, as a matter of law it would not be a local improvement within the meaning of the statute, and no declaration of the corporate authorities could make it so. On the other hand, if the property is or may be benefited by the improvement, the extent of such benefit, and hence the amount to be assessed upon the property in proceedings for special assessment, is a question of fact, to be determined in the mode prescribed by the statute. DeKoven v. Lake View, 181 Ill. 641.

It remains to consider whether the sprinkling of the streets as contemplated by the ordinance is a local improvement that may be made, and the expense thereof paid, by special assessment upon adjacent property. "It is," says Mr. Dillon, "a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessary or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 8; Wright v. Chicago, 20 Ill. 252; Eaton v. Chicago, 40 Ill. 514, 89 Am. Dec. 861; Cook County v. McCrea, 93 Ill. 236. The authority to municipalities to impose burdens upon persons or property is wholly statutory, and, where its exercise may result in divestiture or transfer of property, the right to exercise it must be clear, and strictly pursued; and this rule applies to proceedings under the taxing power, including special assessment and special taxation. Davis v. Litchfield, supra.

No express power is granted to make special assessment for the particular work proposed. But it is insisted that, as by clause 7, section 1, article 5, of the Act, power is given "to lay out, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave and otherwise improve streets," etc., by the words "or otherwise improve" power is conferred upon the municipal authorities to determine what character of improvement, other than those enumerated, shall be made; and, if they determine that the streets shall be sprinkled, it is therefore an improvement within the meaning of article 9 of the Act. This is a misapprehension. The city may undoubtedly, in the sense in which the word "improve" is here used, repair the streets, sprinkle, sweep, and cleanse them, as in their discretion the public necessity and convenience may require. But the term "local improvement," prior to the adoption of the constitution and passage of the act in question, had, by common usage, a well-defined meaning, and it will be presumed to have been employed in the sense thus attributed to it. It was understood, as applied to a street, as signifying the improvement of the street as such, and for the purposes for which it was designed, made in a particular locality, by reason of which the real property, abutting or adjacent, was specially benefited in its market value. Cooley, Taxn. 109, 110; Dill. Mun. Corp. 596, 597. This court, in numerous cases decided before the adoption of the present constitution, as well as in many since, gave the like signification to the term. Illinois & N. Canal Trustees v. Chicago, 12 Ill. 403; Higgins v. Chicago, 18 Ill. 276; Ottawa v. Macy, 20 Ill. 418; Lill v. Chicago, 29 Ill. 81; Chicago v. Larned, and Chicago v. Baer, supra; Scammon v. Chicago, 42 Ill. 193.

Further citation will be unnecessary. Used, as it is, in connection with special assessments, which are necessarily based upon the idea of equivalent benefits to the property owner, the idea of permanency in the improvement is necessarily involved. That is, the benefit must flow from the actual or presumptive betterment of the street, and must be of such character as to enhance the market value of the property. Kankakee Stone & Lime Co. v. Kankakee, 128 Ill. 176. It cannot, we think, in any just sense be said that street sprinkling is an improvement within the contemplation of article 9 of the Cities and Villages Act. In the nature of things, the sprinkling is only useful while the work is continued. In a few hours the beneficial effects are gone, and the property is worth no more than before the street was sprinkled. It is insisted, however, that all improvements—the building of sidewalks, the paving of streets, of however lasting material,—are evanescent, and that in a few years at most they will necessarily require renewing; and that it makes no difference whether it be water put upon the street, or wood or granite; that all alike are but temporary in character. In a sense this is true, but not in a practical sense. It is common experience that well-paved streets and convenient and durable sidewalks, furnishing access to property, do in fact enhance its market value. It is, however, insisted that the sprinkling of the street during the summer months renders the occupation of the adjacent property more enjoyable and comfortable, and that therefore the property is enhanced in value. Doubtlessly, the same result would follow by placing vases at convenient points on the street, to be filled every morning with fresh-cut flowers; or by open-air concerts, in which music should be selected with reference to the taste of the adjacent dwellers. So, the employment of an efficient police force, whereby greater safety was felt, would add to the enjoyment and comfort of persons residing upon the street. The proper watering and clipping of the grass upon lawn and terrace, the removal of garbage from the premises, besides saving expense to the occupant, would add to the enjoyment and, possibly, the healthfulness of the locality. These all might be improvements, and increase, while they continued, the desirability of property in their locality. But they are not improvements, either of the property or of the street, within the legislative contemplation when granting power to make local improvements by special assessment.

The tendency of municipal government to arrogate to itself power, and to encroach upon the rights of the citizen, has led to the establishment of salutary rules of construction, limiting their powers to those expressly granted, or arising by reasonable and necessary implication from the grant. It cannot, we think, be assumed that the legislature intended by the language employed to confer power upon the municipality to require work of the class provided for in this ordinance to be done by special assessment, even though it be held to be public work which the municipality is authorized to perform. Such power does not arise by implication from the powers expressly conferred, nor is it essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. We are of opinion that the county court decided correctly in annulling the assessment and dismissing the petition, and its judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. A person obtaining goods by fraudulent pretenses is guilty of a tortious taking and no demand for possession is necessary to enable the person defrauded to maintain replevin for them unless they have passed to a third person holding them bona fide for a valuable consideration without notice.
2. Concealment of insolvency with no reasonable expectation of paying renders a sale fraudulent and entitles the seller to possession as against the purchaser or his voluntary assignee.
3. A seller of goods procured from him by fraud has the burden of showing participation by a subsequent purchaser in the fraudulent acts by which the goods were procured.
4. A purchaser of goods is affected by the fraudulent acts and intents of the seller in procuring them from a third person if he has knowledge thereof or of the existence of such facts and circumstances as are naturally and justly calculated to awaken suspicion in the mind of an honest man of ordinary care and prudence and lead him to inquiry.
5. Persons who deal in goods obtained by a third person recklessly and with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would have put cautious and prudent men on inquiry are chargeable with the value of the goods obtained by them from the fraudulent purchaser which they convert to their own use although they have paid the full value and the property has passed beyond the reach of the process of the court.
6. An auctioneer who sells goods for a fraudulent purchaser thereof under such circumstances as charge him with notice that they have been obtained by fraud is liable for the value of the goods equally with the fraudulent purchaser and not merely for the amount of commissions received by him upon the sale, although he has accounted for the proceeds of such goods to his principal.
7. Proof that a pledgee of goods from a retail dealer knew that the latter was being pressed by his creditors and was pledging goods not paid for, that the goods were in larger quantities than was called for by the business, deposited in a warehouse away from such business with all marks erased from the original packages; and that the goods were transferred on such terms as precluded redemption without any inquiry on the part of such pledgee; and that the latter made false statements as to previous loans to a receiver of the property of the pledgor,—is sufficient to throw upon such pledgee the burden of explaining the transaction and showing himself to be a bona fide holder.

(October 2, 1898.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, dismissing a bill filed by creditors of the New England Shoe Company to reach assets which were alleged to have been transferred to certain of the other defendants in fraud of the company's creditors. Reversed.

Statement by Baker, District Judge:

This suit was brought in the court below by the Morrow Shoe Manufacturing Company, appellant, on its own behalf and for the benefit of all other creditors, against the New England Shoe Company, an insolvent corporation, which was impleaded with George P. Gore, H. H. Heimerdinger, Merrick F. Prouty, and Hiram B. Peabody, appellees herein, and certain others not parties to this appeal. The New England Shoe Company, an Illinois corporation, purported to be organized with an authorized capital of $50,000, divided into 500 shares of $100 each, of which 498 shares were owned by Charles C. Davis, who was its president and treasurer, one share was owned by his son, Charles A. Davis, who was its secretary, and one share was owned by Henry W. Sawyer. These three composed its board of directors. The bill was taken pro confesso against the New England Shoe Company and Charles C. Davis, and on final hearing it was dismissed as to the other defendants. The cause was heard and decided on its merits on the facts presented in the record, and the decree dismissing the bill was placed on the ground that notice or knowledge of the fraudulent acts and intent of the New England Shoe Company and of Charles C. Davis had not been sufficiently proven to justify a decree against any of the appellees.

The New England Shoe Company was organized August 20, 1887, with a nominal capital of $50,000. During its business existence, which was a little more than two years, there were only three meetings of the directors, the first for organization, August 29, 1887, and the other two, on March 28 and December 9, 1889, to adopt certain resolutions which C. C. Davis wished to have adopted. The other two directors paid no attention to the business affairs of the company, and acted simply to carry out the purposes of C. C. Davis. The company did a small retail business, under the sole management of C. C. Davis, in a basement on the northwest corner of State and Madison streets, in Chicago. The only other business done by it or them was to make the alleged fraudulent sales and pledge hereinafter mentioned. For about two years its purchases were made mostly, if not wholly, from or through the auction and commission house of George P. Gore & Co., in Chicago. During this time other purchases than those made from George P. Gore & Co. were made through this firm, which advanced the money to pay for them, and it deducted from the amount paid over to the manufacturer the same commission as on goods consigned to it. For about twelve years, and up to the latter part of 1888, Davis had been in the employ of Gore & Co. as a salesman and solicitor of consignments. In the latter part of 1888 he appeared to have dropped his connection with Gore & Co., and he began to make extensive purchases from manufacturers for the New England Shoe Company, independently of Gore & Co. In order to obtain credit he pretended that $30,000 of the company's capital stock had been paid in in cash, and was then in the business; that its business amounted to over $70,000 a year, and was highly profitable; that its stock on hand amounted to $25,000, and his and the company's debts to $500, all told, and that he was worth individually $38,000. By means of these representations, which were false and fraudulent, made to manufacturers and their agents, either directly or through the reports of commercial agencies, he was enabled to obtain large quantities of goods for the shoe company on credit from numerous manufacturers. Forty-three of them identified goods that they had shipped to it, and which were unpaid for, among those of which the receiver took possession in the Sibley warehouse. These goods, with some others similarly identified, and found in a loft which had been rented by the shoe company, brought at the receiver's sale $20,912.97. These goods had been recently bought, and, with the exception of perhaps $3,000 worth, were wholly unpaid for. The complainant and other intervening creditors have proved unpaid bills to the amount of between $15,000 and $18,000. About the time that the goods so ordered began to arrive, Davis began to dispose of them otherwise than by sales in the basement store. He made these sales with a studied purpose to keep the parties from whom the goods were purchased in ignorance of what he was doing. How many channels he employed for this purpose is not known. Three are clearly shown. Beginning with December 14, 1888, and ending with December 11, 1889, he sold through the auction house of George P. Gore & Co. goods, which, at their auction prices, netted $14,555.48. Prior to June 22, 1889, these sales amounted only to $1,650.94, and were made for account of Charles C. Davis individually. After that date the sales were made for account of the New England Shoe Company, and the bulk of them, amounting to $11,235.75, were made between October 1 and December 11, 1889. A comparison of the checks drawn by George P. Gore & Co. in settlement of these sales with the credit entries in C. C. Davis' bank account shows that he deposited to his individual account in the First National Bank in Chicago $9,610.75 of the proceeds of these sales, and that the payments of $1,200 and $425 in settlement of the last two sales were not deposited there. Besides the proceeds of these sales through Gore & Co., he made other large deposits on his individual account, viz.: October 9, $1,783.35; November 2, $2,038.04; November 26, $2,500; November 29, $1,978.21; a total of $8,294.60. All of these deposits, except that of November 2d, correspond with payments made to Davis by Heimerdinger, through George P. Gore & Co. These goods were sold almost entirely at auction, along with other and larger consignments, some of which were on account of manufacturers. The prices obtained were fair auction prices, not jobber's nor manufacturer's prices, running sometimes as much as 20 per cent below the prices at which jobbers ordinarily sold to retailers. The sales were quick, and somewhat forced, and prices corresponded. They were largely below the prices at which retailers could purchase from wholesale dealers.

NOTE.—The above case very strongly presents the rights of defrauded sellers of goods as against third parties who have obtained the goods with reason to suspect the fraud, and also as to an auctioneer who sells them with such notice. As to the effect of purchasing goods without intention to pay for them, see note to Childs v. Merrill (Vt.) 14 L. R. A. 264.

The firm of Gore & Co. consists of George P. Gore alone, but Prouty and Heimerdinger respectively conducted, at Gore's store, businesses at his expense for storeroom, clerk hire, and capital, and at his risk for credit, every transaction including somewhere in its course a sale by Gore & Co. on commission. Prouty had the general management of Gore & Co.'s business; giving special attention to boots and shoes, and personally directed most of these sales. He drew a fixed salary as manager, and at the end of each year had an accounting with Gore & Co., as the result of which frequently an additional allowance was made to him on a basis which he was unwilling or unable to explain.

Besides the $14,555.48 of sales made through Gore & Co.'s auction house, Davis, in the name of the New England Shoe Company, sold directly to Prouty, in Prouty's branch of the business, within two weeks of the failure, goods for which he received in advance $4,892.95. One purchase, consisting of 171 cases of shoes, was made by Prouty November 26th or 27th, for which he gave $4,858.48, after some bickering, in which an auctioneer of Gore & Co. was employed to make the final bargain; and the last purchase, of December 5th, within a week of the collapse, consisted of 258 cases of rubbers, for which Davis received $1,103.47. Both sales were made at low prices, and were paid for December 7, 1889. Heimerdinger, in his branch of the business carried on at the auction house of Gore & Co., made five purchases through Davis of the New England Shoe Company's goods, beginning September 17 and ending November 30, 1889, paying in all $7,310.83. Heimerdinger intimates that these purchases belonged to that class of his business which consisted in buying "bankrupt lots, and lots that go at sacrifice prices." Heimerdinger and Prouty were well acquainted with Davis, and knew the place and nature of his business. In October, November, and the first few days of December, 1889, Davis thus sold at low prices to or through Heimerdinger, Prouty, and Gore goods of the New England Shoe Company which netted him $23,509.08, and for which the company evidently was indebted in a much larger sum. To the books of account, which appear to have been of the most meager and imperfect character, no one had access except Davis himself, and they disappeared when he did. Once during the latter part of October, and again in November, 1889, for several days on each occasion, he employed Edward Stephenson, an accountant, to write up the books. On the occasion of his first service, Stephenson entered between ten and fifteen invoices of goods bought on credit, and again in November he entered twenty or more additional invoices for larger amounts than those which he had entered in October, and about two thirds from parties who did not appear to have dealt with the company before. He estimates that these invoices amounted to between $50,000 and $60,000. All the purchases which Stephenson found there were on credit, while all the sales made by Davis were for cash. The reason assigned by Davis for making such large purchases of goods was that he intended and was endeavoring to rent a storeroom on the grade of the street, and failing to accomplish this, it became necessary to make sale of the goods.

From the Morrow Shoe Manufacturing Company, complainant, Davis bought on behalf of the New England Shoe Company, in November, 1889, $2,418 worth of goods, which were shipped to it on the 12th and 18th of November; and they have never been paid for. Intervening petitioners have proved claims to the amount of over $18,000 for goods, the greater part of which were shipped in October and November, and are all unpaid for. These evidently constitute only a small part of the goods so ordered and received. Some of Davis' purchases were made from salesmen who came to his store, and he frequently requested them not to let other people know that he was buying of them. He made several visits to the east. Near the end of July he was in Philadelphia, where he placed an order of about $1,700, and gave a flattering, but untruthful, account of the condition and prospects of the basement store, with no allusion to any contemplated grade store. He asked Mr. Hill, to whom he gave the order, to put no marks to indicate the manufacturers, either on the goods or the boxes inclosing them. Early in November he visited the office of the Morrow Shoe Manufacturing Company in New York, and ordered goods which he said he needed for the holiday trade. He there represented that the New England Shoe Company had a paid-up capital exceeding all its liabilities, and that he personally was worth $38,000 over all his debts. A few days later he was in Boston, where he placed a number of orders, and represented that his business was prosperous.

On the 30th of October, 1889, at the New England Shoe Company's store and in the Palmer House, Chicago, in order to gain credit and to procure the Hocker-Manus Shoe Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, to manufacture and deliver certain goods which had been previously ordered. Davis represented to an agent of the Cincinnati house that the statement he had made to a salesman was correct; that he was worth $30,000; that he owed little or nothing on his stock; that he had fully $30,000 worth of stock; that he had $2,000 worth of Chicago street-railway bonds, and $2,500 in the bank.

During the two or three months preceding the failure, Davis was rapidly filling up with shoes bought on credit a loft in the rear of 113 State street, some distance from the basement store. No business was done at this loft, to which nobody, except Davis, ever had access, except on rare occasions. He began to occupy it about May or June, but the most of the goods stored there came in within a month or two prior to December 11, 1889. Prouty was there in August, and again in October, to examine some of the goods stored there, which were offered for sale by Davis. He saw that there were more goods there in October than in August; "that the room was pretty well filled; that the rubbers were piled high, and also some of the shoes." The room was 60 feet long by about 30 feet wide and something more than 16 feet high. The cases of goods were mostly brought there on railroad trucks. About December 1st, after the large quantities taken therefrom to the auction house of Gore & Co., "the room was pretty full, boxes piled nearly to the ceiling." About the same time the stock in the basement store was gradually running down, receiving small additions which Davis himself brought over from time to time from the loft.

In November, 1889, a traveling salesman happened to see in a retail store in Indianapolis some goods which his employer, the Heywood Boot & Shoe Company, had sold to the New England Shoe Company. The Indianapolis merchant told him that he had bought them from George P. Gore & Co. at a less price than that for which the Heywood Company had sold them to the New England Company. Upon the salesman reporting this to his employer, an attorney for some of the eastern creditors was sent to Chicago to inquire into the matter, and Davis was invited to a conference on December 4, 1889. After indulging in some abuse and vituperation, Davis stated that a little while after receiving the Heywood Company's goods he had at Heimerdinger's request, and as a matter of favor to him, let him have a small quantity of goods, including some of the Heywood manufacture, which Heimerdinger needed to fill an order from a western customer of his; that a few weeks afterwards Heimerdinger came to him, saying his western customer had refused the goods, and asking him to take them back, which he refused to do, and that Helmerdinger thereupon peddled them out for whatever he could get, and in this way some of them had probably come to the hands of the Indianapolis dealer. He referred the inquirers to Helmerdinger for corroboration. The next day, another customer, who had learned of the discovery and of Davis' explanation, called on Helmerdinger, who corroborated the story, adding that it was a trifling matter of a few pairs of shoes, only a single case, and that was the whole basis for whatever rumors might be afloat of Davis' forcing his goods off through Gore & Co's auction sales; and as a friend he further assured Mr. Morrow, who represented appellant, that Davis was sound and trustworthy, and that there was nothing in any rumors unfavorable to him. This story was wholly unfounded. Helmerdinger has testified to all of his transactions with Davis and the New England Shoe Company, and there is none of this kind among them. Helmerdinger, while testifying, fails to give any explanation or excuse for his repeating the next day the same fabricated story previously told by Davis. Both, on different occasions, and when apart repeat the same story, each knowing it to be false.

Mr. Barrett, a shoemaker who worked for the New England Shoe Company, testified that somewhere along in November and December, shortly before the failure, Davis used to give him a note sometimes, and tell him to go up on Fifth avenue, and watch for Mr. Prouty coming down from Wells street depot, and to give the note to Mr. Prouty; that Davis told him not to go to Gore's, but to meet Mr. Prouty on Fifth avenue, between Madison and Wells street depot; that he did this two or three times in pursuance of instructions from Davis; that Mr. Prouty took these letters from him, and said nothing. Mr. Prouty made no denial of these occurrences while on the witness stand, and offered no explanation.

The stock of goods in the basement store was seized by the sheriff on December 10, 1889, by virtue of two executions issued upon judgments confessed by the New England Shoe Company on the same day; one in favor of Van Weisenfluh for $5,530.33, and the other in favor of Cudworth for $5,000 and costs. Van Weisenfluh, in his testimony, describes himself as a speculator in real estate and horses, and had been employed by Peabody in his stock exchange, commonly known as a "bucket shop." Cudworth, who says his business in speculating, was, like Peabody, a creditor to a large amount of the unfortunate jewelry house of Clapp & Davies, whose affairs are under consideration by the Illinois supreme court, and was employed by Peabody to close out its stock. He declined, by advice of counsel, to answer questions touching his connection with the Clapp & Davies suit. He had known Peabody for ten years, and he says "some might call it intimately." All three had been at one time or another in the shoe trade, and had become familiar with the Gore establishment, and also with Davis. As no appeal has been taken from so much of the decree as dismisses the bill against Cudworth and Van Weisenfluh, it is not necessary to go into the facts relating to their claim against the New England Shoe Company, or their relations with Davis. It is sufficient to say that their dealings with Peabody, Davis, and the New England Shoe Company are calculated to arouse suspicion.

On the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 9th of December, 1889, Davis' son and another young man were employed in the State street loft scraping off the names and marks from the boxes there stored, and as fast as they were thus prepared they were carried to the Hiram Sibley warehouse, on the north side, only about eight cases being left in the loft. All of the 686 packages removed from the loft to the warehouse had been sold and shipped to the New England Shoe Company. Davis took warehouse receipts in his individual name for 513 cases, and in the name of the New England Shoe Company for 174 cases only. These receipts show that the last delivery to the warehouse was made on Monday, December 9, 1889, the same day on which the attorney of Cudworth and Van Weisenfluh received from Davis, for them, the judgment notes upon which, the next day, judgments were entered, and executions were issued and levies were made on all the goods in the basement store. On Tuesday, December 10, 1889, the appellee Peabody arrived in Chicago. He had been in New York for about a week preceding. For nearly a year prior thereto he had been absent on a European tour. He reached his office about noon, and found Davis waiting for him there, with the nine receipts issued by the Sibley warehouse, and which Davis claimed covered goods worth from $35,000 to $40,000, on which he asked a loan of $20,000. After a little conversation, Peabody asked his bookkeeper if they had that amount to spare, and being informed that they had he took the receipts, and with his bookkeeper went to the warehouse, and there inspected the cases, just enough, he says, to ascertain that there were probably about as many cases as the receipts called for, and then returned to his office. He does not say whether he noticed that the names and marks were all recently scraped off the case or not, although the evidence shows that such scraping was plainly apparent. In about five minutes after his return to his office, Davis came in again, and the loan was at once agreed upon. The bookkeeper wrote out a check for $20,000, payable to the order of the New England Shoe Company. Davis took the check, and gave the New England Shoe Company's note for ninety days at 7 per cent, pledging the receipts as security, and indorsing the note as guarantor. The note authorized its holder to sell the receipts before maturity if in his opinion the securities had depreciated, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the note and expenses. Davis then went away. Peabody left his office soon after, and went to the bank, and was at the paying teller's window while Davis was receiving $20,000 in currency for the check. His presence was noted on the check of the paying teller. Peabody claims that his presence was a mere coincidence. He says that on his way to the hotel he had stopped at the bank to call upon some of the officers of the bank, who were his friends, and that seeing, Davis there, from a mere impulse of sociability he stepped up near to him. He claims that he did not know whether Davis was getting the cash on his check or not, nor did he make inquiry. He admits that if he had known it was his check, he would have thought it a little irregular to draw out the currency instead of depositing the check; and if he had known that Davis kept his own account there he would have had a decided suspicion of something wrong. Peabody says that when Davis first applied for the loan he told him he wanted it in order to avail himself of a large discount which some of his creditors had offered him if he would cash their claims. He said that some of his creditors had offered him as high as 10 per cent, some as high as 13 per cent, for cash. He says that it would be an irregular way of doing to get all the currency into his hands, instead of depositing the $20,000 check, and then drawing his own checks in favor of his creditors. The form of the note was notice to Peabody that the goods which it pledged belonged to the New England Shoe Company, and not to Davis, its president. He also admits that he was so informed by Davis. The receipts for 512 cases of the goods pledged to Peabody were issued to Davis individually. Peabody did not ask nor obtain any explanation of this. He made no inquiry whether the directors of the New England Shoe Company had authorized Davis to pledge its stock in trade. As a matter of fact the pledge was never authorized by the directors. Peabody says that Davis told him that the goods pledged were not all paid for. The receipts issued to Davis individually were indorsed by him in his individual name only. Peabody admits that he was told by Davis, before the receipts were pledged to him, that all the goods covered by them belonged to the New England Shoe Company. He told the receiver that when applying for the loan Davis told him that some of his creditors were pressing him. He afterwards wished to retract this statement, and it was crossed out of the written memorandum which the receiver took down. He denied in his interview with the receiver that he had ever before loaned Davis any money, but when testifying in his own behalf he claimed that he had made him a previous loan of $5,000. Peabody admits that he had been in the basement store operated by Davis for the New England Shoe Company. Before making the loan, he made no inquiries about the business of the shoe company. He says: "I asked Davis how he happened to put his goods in the warehouse; why he hadn't put them in the store. He said that he had engaged a store on State street, a large store, and had got disappointed in it, and so put them in the warehouse."

Before Woods, Circuit Judge, and Bunn and Baker, District Judges.

Messrs. E. O. Brown and H. H. Miller for appellant.

Messrs. F. J. Smith and W. J. Foster for appellees.

Baker, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by counsel for the appellant that the court below erred in dismissing the bill against the appellees for the reason that the evidence clearly shows that the New England Shoe Company and Charles C. Davis, its president, obtained large quantities of goods from the appellant and numerous other parties by means of false and fraudulent representations, without any intention of paying for the goods so obtained, and that the appellees had actual or constructive notice of the fraudulent acts and intent of the New England Shoe Company and of its president. The charges made against the appellees Gore, Heimerdinger, and Prouty, by the bill of complaint, and the proofs in their support, have no immediate connection with those made against the appellee Peabody. The case against Gore, Heimerdinger, and Prouty was tried in the court below, and has been argued here by the same counsel; while the case against Peabody was tried in the court below, and has been argued here by counsel solely representing him. It will be most convenient to follow the same course in determining this appeal.

It is suggested, rather than argued, by counsel for Gore, Heimerdinger, and Prouty, that the bill of complaint is not broad enough, even if the evidence justified it, to warrant a decree against them compelling them to account for the proceeds of the goods belonging to the New England Shoe Company which are traced into their possession. The suggestion would have deserved careful consideration if the question had been called to the attention of the court below. If the objection had been presented below, the trial court could, and in furtherance of justice, should, have permitted the bill to be amended to conform to the case made by the proofs upon such terms as were just and equitable. Neale v. Neale, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 1, 19 L. ed. 590; The Tremolo Patent, 90 U. S. 28 Wall. 518, 23 L. ed. 97; McArtee v. Engart, 13 Ill. 242. Under the circumstances the bill ought to be treated as amended here, so far as needful, to enable the court to decide the case on its merits. The practice of presenting in the first instance in this court some alleged defect or insufficiency in the bill of complaint or answer which would have been properly amendable in the court below is not to be commended.

There is no serious controversy touching the false and fraudulent representations of Davis, as the manager and president of the New England Shoe Company, in obtaining goods from the appellant and numerous other parties, nor in regard to his intention not to pay for them, nor that the corporation was insolvent. The systematic frauds of the one and the insolvency of the other are established by the most abundant and convincing evidence. Indeed, they were not controverted by counsel for appellee, who made no attempt to deny or palliate the criminal conduct of Davis, who, upon the collapse of the New England Shoe Company, fled to Canada, presumably to avoid criminal prosecution. The purchaser who by fraud purchases goods has no protection in law against the party defrauded. The seller, on discovering the fraud, may affirm the sale and sue for the price, or he may disaffirm it, and reclaim the goods, or he may proceed criminally. Donahoe v. Parwell, 93 U. S. 631, 23 L. ed. 993; Parriah v. Thurston, 87 Ind. 437; Gray v. St. John, 85 Ill. 239; Doven v. Schuler, 41 Ill. 193; Blanchett v. Kimbark, 118 Ill. 121; Sargent v. Sturm, 28 Cal. 359, 83 Am. Dec. 118; Tilcomb v. Wood, 38 Me. 563; Hill v. Freeman, 8 Cush. 259; Nichols v. Michael, 23 N. Y. 266, 80 Am. Dec. 259. A person obtaining goods by fraudulent pretenses is guilty of a tortious taking, and no demand for possession is necessary to enable the person defrauded to maintain replevin for them, unless they have passed to a third person holding them bona fide for a valuable consideration, without notice. Bussing v. Rice, 2 Cush. 48; Thurston v. Blanchard, 23 Pick. 18; Butters v. Haughton, 42 Ill. 18, 89 Am. Dec. 40; Bruner v. Dyball, 42 Ill. 84; Ryan v. Brant, Id. 78. When no questions are asked, no false pretenses and no artifices are resorted to, mere silence is not fraud; but concealment of insolvency, with no reasonable expectation of paying, renders a sale fraudulent, and the seller is entitled to possession as against the purchaser or his voluntary assignee. Davis v. Stewart, 8 Fed. Rep. 503.

The New England Shoe Company and Davis, its president, according to the undisputed evidence, obtained possession tortiously and wrongfully of the goods which subsequently came into the possession of the appellees. Unless the goods came into their possession bona fide, for a valuable consideration, without notice, their possession was wrongful, and they must return the goods, or account for their reasonable value. The appellees assert that they were bona fide purchasers for value, without notice, and that, consequently they acquired an unimpeachable title to the goods. It is not enough that the appellees were purchasers for value. They must also be innocent purchasers. The law raises this presumption in their favor, and casts the burden on the appellant to show that the appellees were guilty of participation in the fraudulent acts of Davis. The law justly imposes on every person the duty of exercising ordinary care and prudence in his business transactions. It imputes to him notice or knowledge of every fact which an ordinarily cautious and prudent man, in the same situation, would naturally have observed. He may not except at his peril, purposely or negligently omit to give heed to what is audible and visible by the exercise of ordinary care. He must not fail to make such inquiries as an ordinarily cautious and prudent man, under the same circumstances, would have made. It follows that the appellees will be affected by the fraudulent acts and intent of Davis, if they had knowledge of them, or of the existence of such facts and circumstances as were naturally and justly calculated to awaken suspicion in the mind of an honest man of ordinary care and prudence, and lead him to inquiry. The law is well stated by Chancellor Zabriske:

"Any sale in which the object of the debtor that prompts and determines him to make it is to hinder, delay, or in any way put off his creditors, is void if made to any one having knowledge of his intent; and this knowledge need not be by actual positive information or notice, but will be inferred from the knowledge, by the purchaser, of facts and circumstances sufficient to raise such suspicions as to put him on inquiry."

Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 156; Clements v. Moore, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 299, 18 L. ed. 786; Bartles v. Gibbon, 17 Fed. Rep. 293; The Holiday Case, 27 Fed. Rep. 880; Singer v. Jacobs, 11 Fed. Rep. 559; Walker v. Collins, 4 U. S. App. 406, 50 Fed. Rep. 737.

Gore, Heimerdinger, and Prouty had long been intimately associated together, all occupying and doing business in the same rooms, and with and through each other. All their business was carried on through the books of George P. Gore & Co. They were well acquainted with C. C. Davis, who had been employed as a salesman and solicitor of consignments in the auction house of Gore & Co. for fully twelve years. They were acquainted with the basement store of the New England Shoe Company, and its business as conducted and managed by Davis. Mr. Prouty was the general manager of Gore & Co. and had almost exclusive control of the shoe business conducted by it. Heimerdinger and Prouty knew, as early as September, 1889, that Davis was storing large quantities of goods in an out-of-the-way loft on State street. They say that Davis gave as a reason why he had bought and stored in the loft such large quantities of goods that he had arranged for a grade store on State street, which he had been disappointed in securing. He gave this as the reason for selling in the course of about sixty days before the failure, to or through Gore, Heimerdinger, and Prouty, at prices below their cost, goods which netted over $23,000. This story of a grade store was accepted without inquiry or question as a sufficient explanation for the purchase and storing in the loft of goods which certainly aggregated more than $50,000 in value. They knew of the purchase and storing of these goods. They knew that Davis was selling at Gore's auction house, or to them personally, goods in large quantities, and at prices below the price for which he could obtain them from wholesale dealers. These sales were made to or through them in large quantities and in rapid succession, so that they knew, or ought to have known, that they were being made by a man anxious to convert the goods into money. Heimerdinger gave a false and fabricated account of his dealings with Davis. Prouty received letters from Davis under circumstances of suspicion, and failed to produce them, or to give any explanation of their contents. There is no evidence that Davis arranged for or engaged a large storeroom on State street, and the story was evidently devised as a part of his scheme of fraud. These facts and circumstances, with many others disclosed in the statement of the case, which were within the knowledge of these parties, were clearly sufficient to have put them on inquiry. The mind cannot well avoid the conclusion that if they did know of the fraudulent purposes of Davis it was because they were willfully blind. Such facility of belief, it has been well said, invites fraud, and may justly be suspected of being its accomplice.

When the complainant learned that a few shoes, which it had sold to the New England Shoe Company, had been sold by it through Gore & Co's auction house to a shoe dealer in Indianapolis for less than their cost, it created such suspicion of fraud that an attorney was sent from Boston to Chicago to investigate the matter. This single fact was sufficient to create suspicion in the minds of the eastern creditors of Davis, and to cause inquiry. The numerous facts calculated to excite suspicion known to the appellees were disregarded on the pretense of Davis that he had failed to secure the storeroom which he claimed to have arranged for or engaged. When the facts and circumstances are such as to put a reasonably prudent and cautious man on inquiry, that obligation is not satisfied by an inquiry addressed to the chief actor in the suspected fraud, who has every motive for concealing the truth, when better and more reliable sources of information are open to him. Whether these parties were guilty of actual participation in the fraudulent scheme of Davis or not, they certainly did deal in the goods obtained by fraud recklessly, and with guilty knowledge, or, which is the same thing, with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would have put prudent and cautious men on inquiry. Heimerdinger and Prouty bought the goods of the New England Shoe Company, through Davis, under such circumstances as to charge them with knowledge of the fraud of the shoe company and its president. On the plainest principles of equity they are chargeable with the value of the goods obtained by them from Davis and the shoe company, and which they have converted to their own use. Although they may have paid the full value, and the property may have passed beyond the reach of the process of the court, equity regards them as trustees, and charges them accordingly. The cardinal principle in all such cases is that the property obtained by fraud shall not be placed beyond the reach of the party defrauded, either by the fraudulent vendee or others chargeable with the knowledge of the fraud. To permit it would be to allow the party to profit by his fraud. Clements v. Moore, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 299, 18 L. ed. 786.

Gore intermeddled with these goods by selling them for Davis as an auctioneer, under such circumstances as to charge him with notice that they had been obtained by fraud, and the question remains whether such agent and auctioneer, who has sold goods and accounted for the proceeds to the guilty principal in the fraud, can be compelled to account to the parties defrauded for the goods or their value. That such auctioneer can be compelled to account to the extent of the commissions received and retained by him is settled by authority, and is not open to debate. Can he be compelled to account to the parties defrauded for the proceeds of the goods after he has accounted to the party from whom he received them? On principle, he ought to be held to account. Having sold the goods, and put them beyond the reach of the parties aggrieved, with notice of the fraud, he occupies no better situation than his bailor. He is chargeable on the principle that he knowingly aided and assisted the fraudulent vendee in depriving the vendor of the opportunity to reclaim his property. He thereby becomes a particeps criminis with the fraudulent vendee, and is liable for the value of the goods equally with him.

It is firmly settled that if an agent delivers to his principal money or property after demand and notice that they belong to another, he will be compelled to account therefor to the true owner. Payment after demand and notice is wrongful. Garland v. Salem Bank, 9 Mass. 408, 6 Am. Dec. 86; Jefts v. York, 10 Cush. 392, 12 Cush. 196. Having knowledge that the goods had been obtained by fraud, it became the duty of Gore not to meddle with them, or, having received them, to retain them or their proceeds for the benefit of the true owners. Equity regards the fraudulent vendee as holding the goods in trust for the party defrauded. It has been held, where an agent aids a trustee in making or procuring the conversion or unauthorized transfer of property held in trust, that he is liable for the loss sustained by the cestui que trust, although he acted in the matters of the agency without benefit or profit to himself. Caulkins v. Memphis Gaslight Co., 85 Tenn. 688. A fortiori, the agent who, with notice of the fraud, aids the fraudulent vendee in putting the property beyond the reach of its true owners, ought to be liable for the value of the property thus wrongfully diverted. Hoffman v. Carou, 20 Wend. 22, 22 Wend. 285; Mechem, Ag. § 915. This case does not fall within the principle which ruled the cases of Lamb v. Stone, 11 Pick. 527; Wellington v. Small, 3 Cush. 145, 50 Am. Dec. 719; Bradley v. Fuller, 118 Mass. 239; Tasker v. Moss, 82 Ind. 62, and Blair v. Smith, 114 Ind. 114.

These cases hold that a creditor who has no interest in nor lien upon the property of his debtor cannot maintain an action at law against a person who has accepted a conveyance of the debtor's property for the purpose of defrauding his creditor, after such fraudulent grantee has conveyed the property to another at the instance and for the benefit of the debtor, without retaining any portion of it, or receiving any benefit from it. In such cases it is held that the injury complained of is too remote, indefinite, and contingent. The property belonged to the debtor, and the creditor had no special property or interest in nor claim on the property fraudulently conveyed which could be injuriously affected or destroyed by the act of the fraudulent grantee. The most that the creditor can claim in such a case is that he intended to attach or levy on the property, and that the wrongful act of the fraudulent vendee has prevented him from executing his intention. This is an injury so remote, uncertain, and contingent, that it affords no ground for relief in an action at law. In the case at bar the property had been obtained by fraud from the creditors who are prosecuting this bill, and Gore, with knowledge of that fact, accepted it, and for his own profit sold the goods at auction, thus placing them beyond reclamation. Here the creditors in equity and good conscience remained the owners of the property, which he wrongfully sold and converted. While the bill is filed by a single creditor, the suit is brought and prosecuted for the benefit of all the creditors whose property was obtained by fraud; and in this property thus obtained the creditors have such special title and interest in common as to enable them to charge every person as trustee who has wrongfully dealt with it with knowledge of the fraud. Gore must, therefore, account for the goods received by him from Davis on account of the New England Shoe Company, which were sold by him as auctioneer.

Peabody invokes for his protection the claim that he received the warehouse receipts covering from $35,000 to $40,000 worth of goods in good faith to secure a loan of $20,000 made by him to the New England Shoe Company. The evidence shows that Peabody was a man of large and varied business experience. At different times in his life he had been engaged in dealings in bucket shops, in buying boots and shoes, in purchasing jewelry from falling concerns and at bankrupt sales, while at and for some time before the transactions in question he was a capitalist engaged in loaning money. He had been acquainted with Davis for twenty years. He had visited the basement store of the New England Shoe Company, and did not know of its having any other. He testifies that at one time he had loaned Davis $5,000, but previously, in an interview sought by him with the receiver of the New England Shoe Company, he denied that he had ever previously loaned Davis any money. He arrived in Chicago on the 10th day of December, 1889, and went immediately to his office, where he found Davis awaiting him. Davis had visited Peabody's office a number of times within a few days preceding his return, and in conversation with his confidential clerk and bookkeeper had expressed anxiety to see Peabody. Davis at once told Peabody that he wanted to borrow some money, and he exhibited the nine warehouse receipts on which he asked a loan of $20,000. After a little conversation, Peabody asked his bookkeeper if he had that amount to spare, and, on being informed that he had, he took the receipts, and with his bookkeeper went to the warehouse, and inspected the cases of goods, and returned to his office. The goods were in the original cases, and the names and marks had all been recently scraped off from the cases. The evidence shows that the scraping was fresh, and plainly apparent, and must have been observed by any one giving the least attention. In about five minutes after his return to his office, Davis called again, and the loan was at once agreed on. The bookkeeper wrote the check for $20,000, payable to the order of the shoe company. Davis took the check, and gave the shoe company's note for ninety days at 7 per cent, pledging the receipts as security, and indorsing the note as guarantor. The note authorized its holder to sell the receipts before its maturity if, in his opinion, the securities had depreciated, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the note and expenses. Peabody was present at the bank when Davis drew $20,000 in currency on the check. When Davis applied for the loan he told Peabody that he wanted it to avail himself of a large discount which some of his creditors had offered him if he would cash their claims. Peabody told the receiver that when Davis was asking for the loan he stated that some of his creditors were pressing him. Before making the loan he made no inquiry concerning the business or condition of the shoe company. He asked Davis how he happened to put his goods in a warehouse, and claims that Davis told him that he had engaged a large store on State street, and had been disappointed in getting it, and so had put them in the warehouse. The foregoing facts, with others disclosed in the statement of the case, raise a strong suspicion against the bona fides of the transaction between Davis and Peabody. His statement to the receiver that he had never loaned Davis money on any former occasion is proved to have been untrue by his own admission under oath. A false statement is always suggestive of fraud. He knew that Davis was being pressed by his creditors, and was urgent to secure money by pledging goods, which he knew were not paid for. The large quantity of goods, the place of their deposit, the defacing of all marks from the original packages, the pretense of Davis that he had engaged a large storeroom, which he had failed to secure, the transfer of nearly $40,000 worth of goods on such terms as precluded their redemption, and the failure to make any inquiry are a few of the circumstances, calculated to create a strong doubt of the integrity of the transaction between Davis and Peabody. "They threw on Peabody the duty of making a full explanation, and the burden of proof to sustain it." Clements v. Moore, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 299, 815, 18 L. ed. 786, 789; Piddock v. Brown, 3 P. Wms. 289; Wharton v. May, 5 Ves. Jr. 49; Zook v. Simonson, 72 Ind. 83. He has wholly failed to produce any evidence to relieve the transaction of the strong doubts of its integrity which surround it. The title of his pledgor was fraudulent and voidable, and, if Peabody is to be permitted to defeat the prior rights of the parties defrauded by Davis, it can only be done when on the whole evidence it is made to appear that he was a bona fide purchaser for value. If, on the whole case, strong doubts of the integrity of the transaction exist, the prior rights of Davis' creditors will prevail.

The evidence makes a case which fully satisfies us that the proceeds arising from the sale of the goods pledged by Davis must, so far as necessary, be applied to the payment of the appellant's claims. It is urged that the exigencies of business in great commercial centers justify less inquiry into the title and ownership of personal property offered for pledge or sale than would be exacted elsewhere. If good faith and honest dealings are to be maintained, if business is not to degenerate into robbery, the courts must with undiminished hand strip the mask of hypocrisy from the face of fraud, whether practiced in city or hamlet. The transactions of great commercial centers furnish abundant facilities for the practice of fraud, and courts ought to scrutinize them with a jealous solicitude to defeat the wrong, and to vindicate the right.

The bill fails to allege that the plaintiff had prosecuted its claim to judgment, and had issued an execution thereon, and had the same returned nulla bona. For this reason the bill of complaint is insufficient within the doctrine of Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 35 L. ed. 358, and Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 37 L. ed. 804.

It is therefore adjudged that the decree herein be reversed, but at the costs of the appellant, and that the cause be remanded to the court below, with leave to the complainant to amend its bill of complaint within thirty days after the judgment herein shall be certified to the court below; and, if the complainant shall fail to amend its bill of complaint within the time herein allowed, the same shall be dismissed without prejudice.

Bunn, District Judge, dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the conclusions reached by a majority of the court in this case. I think the evidence hardly more than sufficient to raise a suspicion of fraud as against the appellees, without proving its existence, and that the decree of the circuit court should be affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on March 9, 1894, Baker, District Judge, on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

The appellees have filed petitions for a rehearing, which they have supported by elaborate briefs. We have given their petitions and briefs attentive consideration, and find no error pointed out which would justify the court in granting them a rehearing. The grounds upon which our decision is rested are fully stated in the opinion heretofore filed, to which we still adhere, and no good purpose will be subserved by adding anything to what is there stated. The petitions of the appellees are therefore overruled. The appellant has filed a petition for a rehearing and a modification of the opinion of the court by striking out of the same the following:

"The bill fails to allege that the plaintiff had prosecuted its claim to judgment, and had issued an execution thereon, and had the same returned nulla bona. For this reason the bill is insufficient within the doctrine of Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 35 L. ed. 358, and Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 37 L. ed. 804.

The appellant further asks that the order of the court be modified to read as follows:

"That the decrees herein entered respectively on the 28th day of April, 1892, dismissing the bill of complaint as to the defendants Gore, Prouty, and Heimerdinger, and on the 9th day of May, 1892, dismissing the said bill as to Hiram B. Peabody be reversed at the costs of said appellees, and that said cause be remanded to the court below for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion, and with leave to complainant to amend its bill as it may be advised within thirty days after the judgment herein shall be certified to said court."

Counsel for the appellant insist that the suit is brought under Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 32, § 25, and that under this section it is unnecessary to the maintenance of the suit that the claim should have been reduced into judgment and an execution issued thereon and returned nulla bona. This section provides that: "If any corporation, or its authorized agents shall do, or refrain from doing any act which shall subject it to forfeiture of its charter or corporate powers, or shall allow any execution or decree of any court of record, for a payment of money after demand made by the officer to be returned on property found, or to remain unsatisfied for not less than ten days after such demand, or shall dissolve or cease doing business leaving debts unpaid, suits in equity may be brought against all persons who are stockholders at the time, or liable in any way for the debts of the corporation, by joining the corporation in such suits; . . . and courts of equity shall have full power, on good cause shown, to dissolve or close up the business of any corporation, to appoint a receiver therefor, etc."

It is firmly settled that under this section it is not necessary to the maintenance of a suit in equity in the courts of the state that the claim of the creditor should have been reduced into judgment, and an execution issued thereon and returned nulla bona. A suit in equity may be maintained in a court of the state by a simple contract creditor, who holds neither a general nor a specific lien against a corporation which is insolvent and has ceased to do business, leaving debts unpaid, for the purpose of winding up its affairs. St. Louis & S. Coal & Min. Co. v. Edwards, 103 Ill. 472; St. Louis & S. Coal & Min. Co. v. Sandoval Coal & Min. Co. 111 Ill. 32, 116 Ill. 170; Alting v. Wenzel, 183 Ill. 264; Hunt v. La Grand Roller Skating Rink, 143 Ill. 118; Mellen v. Moline Malleable Iron Works, 181 U. S. 352, 33 L. ed. 178. As a general rule, where a new right is created by the statute of a state, the federal courts will take cognizance of it, and will enforce it according to their methods of procedure. Whether it will be enforced at law or in equity depends upon its character. When it is remedial in its nature and essentially of an equitable character, it will be enforced on the equity side of the court. Gormley v. Clark, 134 U. S. 838, 33 L. ed. 909; Davis v. Gray, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 221, 21 L. ed. 453; Re Broderick's Will, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 503, 22 L. ed. 599; Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 28 L. ed. 52; Frost v. Spitley, 121 U. S. 552, 30 L. ed. 1010.

But every new right of an equitable nature created by the statute of the state is not necessarily enforceable in the federal courts upon the same facts and under the same circumstances as in the courts of the state. If the new right is one not within the recognized equitable jurisdiction of the federal courts, it cannot be enforced by such courts in equity although the statute of the state has declared that the new right shall be enforced in equity. The jurisdiction of the federal courts as courts of equity cannot be enlarged by state legislation. New equitable rights which fall within their accustomed jurisdiction can alone be enforced by the federal courts in equity. The case of Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co. 150 U. S. 371, 37 L. ed. 1113, is decisive of this question. The court there says: "The plaintiffs were simple contract creditors of the company. Their claims had not been reduced to judgment, and they had no express lien by mortgage, trust deed, or otherwise. It is the settled law of this court that such creditors cannot come into a court of equity to obtain a seizure of the property of their debtor, and its application to the satisfaction of their claims, and this notwithstanding a statute of the state may authorize such a proceeding in the courts of the state. The line of demarkation between equitable and legal remedies in the federal courts cannot be obliterated by state legislation, (Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106, 35 L. ed. 358; Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 37 L. ed. 804), nor is it otherwise in case the debtor is a corporation, and an unpaid stock subscription is sought to be reached. National Tube Works Co. v. Ballou, 146 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 1070; Swan Land & Cattle Co. v. Frank, 148 U. S. 603, 37 L. ed. 577.

It is further contended by the appellant that a corporation debtor does not stand on the same footing as an individual debtor; that, while the latter has absolute dominion over his own property, an insolvent corporation is a mere trustee, holding its property for the benefit of its creditors and stockholders, and that a federal court of equity, may entertain jurisdiction to wind up its affairs in a suit brought by a simple contract creditor. This contention is declared in the above-cited cases to be at war with the notions which were derived from the English law with regard to the nature of corporate bodies.

"A corporation is a distinct entity. Its affairs are necessarily managed by officers and agents, it is true; but in law it is as distinct a being as an individual is, and is entitled to hold property, if not contrary to its charter, as absolutely as an individual can hold it. Its estate is the same, its interest is the same, its possession is the same. Its stockholders may call the officers to account, and may prevent any malversation of funds or fraudulent disposal of property on their part. But that is done in the exercise of their corporate rights, not adverse to the corporate interests, but coincident with them. When a corporation becomes insolvent, it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors, and a court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will then make those funds trust funds which, under other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his." Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 160, 36 L. ed. 106, 111.

Under the settled law applicable to the federal courts, a simple contract creditor is not a proper party to invoke the aid of a court of equity to make the corporate funds trust funds, and to wind up the affairs of an insolvent corporation, unless the ordinary jurisdiction of the court has been enlarged by legislative authority. The jurisdiction of the court below had not been so enlarged and it cannot be supported by an appeal to the state legislation in question. For these reasons the petition of the appellant for a rehearing is overruled. It was determined by the court, and so announced, that, as the appellant had committed the first material error, the cause would be reversed at its cost. By mistake or oversight, the order as entered adjudged the costs against the appellees. The order of reversal heretofore entered will be so far modified as to adjudge the costs against the appellant and in all other respects it will stand approved.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

William H. PETTINGELL, by Amos Pettingell, His Next Friend, Appt.

v.
City of CHELSEA.

(.....Mass.....)

A city is not liable to a lineman on its fire signal system for negligence in respect to the condition of a pole which breaks and injures him.

(May 18, 1894.)

NOTE.—The rule as to exemption of a city from liability for negligence has an interesting application in the above case. That a city is not liable for negligent acts of firemen, see note to Dodge v. Granger (R. L.) 15 L. R. A. 781.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in a proceeding brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Plaintiff, at the time of his injury, was working for defendant as a lineman on its fire alarm signal system, and claimed that his injuries were caused by the defective and insufficient condition of a pole to which the wires of the system were attached.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. M. F. Allen, for appellant:

There are three lines of cases to be considered in determining the liability of cities and towns as bearing upon the case at bar.

The first are where cities and towns are held liable for negligence on the ground that they derive some profit from the system or undertaking on the part of the city or town, the management, construction, or maintenance of which has contributed to the injury complained of, as—

Oliver v. Worcester, 103 Mass. 489, 8 Am. Rep. 485; Murphy v. Lowell, 124 Mass. 564, and cases cited; Hand v. Brookline, 126 Mass. 324.

Second, where the negligence resulting from the injury complained of was the act of public officers over whom the corporation had no control, as in—

Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 171, 50 Am. Rep. 369; Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Barnes v. Lowell, 98 Mass. 570; Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297.

Third, where the act, if done by a public officer, might give immunity to the city from an injury resulting from negligence, renders the city liable if done by an agent or servant, as in the cases of—

Leane v. Randolph, 133 Mass. 475; Waldron v. Haverhill, 143 Mass. 582; Sullivan v. Houghton, 135 Mass. 273.

Upon the principle governing the decision in Waldron v. Haverhill, 143 Mass. 582, I place the right claimed in the first count of the amended declaration.

The right to maintain the second count of the amended declaration is predicated upon the Act of 1887, chapter 270, upon the ground that the defendant is an employer within the meaning and provisions of that Act.

Because towns and cities in this Commonwealth have the power to manage and control their own prudential affairs, to construct highways and bridges, and to employ in the construction thereof both labor and material.

Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332; McCormick v. Boston, 120 Mass. 499; Bay State Brick Co. v. Foster, 115 Mass. 431.

Mr. D. E. Gould, for appellee:

In the absence of express statute, municipal corporations are not liable for actions for injuries occasioned by negligence in using or keeping in repair their fire department. The fire department is more a servant of the citizen than it is of the city. The city is constituted merely the governing power to give efficiency.

Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 196; Tainter v. Worcester, 123 Mass. 311, 25 Am. Rep. 90; Hayes v. Oshkosh, 38 Wis. 314, 14 Am. Rep. 760; Jewett v. New Haven, 38 Conn. 368, 9 Am. Rep. 332.

The Employers' Liability Act, Statute of 1887, chapter 270, fixes the rights and liabilities of persons occupying the relation of master and servant; it does not create the relation or impose duties and liabilities on municipal corporations in the performance of their public duties from which they receive no compensation or benefit.

Ryalls v. Mechanics Mills, 5 L. R. A. 667, 150 Mass. 190; Dickie v. Boston & A. R. Co., 131 Mass. 517.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, and directing judgment for the defendant. The declaration contains two counts; the first at common law, and the second under Stat. 1887, chap. 270. The demurrer is general, but the point is not taken that the second count contains no allegation that notice of the time, place, and cause of injury was given to the defendant. We assume that Stat. 1887, chap. 270, may apply to cities and towns. See Connolly v. Waltham, 156 Mass. 368; Conroy v. Clinton, 158 Mass. 318. But the statute in terms only gives to an employé who has received personal injury from the causes described in the first three clauses of the first section, or to his legal representatives in case the injury results in death, "the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the employé had not been an employé of nor in the service of the employer nor engaged in its work." The question, then, is whether a city is responsible in damages to any person who, in the exercise of due care, is injured by the breaking of a pole to which was attached the wires of the fire-signal system of the city, if the pole broke because it was "negligently constructed, cared for, maintained, and placed" in its position. The special authority of the city of Chelsea to establish a fire department is found in Stat. 1831, chap. 200, § 16. In Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297, it was held that the city was not liable for the negligence of the members of a fire department established by the city council pursuant to an act of the legislature. In that case the alleged negligence consisted in the members of the fire department carelessly driving a hose carriage against the plaintiff in a public highway during an alarm of fire. In Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 196, the plaintiff was injured by the bursting of hose connected with a fire engine, which was alleged to have been defective, and to have been negligently used at a fire by members of the fire department. It was held that the city was not liable. In the opinion it is said that: "In the absence of express statute therefor, municipal corporations are no more liable to actions for injuries occasioned by reason of negligence in using or keeping in repair the fire engines owned by them than in the case of a town house or public way."

See Tainter v. Worcester, 123 Mass. 311, 25 Am. Rep. 90. The present case, we think, comes within the general doctrine declared in Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, viz.: "That no private action, unless authorized by express statute, can be maintained against a city for the neglect of a public duty imposed upon it by law for the benefit of the public, and from the performance of which the corporation receives no profit or advantage."

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

UNITED STATES of America, App't.,v.

(60 Fed. Rep. 934.)

A control of the business of refining and selling sugar in the United States does not involve a monopoly or restraint of foreign or interstate commerce, under the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as this Act does not include the regulation of manufactures or productive industries of any sort, even if their product is a subject of commerce.

(March 26, 1894.)

APPPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to have certain contracts declared void and canceled which had been made by the American Sugar Refining Company with the other defendants for the alleged purpose of monopolizing or restraining interstate and foreign commerce in contravention of a United States statute on that subject. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Argued before Acheson and Dallas, Circuit Judges, and Green, District Judge.

Messrs. Ellery P. Ingham, Samuel F. Phillips, and Robert Keston Asst. U. S. Attys., for appellant.

Messrs. John G. Johnson, John E. Parsons, and Richard C. McMurtrie, for appellees:

All restraints of trade and all monopolizations are not illegal. It is well settled that restraints of trade within certain limits of object, time, and place are legal. "Restraint of trade" has a well-defined meaning, viz., unreasonable interference with contracting, or combining, parties, or with third persons, in their power to trade.

In this case nothing was done which bound the vendors not to manufacture; nor was there any attempt to interfere with other persons in building new manufactories or manufactory. The contract was simply one for the purchase and sale of stock. It was a sale by a person who, as an incident to his ownership, had a right to dispose of what belonged to him. It was a purchase by a corporation which, by the law of New Jersey, had a right to acquire either refineries, or shares of stock of refineries.

See Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 23 L. ed. 315; Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 755, 38 L. ed. 690.

The Act of 1890 has been before the United States courts in several cases. In three of these the acts alleged to be illegal have been restrained.

United States v. Jellico Mountain Coke & Coal Co. 12 L. R. A. 753, 46 Fed. Rep. 432; Blindell v. Liagan, 54 Fed. Rep. 40; United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans, 54 Fed. Rep. 994.

In seven cases in which relief was refused under the act, the element of direct and unreasonable restraint of interstate commerce was absent, although in some cases all the elements which are relied upon in the present as ground of relief existed.

United States v. Greenhut, 50 Fed. Rep. 469; Re Corning, 51 Fed. Rep. 205; Re Terrell, 51 Fed. Rep. 213; Re Greene, 52 Fed. Rep. 104; United States v. Nelson, 52 Fed. Rep. 646; United States v. Trans. Missouri Freight Assn. 53 Fed. Rep. 440; Dueber Watch Case Mfg. Co. v. Howard Watch & Clock Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 851; United States v. Trans. Missouri Freight Assn. ante, 78, 58 Fed. Rep. 58.

Contracts, combinations, or conspiracies to restrain the manufacture of goods in any state, or to affect the price of the same before they enter into trade or commerce, though they may, by virtue of diminished manufacture, or enhanced price, indirectly affect trade or commerce, are not within the statute.

The congress of the United States has no jurisdiction over articles which are manufactured.

A purchase of the shares of stock of a manufacturing corporation of Pennsylvania, though it may result in an interference with manufacturing, is not one which restrains trade, or commerce, or is within the regulating power of congress.

Veazie v. Moor, 55 U. S. 14 How. 568, 574, 14 L. ed. 545, 547; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Re Greene, supra.

No case has been made out entitling complainant to equitable relief by way of an injunction, even though the statute has been offended against.

By the constitution of the United States no person can be convicted of crime without trial by jury.

A misdemeanor, such as that defined by the Act of 1890, was held in Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 32 L. ed. 223, to be within the meaning of "crime" as used in the constitution.

The courts of the United States cannot have conferred upon them by congress equity jurisdiction to restrain a crime or misdemeanor.

Gee v. Fritchard, 2 Swanst. 440; Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 300, 31 L. ed. 402; Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371, 1 L. ed. 412; Babcock v. New Jersey Stock Yard Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 296; Cope v. District Fair Assn. 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 80.

NOTE.—The above decision excludes from the operation of act of congress respecting conspiracies against interstate commerce a very large class of combinations or trusts which are at least indirectly connected with such commerce as the source of supply. The decision is therefore of much importance.

Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 24; Carlton v. Rugg, 5 L. R. A. 193, 149 Mass. 550.

When the injury complained of is not, per se, a nuisance, or may or may not become so, according to circumstances, and when it is uncertain, indefinite, or contingent, or productive of only possible injury, equity will not interfere.

High. Inj. § 742.

If equity interferes in the present case it will be to enforce a doubtful legal right. This is a jurisdiction that chancellors have always abhorred.

See Matthews v. Associated Press of New York, 136 N. Y. 333; Badische & A. Und Soda Fabrik v. Schott, [1892] 3 Ch. 447; Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, [1892] A. C. 25.

Dallas, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

There are three assignments upon this record. The first two aver, in general terms, that the court below erred in dismissing the bill of complaint, and in not granting the relief thereby prayed. The third, alone specifies the alleged error with particularity, and is in these words: "That the court erred in holding that the facts in this case do not show a contract, combination, or conspiracy to restrain or monopolize trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations." This assignment correctly presents the only question which the case involves.

The bill filed on behalf of the United States is founded wholly upon the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies." Proceedings, such as have been instituted and pursued in this instance, "to prevent and restrain violations of this Act," are authorized and directed by its fourth section; and these defendants are charged with violation of its first two sections, which are as follows:

"Section 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

These sections relate, respectively, to restraint of trade and to monopoly, but, as to both, with respect only to "trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations;" and upon the application of 24 L. R. A.

this restrictive language of the law to the facts of this case we base our judgment. The learned judge who heard the cause in the circuit court states, in the opinion filed by him: "The material facts proved are that the American Sugar Refining Co., one of the defendants, is incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, and has authority to purchase, refine, and sell sugar; that the Franklin Sugar Refinery, the E. C. Knight Co., the Spreckels Sugar Refinery, and the Delaware Sugar House were incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania, and authorized to purchase, refine, and sell sugar; that the four latter Pennsylvania companies were located in Philadelphia, and prior to March, 1892, produced about thirty-three per cent of the total amount of sugar refined in the United States, and were in active competition with the American Sugar Refining Co., and with each other, selling their product wherever demand was found for it throughout the United States; that prior to March, 1892, the American Sugar Refining Co. had obtained control of all refineries in the United States, excepting the four located in Philadelphia, and that of the Revere Co. in Boston, the latter producing about two per cent of the amount refined in this country; that in March, 1892, the American Sugar Refining Co. entered into contracts (on different dates) with the stockholders of each of the Philadelphia corporations named, whereby it purchased their stock, paying therefor by transfers of stock in its company; that the American Sugar Refining Co. thus obtained possession of the Philadelphia refineries and their business; that each of the purchases was made subject to the American Sugar Refining Co. obtaining authority to increase its stock $25,000,000; that this assent was subsequently obtained, and the increase made; that there was no understanding or concert of action between the stockholders of the several Philadelphia companies respecting the sales, but that those of each company acted independently of those of the others, and in ignorance of what was being done by such others; that the stockholders of each company acted in concert with each other, understanding and intending that all the stock and property of the company should be sold, that the contract of sale in each instance left the seller free to establish other refineries, and continue the business, if they should see fit to do so, and contained no provision respecting trade or commerce in sugar, and that no arrangement or provision on this subject has been made since; that since the purchase the Delaware Sugar House refinery has been operated in conjunction with the Spreckels Refinery, and the E. C. Knight refinery in connection with the Franklin, this combination being made apparently for reasons of economy in conducting the business; that the amount of sugar refined in Philadelphia has been increased since the purchases; that the price has been slightly advanced since that event, but still lower than it had been for some years before, and up to within a few months of the sales; that about ten per cent of the sugar refined and sold in the United States is refined in other refineries than those controlled by the American Sugar Refining Co.; that some additional sugar is produced in Louisiana, and some is brought from Europe, but the amount is not large in either instance.

"The object in purchasing the Philadelphia refineries was to obtain a greater influence, or more perfect control, over the business of refining and selling sugar in this country."

This statement of the facts is quoted at length merely for the purpose of showing the general nature of the case; the only essential fact—and of that there is no doubt—being that the questioned conduct of the defendants does not, according to our view of the law, concern interstate or foreign commerce. There is no evidence whatever that the defendants have directly monopolized, or have attempted, combined, or conspired to directly monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations; or that they have contracted, combined, or conspired in direct restraint of such trade or commerce. The utmost that can be said—and this, for the present purpose, may be assumed—is that they have acquired control of the business of refining and selling sugar in the United States. But does this involve monopoly, or restraint of, foreign or interstate commerce? We are clearly of opinion that it does not. The particular language of the act which is now under consideration was manifestly derived from the clause of the constitution by which congress is empowered to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states;" and the authorities are distinctly to the effect that this grant of power does not include the regulation of manufactures or productive industries of any sort, even where their product is made, or is intended or contemplated to be made, the subject of commerce beyond the territory of the state where the manufactory or other producing industry is situated or operated. Manufacture and commerce are two distinct and very different things. The latter does not include the former. Buying and selling are elements of commerce, but something more is required to constitute commerce, which, "strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation, and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities."

Enough has been said to indicate the ground upon which our conclusion in this case has been reached, and we do not deem it necessary to say more, inasmuch as the subject has very recently been considered and passed upon in the Re Greene, 52 Fed. 104, by Judge Jackson (now one of the justices of the supreme court), in whose opinion the earlier cases are sufficiently referred to.

ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

George FIFIELD, Appt.,

v.

COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF PHOENIX.

(.....Ariz.....)

A city is not liable for the explosion of fireworks in a street, under a permit granted by a city officer under an ordinance prohibiting such display without such permit,—especially where the charter denies liability for malfeasance, misfeasance, or neglect of duty of any officer or other authorities of the city.

(March 8, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Maricopa County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the explosion of fireworks in city streets under permission which had been illegally granted by the municipal authorities. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kibbey & Israel, for appellant:

The defendant is liable for the injuries sustained by the appellant, because by expressly granting a permit or license to individuals to do the things in the public streets, which in themselves constituted a nuisance and were essentially dangerous, and from which the injuries complained of naturally resulted, it became a participant and an active agency in the acts that produced the injuries complained of.

As the primary use of a city street is for the passing and repassing of the public throughout its entire width, a city is liable for permitting such an obstruction of a street, by any individual, as constitutes a nuisance.

2 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1511, p. 1463.

Our Penal Code, section 600, defines a public nuisance to be anything which unlawfully obstructs the free passage or use in the customary manner of any public park, square or street.

Penal Code, Rev. Stat. 1887, § 600.

Is not the use of a street as a place for discharging explosives a use not contemplated, and is it not an obstruction to the free passage of the street in the customary manner?

Any noise, whether of musical instruments, the human voice, discharge of guns is a nuisance, and the discharge of fireworks are regarded as prima facie nuisances.

Wood, Nuisance, § 632; and see § 17.

The firing of fireworks in a frequented public street is prima facie, at least a nuisance, and therefore unauthorized.

Cohen v. New York, 4 L. R. A. 406, 118 N. Y. 532; Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 A.

NOTE.—As to liability of injuries caused by the discharge of fireworks, see note to Scanlon v. Wedger (Mass.), 16 L. R. A. 355.

Rep. 608; Speir v. Brooklyn, 21 L. R. A. 641, 189 N. Y. 6; Jenne v. Sutton, 48 N. J. L. 257; Conklin v. Thompson, 29 Barb. 218.

Cities are liable for licensing in the streets anything which is calculated to frighten horses that are ordinarily well behaved.

See 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 886, par. 6.

A city is liable for negligently permitting objects to be and remain in the streets, calculated to frighten horses.

See the authorities cited in the note, p. 387 of 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law.

Mr. L. H. Chalmers for appellee.

Hawkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by appellant to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him. He based his claim for relief upon the facts that the appellee is a municipal corporation created by an act of the legislative assembly of the territory, approved February 25, 1881, and an Act of March 11, 1885, amendatory thereof; that the corporation, in 1889, ordained, among other things, that it should be unlawful for any person within certain city limits, to make any bonfire, discharge any firecrackers, skyrockets, or any fireworks whatever, etc., without first having obtained permission therefor from the city marshal (this ordinance was in effect at the time of appellant's injuries); that on the 15th day of February, 1893, the city, by and through its members, its mayor, and its marshal, unlawfully and negligently granted to certain Chinese permission to set off, discharge, and explode fireworks upon certain streets of said city, within the fire limits; that appellant, a hack driver, on that day, while in the proper pursuit of his business, was driving along the streets of said city; that, while so driving along a street within said fire limits, the Chinese, acting under the permit so granted them, fired off and exploded a large quantity of fireworks, firecrackers, and bombs, whereupon appellant's horses (they being gentle and well broken) became frightened and unmanageable, and threw appellant to the ground, all without fault upon his part, and he was thereby very seriously injured, sustaining a very serious fracture of the leg, and otherwise bruised. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint on this state of facts, and appellant asks that the ruling be reversed.

Section 7 of article 19 of the charter of the city of Phoenix provides, as follows: "Sec. 7. That said corporation shall not be liable to any one, for any loss or injury to person or property growing out of or caused by the malfeasance, misfeasance, or neglect of duty of any officer or other authorities of said city or for any injury or damages happening to such person or property on account of the condition of any ranja, sewer, cesspool, street, sidewalk or public ground therein, but this does not exonerate any officer of said city or any other person from such liability when such casualty or accident is caused by willful neglect of duty enforced upon such officer or person by law or by the gross negligence or willful misconduct of any such officer or person in any other respect." It seems to us that any fair construction of this section inhibits such form of action against the city. Appellant, in his reply brief, disclaims any negligence on the part of the city marshal in granting the permit, but says it became the negligent act of the city itself, and such city was an agency in the committing of the injury. We are unable to agree to this line of argument. It could not do more than to undertake the evasion of the plain letter of the city charter. Under this charter, if the city officer performs an act which is authorized by an ordinance, it would not, on his part, be negligence. Then, how could it become negligence on the part of the city itself? Plymouth, Ind., had an ordinance prohibiting the firing of gunpowder, or any other substance, except on occasions of public rejoicing, when the mayor granted permission to fire guns, cannons, and other things in which gunpowder was used. On the 4th of July, 1885, the mayor granted permission to fire gunpowder in an arvil on a lot in said city; and when it was fired it blew gravel and stones against one Wheeler's plate-glass windows, and broke them. The supreme court of Indiana, in Wheeler v. Plymouth, 116 Ind. 153, in passing upon the question of the liability of the city, says: "A city which has an ordinance prohibiting the firing of gunpowder, but allowing the mayor to license such firing on certain occasions, is not liable for the damage occasioned by the negligence of the licensees, there being nothing to show that the authorized act was necessarily dangerous." It is also decided in the same case that "there is no actionable breach of corporate duty in failing to enact a proper ordinance, or in failing to enforce one that has been enacted; and consequently this action cannot be maintained upon the theory that there was a proper ordinance, nor upon the theory that the ordinance was not enforced." Under this theory, it seems clear that the action at bar could not be maintained if the ordinance was not enforced. Then, upon what system of reasoning could it be maintained because it was suspended for a day? For failing in governmental action, municipal corporations are responsible only to their corporators, or the power creating them. Cooley, Torts, 620. It shows no ground of action when one complains that he has suffered damages because the operation of an ordinance which prevents the explosion of fireworks within the city has been temporarily suspended. Ibid.

Lincoln v. Boston, 148 Mass. 578, 8 L. R. A. 257, was also a case where the mayor permitted the firing of cannon upon the commons under an ordinance forbidding it unless such permission was given, and the plaintiff's horse took fright and ran away on a neighboring street. This license to fire cannon was held to be an act of municipal government, and the person doing the firing was not the city's agent, so as to make the city liable. The firing of the Chinese bombs, in the case at bar, was not the act of the city; nor did the city have any agency in said act. A licensee does not thereby become the agent of a municipal corporation. Ibid.; Fowle v. Alexandria, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 398, 7 L. ed. 719, Chief Justice Marshall, in Fowle v. Alexandria, says: "That corporations are bound by their contracts is admitted. That money corporations, or those carrying on business for themselves, are liable for torts, is well settled. But that a legislative corporation, established as a part of the government of the country, is liable for loss sustained by a non-feasance—by an omission of the corporate body to observe a law of its own, in which no penalty is provided—is a principle for which we can find no precedent." Rivers v. Augusta, 65 Ga. 376, 38 Am. Rep. 787, is a well-considered case, and is very similar to the case at bar. The plaintiff, a minor child, while walking upon one of defendant's streets, was seriously gored by a cow which was running at large in the streets of said city. She sued the corporation for damages alleged to be sustained by reason of this misfortune. It will be noticed, by reference to the facts in this case, that the allegations of the declaration are quite similar to the complaint in the case before us. In 1878 the city had an ordinance against cattle running at large. This ordinance was suspended at the time of the injury to the child. Mr. Justice Crawford says: "The adoption of an ordinance in reference to allowing cattle to run at large in a city is one which is wholly legislative, and therefore discretionary. It is not liable in damages for neglecting, omitting, or refusing to notice the subject, or having noticed it, and adopted an ordinance concerning it, then to repeal or suspend it." The same reasoning would undoubtedly apply to an ordinance against the firing of bombs, etc. In the Georgia case, it was argued that, so long as a city fails to legislate, it is not liable, but, when it does, then its liability for damages accrues. The court was unable to appreciate this difference, but cited the case of Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451, as a case directly in point. An ordinance prohibiting the use of fireworks was passed, remained in force some years, was then suspended from the 25th day of December to January 1st, inclusive. During this time, by the firing off of squibs, firecrackers, and Roman candles, plaintiff's house was burned, for which he sued the city. Held, that it was within the discretion of the authorities to determine, from time to time, what ordinances were proper, and that the corporation was not liable. Also, see Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 171, 50 Am. Rep. 289; Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451. If the ordinance in question had been repealed on the day before the accident to appellant, it seems clear that there could be no liability against the city. Then, upon what system of reasoning could he recover simply because the ordinance was suspended on the day of the accident?

Appellant, in his brief, relies upon the cases of Cohen v. New York, 113 N. Y. 532, 4 L. R. A. 406; Speir v. Brooklyn, 139 N. Y. 6, 21 L. R. A. 641. In Cohen v. New York, the facts were that the city, by a permit, allowed a grocer to keep a wagon in front of his store, when not in use. On a certain morning, Cohen was walking along the street, in front of the grocer's store. At the same time a wagon loaded with ice was passing in one direction, and one loaded with coal was passing in the other. The grocer's wagon, without any horse attached, was standing in front of his store. The thills were tied up in a perpendicular position with a string. The length of the wagon was parallel with the course of the street. The ice wagon, probably in attempting to avoid the coal wagon, caught against the wheel of the grocer's wagon, turned it around, and loosened the thills, so that they fell, and struck Cohen on the head, injuring him so that he died the next day. The city was held liable. The court held that the permission was not authorized by law, and that the owner of the wagon acquired no right by virtue of the license to store his wagon in the street, and in doing so he was clearly guilty of maintaining a nuisance. The defendant was also guilty because it assumed to authorize the erection and continuance of a nuisance. The legal power to obstruct the street by grant of a license had been withheld by the legislature from the city. Nevertheless, it did grant such a permit, and took a compensation on account of it. In thus doing, the city became a partner in the erection and continuance of such nuisance. Speir v. Brooklyn, supra, was a case where fireworks were allowed by the mayor, under an ordinance, at the junction of two narrow streets in the city of Brooklyn, and plaintiff's property was destroyed, and the city was held liable; the court having held that the circumstances of that particular case made the same a public nuisance, and the plaintiff recovered under that theory. Such displays, the court seemed to think, should be under the supervision of the municipal authorities, and it was probably entirely proper for the court to rule as it did in this particular case. It was at the junction of two narrow streets of a large city, completely built upon, and where any misadventure in managing the discharge would be likely to result in injuries to persons or property. The action in the case at bar is not upon the theory that the city was guilty of unlawfully erecting and maintaining a nuisance. A city is liable for maintaining a nuisance, unless expressly authorized by law to do so. It was on this theory a recovery was had in the New York cases. It may have been an error of judgment in the officers of the city in granting the permit or suspending the ordinance on the particular street on the day alleged, but cities are not responsible for errors of judgment of their officers in the enforcing of their laws.

We must conclude that, both from the reading of the charter of the city, and the weight of authority, the chief justice was correct in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is affirmed.

I. Doctrine of contempt.

Contempt is defined by Justice Swift to be "a disobedience to the court by acting in opposition to the authority, justice, and dignity thereof, and commonly consists in a party's doing otherwise than he is entitled to do, or not doing what he is commanded or required by the process, order, or decree of the court, in all which cases the party disobeying is liable to be attached and committed for contempt." 2 Swift, Dig. 858; Lyon v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 185.

In Re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580, the court considered the distinction between a civil and a criminal contempt, the former consisting generally in failing to do something ordered to be done by a court in a civil action for the benefit of the opposing party; the latter consisting of acts of disrespect to the court, such as disorderly or violent conduct, in its presence or immediate vicinity, or in the doing of a forbidden act, resistance to process, etc., and held that the contempt proceedings in divorce came within the former.

The duty and obligation of the husband is to provide maintenance for the wife and is not merely contractual, and their disregard and breach partake largely of the nature of a contempt, and equity will enforce their observance by attachment of the person of the husband. Murray v. Murray, 84 Ala. 363.

Yet this duty is an imperfect obligation which is not technically a debt; he does not owe any specific amount of money, but he owes a duty which may be enforced by the order of the court compelling him to pay the money. Ex parte Perkins, 18 Cal. 60.

The attachment of this species of contempt, the disobedience of an order to pay money, is to be looked upon rather as a civil execution for the benefit of the injured party, though carried on in the shape of a criminal process for a contempt of the authority of the court. Buck v. Buck, 60 Ill. 105; Crook v. People, 16 Ill. 535.

In State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 415, however, the court held that such proceedings were in the nature of criminal prosecutions.

alimony ordered to be paid in the future by a final judgment of divorce; where an execution cannot be issued, since there is no provision of law for collecting such judgment.

2. Inability to pay installments of alimony, brought about by the party himself with intention to avoid payment, will not prevent his refusal to pay from being contumacious and punishable as a contempt of court.

Without the ability to compel the obedience to its mandates—whether the order be to surrender writings in the possession of a party, to execute deeds of conveyance, to pay money, or to perform any other act, the court is competent to require it to be done—many of its most important and usual functions would be paralyzed. Pain v. Pain, 80 N. C. 322.

The non-performance of a decree being adjudged a contempt, the power to attach for the contempt cannot be questioned. Wightman v. Wightman, 45 Ill. 167.

The court has power to commit as for contempt. Blake v. People, 80 Ill. 11.

The remedy for a failure to comply with the order of the court is by attachment. Waldron v. Waldron, 55 Pa. 231.

The proper method of enforcing an order for alimony is by attachment as for contempt, and not by way of ieri factas. Goss v. Goss, 29 Ga. 109.

In Andrews v. Andrews, 69 Ill. 609, it was sought to reverse the decree, the defendant bringing the record into court by writ of error, questioning the power of the court to award an attachment on nonpayment of the amounts awarded, and of counsel's fees, the court held that there was no doubt of the power of the court to award an attachment for noncompliance with an order for the payment of alimony.

The power to award the process is inherent in the court, essential to the exercise of its jurisdiction and a maintenance of its authority. Pain v. Pain, supra.

If the defendant remains contumacious, defying the court, his estate, real and personal, may be sequestered as a means of enforcing performance of a decree. Wightman v. Wightman, supra.

The order in contempt committing the defendant, need not show that the payment was not enforceable by sequestration or under the security. Ryer v. Ryer, 67 How. Pr. 369.

In order to punish a party for contempt in a civil proceeding, the contempt must be such as to defeat, impair, impede, or prejudice a right or remedy of the party affected by it, and such fact must be ascertained and adjudged by the court directing the punishment to be imposed. Sandford v. Sandford, 40 Hun. 540.

The process of contempt to enforce civil remedies, being one of those extreme resorts which would not be justified, if there was any other adequate remedy, the payment of money can only be enforced by attachment "where by law, execution cannot be awarded for the collection of such sum." Haines v. Haines, 35 Mich. 138.

In Re Fanning, 40 Minn. 4, the petitioner applied to be relieved from an order for the payment of temporary alimony, by way of habeas corpus and certiorari, the proceedings in divorce having been dismissed. The court held that the contempt had a double aspect, being in the nature of a remedy to enforce payment of the alimony, and also punitive or merely in punishment of the offense of contempt, the first being for the benefit of the party only, the second in order to assert the authority of the court; and that so far as it was private it failed with the dismissal of the suit, but that so far as the fine was concerned the judgment did not affect it, and that therefore the petitioner was not entitled to discharge until he paid the fine.

It has been held that it ought never to be resorted to, except as penal process founded on the unwillingness of the party to obey. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216.

And that the order must be for the performance of some specific act other than the mere payment of money, and in such case he may be punished by the court as for contempt by final imprisonment under the General Statutes of 1886, chap. 172, § 27. Coughlin v. Ehler, 39 Mo. 285.

In Lewis v. Lewis, 80 Ga. 706, the decree was a final one, and the court held that the direction of the payment of alimony by a husband to a wife was a duty the husband owed, not only to the wife, but to the public, to comply with the order, and that if he failed the court would compel him to make such payment by an order of attachment, directing his imprisonment in case of his failure to comply with the order.

The power of granting alimony belongs to the superior court, as an incident of its jurisdiction over divorces, and not to the judge, and cannot be exercised by him in vacation. Goss v. Goss, 29 Ga. 100.

In Dwelly v. Dwelly, 45 Me. 377, a motion to dismiss exceptions and render judgment on a verdict because the libelee failed to comply with an order of the court directing the payment of costs of the wife's attorneys, under section 5 of chapter 60 of the Revised Statutes, it was held that the court sitting in banc, had no jurisdiction over the question and the proper course was to proceed before the judge ad nisi prius, where the party would be proceeded against as for contempt, and disregarding the decree of the court.

In Lockridge v. Lockridge, 3 Dana, 23, 28 Am. Dec. 52, it is said to be the more approved and provident decree, to require a bond with approved security for such annuity as shall be fixed by the court, payable in prescribed installments, reserving the power to compel payment from time to time by attachment, sequestration or otherwise, and unless the husband should refuse to give such security, a decree for partition of his estate would be, not only unnecessary, but incongruous, unusual, and injurious.

Where it appeared that the husband had conveyed his property, in anticipation of the divorce proceedings, and for the purpose of preventing alimony being obtained, the court held that the proceedings of themselves were not sufficient to show contempt. Stuart v. Stuart, 123 Mass. 370.

In Coughlin v. Ehler, 39 Mo. 285, it was held that an order for the payment of alimony was simply an order for the payment of money, and imprisonment for debt being abolished in that state, a commitment to prison as for contempt was without authority of the law.

It has been held that the remedy by execution must be exhausted upon all demands for the recovery of money, whether they be recovered in legal or equitable actions, before a creditor's suit could be instituted. Miller v. Miller, 7 Hun. 208.

The petition framed for the commitment of the defendant, for contempt, is not defective by reason of its not alleging that he is able to make the pay-

Statement by Winslow, J.:

March 25, 1892, plaintiff obtained a judgment of divorce a vinculo against the defendant. By the judgment the plaintiff was awarded the custody of an infant child, and the title of certain real estate of the defendant's was transferred to the plaintiff; and defendant ment, it is enough to show a refusal to obey the order. Andrew v. Andrew, 62 Vt. 485.

In Mann v. Mann, 7 W. N. C. 507, where the wife as defendant sought to enforce the order by attachment. It was contended that the rule was restricted to cases where the wife was a plaintiff, and that where the husband was plaintiff the result of noncompliance was a stay of proceedings; the court granted the rule absolute, holding that this way would be very adequate where the wife was the respondent, the court stating that it would be difficult to see why, if a wife was entitled to this rule against a husband, respondent, her case was not all the stronger where she was unwillingly before the court.

An attorney has no lien upon the alimony awarded to the wife by a final judgment rendered in her favor in an action for separation, such as would enable him to collect his costs by a proceeding to punish for contempt in the non-payment of alimony. Weill v. Weill, 10 N. Y. Supp. 637.

II. Constitutionality of contempt.

Attachment is not in the nature of an imprisonment for debt, within the prohibition of the constitution. Murray v. Murray, 18 Ala. 383.

Such a case is not a debt within the meaning of the constitution. Pain v. Pain, 80 N. C. 322.

The power to commit for contempt is not contrary to the clause of the Georgia Constitution of 1868, prohibiting imprisonment for debt. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216.

Such a course is legal where the defendant has refused to obey the order and his whole conduct indicates clearly that nothing but the stern order of the chancellor to commit him on his disobedience will bring him to the performance of what is his clear duty in the premises. Ibid.

It is not the intention of the constitution to take from courts the power to punish for contempt, without giving to the party charged a jury trial. It is not designed to virtually take from every court a power so essential to its efficiency and very existence, and no less necessary for the safety and benefit of the public, the protection of every citizen in his life, liberty and property. Ex parte Grace, 12 Iowa, 208, 79 Am. Dec. 523.

The power is preservative and inherent in every court, and extends to the enforcement of every order which it may make in the legitimate exercise of its authority. Ibid.

The court has power to order such attachment, and it is not contrary to the fifteenth section of article eight of the Constitution of Illinois, prohibiting imprisonment for debt. Wightman v. Wightman, 45 Ill. 167.

But it has been held that imprisonment for non-compliance with such an order, unless willful, or unless upon a refusal, upon a proper demand made to deliver up his estate in satisfaction of the decree, is within the inhibition of the constitution against imprisonment for debt. Blake v. People, 80 Ill. 11.

It must appear that he has the pecuniary ability to enable him to comply with the decree, and that his disobedience is willful. Ibid.

In Steller v. Steller, 25 Mich. 156, where an appeal was taken from the order committing defendant upon the ground of the constitutional provision prohibiting imprisonment for debt, the court held that with imprisonment for debt forbidden, a was adjudged to pay plaintiff, as alimony, $150 annually, in equal quarterly installments, also the sum of $33, temporary alimony, which had been ordered pendente lite, but had not been paid. The defendant paid none of the sums, and in September, 1893, upon certain affidavits, a motion was made that defendant be punished for contempt in not paying said sums, the whole amount then due being $357. The affidavits showed due demand, and the defendant's refusal to pay; also, that he stated, in foul and abusive language, that he should never pay anything on the judgment; that defendant is a strong, party could not be imprisoned for non-compliance of such an order except on the ground of contempt of the authority of the court, that there must be something of wrong beyond the mere failure to pay money, and the party, before he can be convicted and punished, must have an opportunity to be heard in his own explanation,

III. When contempt proceedings may be resorted to.

The process for contempt, although not frequently resorted to, is a proper and salutary mode of proceeding where the exigency of the case requires it, it being one of the established and customary modes of enforcing decrees of courts of equity, and a practice to which the superior court should conform in cases where the defendant's disobedience of the decree is palpable, willful and utterly inexcusable, and constitutes, beyond a doubt, contempt. Lyon v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 185.

The authority is based upon the ground that the refusal is willful disobedience, and where a party is guilty of willful disobedience or obstinacy to an order of the court or judge, the court or judge is empowered to punish for contempt, and to sentence him to imprisonment until the specified sum and costs are paid, such decision being in the nature of a sentence and final judgment. State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 416.

Such a course is appropriate. Russell v. Russell, 60 Me. 336; Strobridge v. Strobridge, 21 Hun, 88. To the same effect, Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 439; Blake v. Blake, 80 Ill. 523; Murray v. Murray, 84 Ala. 363; Ex parte Perkins, 18 Cal. 60.

Such disobedience being contumacious the petitioner is not limited to scire facias. Slade v. Slade, 106 Mass. 499.

The same was the ruling of the court in contempt proceedings to compel payment of alimony installments for the support of children. Hand v. Hand, 25 Ohio L. J. 214.

The willful disobedience of a lawful order is itself criminal, much more so than the non-payment of costs adjudged against a prisoner in a criminal action, and for which he may be imprisoned. Pain v. Pain, 80 N. C. 322; State v. Cannady, 78 N. C. 539.

To such a case the old adage, "when a bird can sing and will not sing, he must be made to sing," applies. Lewis v. Lewis, 80 Ga. 706.

Such proceedings will be upheld where it is shown that the failure of the defendant to comply with the order has been through his own action, as in cases of fraud. Haines v. Haines, 85 Mich. 128.

There must be a contempt of the court's authority. Steller v. Steller, 25 Mich. 159.

Something of wrong beyond the mere failure to pay money must exist. Ibid.

The court must be satisfied that there is good ground for the attachment. It must appear that the defendant has the money to comply with the decree, and that he fails to comply with it. Lewis v. Lewis, supra.

The imprisonment must be clearly for the contempt of the process of the court, and be of one who is able and unwilling to obey the order, the imprisonment being conditional and in the discretion of the judge. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216.

The order adjudging the non-performance of the decree for payment of alimony, being a lawful order, the court is allowed the usual means to enforce the order by issuing an attachment therefor, and committing the defendant, on failure to purge himself of the contempt. Wightman v. Wightman, 45 Ill. 167.

The power extends to the use of the process likely to be effectual in all cases, and it is not necessary to exhaust other possible remedies in order to become entitled to that remedy. Andrew v. Andrew, 62 Vt. 435.

In Andrew v. Andrew, supra, where the petitioner was decreed alimony upon the obtaining of a divorce, the payment of which, upon demand, was refused, and was sought to be enforced by an order for the punishment of the defendant for contempt, it was held that the county court had power to punish, by way of imprisonment for contempt, the failure and refusal of the defendant to pay permanent alimony, there being nothing unusual or extraordinary in this mode of enforcing the payment. Curtis v. Gordon, 62 Vt. 840, to the same effect.

If the proceeding is instituted by the wife, she may have costs taxed die ad diem and alimony awarded by the court, and if the husband has the means of payment, an order will be enforced by attachment. Ormsby v. Ormsby, 1 Phila. 573.

In proceedings for divorce and alimony pendente lite, the husband cannot escape unless he be destitute of all ability, and in such case if he be the libellant, the court will not require him to pay but will suspend the suit until provision is made for the wife. Ibid.

So where the husband refused to comply with the order of the court, in divorce proceedings made abortive by the wife's death, the court enforced such order, in a summary way by attachment and imprisonment. Ballard v. Caperton, 3 Met. (Ky.) 412.

In O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, 60 Ill. 533, it was held that such an order would issue for the refusal of the defendant even though the decree made the same a lien upon his real estate.

Where the position was taken that the payment of costs and alimony could not be enforced by proceedings for contempt, it was held that the attachment could not be vacated upon that ground as it was a proceeding for "disobedience of the lawful mandate of the court," and that the provisions of the statute prohibiting imprisonment for non-payment of costs did not apply. Park v. Park, 80 N. Y. 136.

Where the libelee made payments for a short time and then refused, and notice being issued to him he attempted to purge himself by showing pecuniary inability, the court finding him of sufficient ability, adjudging him in contempt and committing him until he complied with the order, it was held such course was the proper one. Russell v. Russell, 60 Me. 336.

So where demand was made and the defendant was willing to take the chances and made an unwarranted statement to his attorney, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion; in committing him for contempt. Rabl v. Rabl, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 560.

It is for the court to determine that it would be useless to order sequestration or security, and where it so determines, the husband may be committed without notice, if he neglects to pay the alimony which he is ordered to pay. Isaacs v. Isaacs, 61 How. Fr. 399, 10 Daly, 306.

Where the defendant appeared to have acted by able-bodied man, and runs a large farm, keeping a large stock of cattle and horses, but claims that he is doing it all for his mother. The defendant filed an affidavit showing that he had no property, real or personal, but that he was in debt, and could borrow no money. He did not deny that he was an able-bodied man, nor that he was running a farm, nor did he deny that he had stated he would never pay anything on the judgment. Upon these affidavits the circuit court made an order reciting that defendant had in no way controverted the fact of his ability, as an able-bodied man, to earn and the advice of his counsel he was allowed to remedy the evil by complying within a reasonable time with the order of the court, and to give the security required by the order, or, in default, be committed. Grimm v. Grimm, 1 E. D. Smith, 190, where an injunction had been issued by the court, restraining the defendant from parting with his property until proper security was given.

The plaintiff is not estopped by reason of a provision in the decree authorizing an execution to be issued, the proceeding being for disobedience of an order of the court and to compel the defendant to furnish the security required by the decree, chapter 390 of the Laws of 1847 having no application to such a case. Park v. Park, 80 N. Y. 155.

The provision that execution may issue, does not interfere with the order that security may be furnished, and therefore an attachment may be issued to compel the giving of the same. Ibid.

Where the order directing the payment of the wife's counsel's fees, provided that the allowance might be included in a final judgment and enforced by execution, the court held that such provision enforcing the payment by execution being improperly contained in the order, the right to proceed by way of contempt for non-compliance of the order still existed. Mercer v. Mercer, 78 Hun, 192.

In Groves's App., 68 Pa. 143, it was held that attachment was the proper method of enforcing the order of the court for the payment of the wife's expenses and support pendente lite, as such execution could not issue upon such an order, which was not a lien upon the defendant's property, nor an equitable decree for the payment of money.

Where the circuit court required the husband's bond with surety, it was held that the husband's refusal to give such bond was punishable in the same manner as any other contempt. Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 439.

In the above case, the original judgment did not provide for the security, but the court stated that such judgment might be revised or altered by the court upon application. Ibid.

From this decision Justice Orton dissented, holding that before the defendant could be convicted, under the section of the revised statutes, it was necessary for the court to adjudge that it was "yet in the power of the defendant to perform" the order under section 3491 of the Revised Statutes, that such a fact is a condition precedent to such a judgment, which was void without it. Ibid.

Where an attachment was issued for alleged contempt of an order requiring the payment of alimony, and security therefor, which it was sought to vacate, but the court adjudged the defendant in contempt, and ordered the payment of a fine and security to be given, and further committed him until he complied with the order, it was held that the court had jurisdiction over the matter. Park v. Park, 80 N. Y. 155.

In Waters v. Waters, 49 Mo. 385, it was held that the allowance might be enforced by attachment or by execution, or, when the husband was plaintiff, the court might make its payment a condition to the further prosecution of the suit.

IV. Evidence in support of.

As a foundation for contempt proceedings, it must appear from the defendant's examination, or its equivalent, his admission, that at the time of 24 L. R. A.

the service of the order he had in his possession, or under his control, some specified property or sum of money, the application of which could have been lawfully directed towards the payment of the judgment. Tinker v. Crooks, 22 Hun, 579.

It must be shown that he has refused payment, and that his refusal or neglect is calculated to, or will actually defeat, impair, or prejudice the rights of the party in whose favor alimony and counsel's fees have been ordered, and the order of the court must show these facts. Whitney v. Whitney, 23 Jones & S. 835.

Such a question is one of fact, and when not passed upon below, cannot be reported for the determination of the full court. Stuart v. Stuart, 123 Mass. 370.

A conveyance and transfer by a respondent, the grantees being his son-in-law and daughter, was held competent evidence upon the question, whether he had in his possession or control the means of obeying the order of the court, and was consequently sufficient to hold him in contempt for disobedience to the order. Ibid.

V. Necessity of service of order.

Before a defendant can be committed for contempt, in the non-payment of alimony, there must be a previous order of the court directing its payment by him. Gerard v. Gerard, 2 Barb. Ch. 73, 5 L. ed. 561.

The order of the court, for the payment of alimony, must be served upon the husband before he can be committed for contempt. Johnson v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 63 Cal. 578; Sandford v. Sandford, 40 Hun, 540.

Until service of the order, a party is not in contempt for a failure to comply with its directions. Sandford v. Sandford, supra.

Where, however, the petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus alleged that he had no written notice of the order of the court, served upon him, but did not deny the fact that he had notice of the order being made, he being present in court at the time, and it was shown that a demand of payment had been made and refused, it was held there was sufficient notice to warrant his being committed for contempt. Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 417.

Where the defendant, served with a copy of order to pay temporary alimony, by a certain date, failed to make the payment and was arrested on attachment for contempt, and it was contended on his behalf that he should have been brought before the court and interrogated, and an opportunity afforded him to purge himself of contempt, the court held that such step was not necessary, as after a party had been once brought into court; the presumption being that he was present and cognizant of every step taken in the case until it was terminated, unless considerable time elapsed without taking any step. Petrie v. People, 40 Ill. 384.

Where a party has entered his appearance, filed his demurrer, and resisted the motion for alimony, and is fully aware of the order and its requisites, and of the fact that he is in default and subject to attachment, it must be presumed that he is fully aware of the motion for attachment, and there is no reason to say that the court erred in having him arrested and detained for non-compliance of the order. Ibid.

accumulate money, and finding that he was guilty of contempt in refusing to pay the amounts due under the judgment, and ordering that he be committed to jail until he should pay said sum of $257 and costs, unless sooner discharged by the court. From this order, defendant appealed.

The above case was followed in O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, 69 Ill. 552.

Where the defendant absented himself from the state, thereby rendering personal service impossible, service being effected upon his attorney, the court held that disobedience of the order was punishable as contempt. Fairchild v. Fairchild (N. J.) April 3, 1888.

The rule for an attachment for the non-compliance of an order for the payment of alimony will be refused where the order has been served upon the defendant out of the jurisdiction. Russell v. Russell, 15 Phila. 168.

It is not sufficient to support an attachment. Ibid.

The delivery of a copy of the order to the husband in another state is not sufficient service. Johnson v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 63 Cal. 578.

Before a person can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of the court, such order must be served upon him, and the mere delivery to a person in another state of a certified copy of an order made by a court in that state would not be a service upon him within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 101A, 101B. Ibid.

See also infra, head XIII.

VI. Necessity of demand of payment.

There must be a personal demand before the defendant will be committed for contempt under § 7280, of the Michigan statutes, Howell's edition. Edison v. Edison, 55 Mich. 185.

In Brown v. Brown, 23 Mich. 247, the affidavit showed no demand, and it did not appear that the order for alimony had been served by a person having authority to receive the money. The court stopped the proceedings, holding that a demand and refusal must be shown.

Where, however, the husband had informed the wife of his intention not to pay, it was held that his statement did away with the necessity of a previous demand, prior to the commencement of contempt proceedings. Potts v. Potts, 68 Mich. 492.

See also under state statutes, infra, XIII.

VII. Necessity of notice of application.

In Sanchez v. Sanchez, 21 Fla. 346, the court held that due notice of the wife's application to the court for alimony must be served upon the husband, who must have a reasonable opportunity to oppose, and the record must show such facts; and where it is not shown that the husband has been notified and had such opportunity to oppose, the order made upon such application cannot be enforced by way of attachment as for contempt, and will be void.

Notice may be given to him of the application to punish him for contempt, although his property has not been sequestered, and although he has not been required to give security, provided the court is satisfied that it would have been of no use to make an order of sequestration, or for security. Isaacs v. Isaacs, 61 How. Pr. 369, 10 Daly, 506.

The power given under section 2280 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure is discretionary, either to give or not to give the husband notice of the application that he be punished. Ibid.

But until the court has so adjudicated, notice must first be given to the defendant. Ibid.

Mr. W. S. Stroud, for appellant:

The courts, either in law or equity, possess no powers except such as are conferred by statute; and that to justify any act or proceeding in a case of divorce, whether it be such as pertains to the grounds or cause of action itself, to the process, pleadings, or practice in

The proceedings were designed in order that notice might be given. Andrew v. Andrew, 63 Vt. 426.

See also infra, XIII.

VIII. Right of defendant to be heard.

A defendant can only be convicted of contempt by regular and orderly proceedings under an attachment, or an order to show cause, and is entitled to an independent hearing, inasmuch as he may furnish a perfect excuse for not complying with the order. Tinker v. Crooks, 22 Hun. 579.

The party must have an opportunity to be heard in his own explanation (Steller v. Steller, 25 Mich. 159) the proceedings being designed for this purpose. Andrew v. Andrew, 63 Vt. 426.

It is contrary to the first principles of right, to proceed to the punishment of a party upon a mere ex parte showing; the party must have an opportunity to present what he has to say in his own justification. Steller v. Steller, supra.

In the above case it appeared that the party was confined on papers which he was not allowed to answer, though it could not be known that he might not effectually disprove the charges. Ibid.

See also infra, XIII.

IX. Excuses for non-payment.

Inability to pay.

Inability to comply with the order, unlike the commitment of costs, is an answer to a rule to enforce it, and when made to appear, discharges the obligation. Pain v. Pain, 80 N. C. 323.

The attachment is designed to enforce the compliance with the order, and not to punish for being unable to perform it. Ormsby v. Ormsby, 1 Phila. 578.

The attachment for non-payment is not of course, but the court must exercise discretion in awarding it. Ibid.

In such a proceeding, the filice may appear, and by proper notice purge himself of the contempt, by showing pecuniary inability, or any other facts which may properly produce a like effect. Lockridge v. Lockridge, 3 Dana, 23, 28 Am. Dec. 53.

Where the neglect or refusal is not from mere contumacy, but from the want of means, the result of misfortune not induced by any fraudulent conduct on the defendant's part, the party will be compelled to adopt some other mode than imprisonment, to enforce the decree consistent with the practice of the courts, either by execution or other final process; or by sequestration of the real or personal estate; or by the exercise of such other powers as pertain to courts of chancery, and which may be necessary to the attainment of justice. Blake v. People, 69 Ill. 11; Newhouse v. Newhouse, 14 Or. 290, 292; Ormsby v. Ormsby, and Lockridge v. Lockridge, supra; Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475, 13 Am. Rep. 167; O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, 69 Ill. 552; Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216; Peel v. Peel, 50 Iowa, 521; Allen v. Allen, 73 Iowa, 502; Re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580; Wood v. Wood, 61 N. C. 533; Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 439.

In such a case, it is for the defendant to disclose his financial condition and to account for his earnings and their disposition, if he desires to evade the process of commitment. Bahl v. Bahl, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 560.

it, or to the mode of enforcing the judgment or decree, authority therefor must be found in the statute, and cannot be looked for elsewhere, or otherwise asserted or exercised.

Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 867; Bacon v. Bacon, 43 Wis. 202.

The court of chancery having no original jurisdiction of the subject of divorce, it (referring to power to order suit money) cannot be claimed as one of the common equity powers of the court. It is not a power inherent in the court of chancery but a special statutory power.

Re Gill's Petition, 20 Wis. 686.

The husband must show in defense of such proceedings that his non-compliance with the terms of the order was not a mere willful disobedience on his part. O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, supra.

The proceedings being designed in order to give him notice and an opportunity to be heard before an attachment for contempt is ordered. Andrew v. Andrew, 62 Vt. 495.

But unless such plea is well founded, the order will be enforced by attachment. Ormsby v. Ormsby, 1 Phila. 578.

The question of the petitioner's ability is one of fact to be determined by the court making the order, upon the evidence. Ex parte Cottrell, 50 Cal. 417.

The moment that it appears that there is inability, it is clearly the duty of the judge to discharge the party, since it is only the contempt, the disobedience, upon which the power rests. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216.

The husband is not obliged to wait for justice in a prison, and may, by proper proceedings, obtain a modification or change of the order upon these grounds. Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 489.

Such a defendant may be regarded as a debtor entitled to the benefits conferred by the Insolvent Debtor's Act, chapter 59 of the North Carolina Revised Code. Wood v. Wood, 61 N. C. 538.

In Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475, 13 Am. Rep. 187, the plaintiff claimed that the process was not in the nature of an execution to enforce performance of a duty, and that she was entitled to it without inquiry as to whether the defendant was able to perform it or not; that the question of his ability could not be inquired into in proceedings afterwards taken for his release. The court, however, held that the question of his inability to pay when not voluntary and for the purpose of evading the order, would be taken into account, and if proved to be correct he would not be committed for contempt.

Where the defendant disclosed real and personal estate, heavily mortgaged or incumbered, and did all he could, offering to surrender his property, he was held entitled to be discharged. Blake v. People, 60 Ill. 11.

So, where the order specified a time in which it was to be paid and the money was not deposited at the time, but the husband complied with the order at a subsequent term of court, stating as his reason for not doing so earlier poverty and inability to raise the sum, it was held that he could not be punished by way of contempt, and that a dismissal of the suit was error, there being no neglect or refusal to obey the court's order, such as would entitle the other party to commit for contempt. Newhouse v. Newhouse, 14 Or. 290, 292.

In Allen v. Allen, 73 Iowa, 502, the defendant failed to pay temporary alimony owing to lack of funds and the plaintiff filed a motion to strike out his answer upon the ground of contempt. The court held, that he was not in contempt and that it was error to strike out his answer.

A similar motion was made in Peel v. Peel, 50 Iowa, 321, his offer and answer which were refused and stricken out being restored upon appeal.

In Re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580, an application for discharge was made, and the court held that under the sections of the California Code, the applicant, upon proving his inability to pay, might be discharged.

Where, however, it was shown that the husband would have been able to comply, but that he disabled himself from doing so by a second marriage, his disability being voluntary and intentionally created, and an act prohibited by the judgment and in defiance of its terms, it was held that he would not be relieved from imprisonment upon that ground. Ryer v. Ryer, 67 How. Pr. 369.

X. Commitment refused.

Where, however, alimony is made a lien upon the amount by the decree in divorce, the court will not proceed by way of attachment for contempt, to enforce the payment of attorney's fees. Andrew v. Andrews, 60 Ill. 608.

Where the original judgment of the court can be enforced by execution, proceedings by way of contempt will not be allowed. Gane v. Gane, 13 Jones & S. 355; Haines v. Haines, 25 Mich. 128; Miller v. Miller, 7 Hun. 205.

In Gane v. Gane, 14 Jones & S. 218, a judgment was obtained against the defendant for the payment of certain sums as alimony, and proceedings taken to enforce the judgment by declaring him in contempt, an order was made directing him to pay the alimony and give security for the future payment, and in default thereof, that an attachment issue punishing him as for a contempt of court. It was held the proceedings by way of contempt could not be taken.

Where the wife applied for alimony, which was allowed, and on the trial the jury negatived her charges and refused the decree in divorce, it was held in a subsequent proceeding by her to recover arrears of alimony, that such order ought to be rescinded and nullified as such arrears could not be collected or enforced. O'Haley v. O'Haley, 31 Tex. 532.

So in Coughlin v. Ehlert, 39 Mo. 235, such proceedings were refused. Imprisonment for debt being abolished in that state, and execution being allowed.

They were denied to an attorney for the collection of his fees in Weill v. Weill, 10 N. Y. Supp. 627. See also infra, XIII, for decisions under state statutes.

XI. Application for relief.

Where the defendant refuses to obey an order of the court, is in contempt and liable to punishment, the court has power to refuse to hear him. Walker v. Walker, 62 N. Y. 260.

Where the defendant, committed for nonpayment of alimony pendente lite, contended that he was entitled to the benefit of the act abolishing imprisonment for debt, the court held that its terms were confined to the ordinary proceeding in a court of law, and did not embrace such a case and refused to discharge the prisoner. Wood v. Wood, 61 N. C. 538.

The imprisonment of such a defendant is not as an indignity offered to the court, but is in the nature of an execution for debt, in which the body is taken under capias ad satisfaciendum, and therefore cannot be discharged until he pays the debt, or proceeds in a proper manner to take the benefit of the insolvent debtor's act. Ibid.

Where the defendant refused obedience and was committed to jail, but was subsequently brought up on habeas corpus, and complied with the order of the court he was discharged. Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M. 607.

The power of courts of record to punish contempt is given and limited by the provisions of chapter 150, Rev. Stat.

Rev. Stat. § 8477, subdiv. 8, confers power on the court to punish by imprisonment any party for non-payment of any sum of money ordered by such court to be paid, in cases where by law execution cannot be awarded for the collection of such sum.

Execution could have been awarded for the collection of the sums due on the judgment in this case.

Rev. Stat. § 2367; Keyes v. Scanlan, 63 Wis. 345.

In Re Bissell, 40 Mich. 63, the order committing for contempt was regular on its face and recited that the contempt was admitted. The court therefore refused the application for habeas corpus holding that it could not review a committal apparently regular, and that the petitioner must appeal from the order.

Where release was sought upon habeas corpus upon the ground that since his imprisonment the petitioner had filed a petition of insolvency, and obtained a preliminary order declaring him insolvent, the court held the order worked no discharge as when the order of contempt was made and found as a fact, he was able to comply with the order for alimony. Ex parte Wilson, 73 Cal. 97.

In Ex parte Hart, 94 Cal. 254, the petitioner contended that the decree for alimony was void, as not specifying the period of payment. The court construed the decree as intending the payment to continue during life, or until modified by the court, and held that the court had power to make such order, and within the jurisdiction, the matter could be dealt with in proceedings for contempt.

Where it was contended that the precept committing the defendant to jail for nonpayment of expenses and temporary alimony, was void because it committed the prisoner "to close custody in the jail, without being allowed the liberties thereof" until the order was complied with. It was held under section 3 of chapter 488 of the Laws of 1864, and section 4, chapter 149, of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, that the prisoner was entitled to jail liberties. Re Gill's Petition, 20 Wis. 686.

But where an appeal was taken from an order committing the prisoner for contempt, in the non-payment of alimony, it was held that the party disobeying the order, committed to prison and restrained for that cause, there was no provision entitling him to the liberties of the jail. Re Clark, 20 Hun. 551, affirmed Clark v. Reilly, 81 N. Y. 638.

The precept authorizes the confinement of the delinquent to prison, and would not be executed by allowing him to go at large over the entire county, upon a bond binding him not to transcend its limits. Ibid.

Such a precept would be practically destroyed, and the summary remedy provided would be deprived of the coercive power intended by the statute. Ibid.

If the order has not been complied with by the husband, the mere fact that he has proceeded by way of petition for an alteration of the order, and for reduction of the amount, will not operate so as to stay an attachment by way of contempt for non-compliance with the order. O'Callaghan v. O'Callaghan, 69 Ill. 552.

Where no facts were shown, the defendant merely claiming that he had appealed the case to the supreme court, and that the court below had, therefore, no authority, the court held the appeal taken did not affect the merits, nor prevent proceedings being taken in the cause other than those, for enforcing payment of the alimony and expenses, had when the proceedings appealed from were commenced, and that the court had power to make a further order as to the payment of alimony accruing after appeal taken. Ross v. Griffin, 53 Mich. 5.

XIII. Power of court to inquire into.

tion for discontinuance for the nonpayment of counsel's fees was made, and it was held that the court could only discontinue the suit on payment of the amount awarded, and that if it were not paid within a given number of days, a motion might be made to the court to punish the defendant, and the special attention of the court could be drawn to the defendant's conduct when the order for alimony was served upon him.

In Spencer v. Lawler, 79 Cal. 215, the petitioner was cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and after hearing, the court decided that he had contumaciously refused to obey the order, and judged him guilty of contempt, the petitioner giving notice that he would apply for his discharge under the provisions of the code, and the judge refusing to hear the application, the plaintiff sought relief by mandamus. The court held that such refusal so soon after the first examination, was proper, but that if the application had been renewed at any time subsequent to the expiration of ten days referred to by the defendant, the matter would have been inquired into under the sections of the code.

In Errissman v. Errissman, 25 Ill. 126, the decree ordered the defendant into custody, until he should enter into a bond conditioned for the payment of alimony, and perpetually enjoined him from disposing of his property. It was held that such decree was improper, and that the husband should have been ordered to secure the alimony by mortgage upon his realty, and that he should have been restrained from selling his real estate until he complied with such order.

XIII. State statutes and decisions thereunder.

In Arkansas, under section 2668 of the Digest of Statutes of that state, ed. 1884, page 581, the court may enforce the payment of its decrees for alimony and counsel's fees, by orders and executions, and proceedings as in case of contempt.

Under section 1148 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that "any person confined in jail on an execution, issued on a judgment rendered in a civil action, must be discharged therefrom upon the conditions in this chapter specified."

The succeeding sections of the chapter provide for an application to the judge upon notice seeking discharge, and give power to the judge to examine the applicant touching his property, effects and ability to pay, and to hear evidence, with power to discharge if satisfied that the prisoner ought to be discharged.

In Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 417, the applicant sought to be discharged from imprisonment, upon the ground that the court exceeded its jurisdiction, in increasing the amount over that decreed to be paid by the judgment in the action, but the court held that under the Code, section 129 of the Civil Code, the court had authority to modify its orders in this respect, from time to time.

To hold that the prisoner, though utterly penniless, must suffer a life imprisonment for debt, because of the particular form in which the imprisonment is imposed, is a gross violation of the plain intent of the code. Re Wilson, 75 Cal. 550.

Section 18 of article 1 of the Georgia Constitution of 1868, abolishing imprisonment for debt, does not take away the power of the judge to commit to jail for contempt; section 17 of the same article, implying the contrary, making it the duty of the

The same may be enforced by supplementary proceedings.

Barker v. Dayton, supra.

Proceedings as for contempt for non payment of judgment for alimony are in contravention of Rev. Stat. § 8477, subd. 8.

Lansing v. Lansing, 4 Lans. 377; Gane v. Gane, 14 Jones & S. 218, 18 Jones & S. 355;

North v. North, 39 Mich. 67; Segear v. Segear, 23 Neb. 306; People v. Grant, 41 Hun. 351; Coughlin v. Ehliert, 39 Mo. 285; Haines v. Haines, 35 Mich. 138; Miller v. Miller, 7 Hun, 208; Jacquin v. Jacquin, 36 Hun. 378.

Therefore the court had no authority to make the order appealed from.

The fact that it is within the power of the general assembly to limit the power of the courts to punish for contempt. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216.

In divorce cases, the court is authorized to require the husband to pay the wife such sums of money as may enable her to prosecute or defend the suit, and where it is just and equitable, may allow her alimony pending the litigation, and may enforce the payment in any "manner consistent with the rules and practice of the court." Ill. Rev. Stat. ed. 1874, §§ 15, 18, p. 421. Blake v. People, 30 Ill. 11.

Section 291 of the Kansas Criminal Code gives a right of appeal, and confers jurisdiction upon the court to examine the order and judgment of the district judge. State v. Dent, 29 Kan. 416.

By section 6 of chapter 60 of the Revised Statutes of Maine, the court is authorized, pending a libel, to order the husband to pay the wife a suitable sum for her defense, or to enable her to prosecute her libel for her separate support, etc., "and to enforce obedience by appropriate process."

In Allen v. Allen, 100 Mass. 373, it was stated that under section 45 of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, chapter 107, the court might enforce decrees for the allowance of alimony, or allowances in the nature of alimony pending libels, or upon or after final decree of divorce in the same manner as decrees were enforced in equity, and that in all cases where the course of procedure was not specially prescribed, the court might issue process of attachment and of execution, and all other proper and necessary processes.

It has been decided that under the Massachusetts Statutes, chapter 76, scire facias was the proper remedy in case of non-payment of installments, and a writ of attachment for contempt was refused. Morton v. Morton, 4 Cush. 518.

Section 6709 of the Michigan Compiled Statutes is express, that when the court in contempt proceedings orders the payment of moneys to the injured party, they shall stand "instead of a fine" and therefore if a fine be imposed in addition, it is illegal and the order providing therefor will be reversed or vacated. Haines v. Haines, 35 Mich. 138.

Under the Public Acts of Michigan of 1877, Act 44, page 32, in the case of alimony for the support of children, execution is the remedy and the court will not enforce its payment by way of attachment. North v. North, 39 Mich. 67.

In North v. North, supra, it was held that under section 5689, sub-section 3, of the Compiled Laws, attachment was allowed to enforce the payment of money only when an execution could not be awarded.

Section 26 of the Statutes of Minnesota, ed. 1888, vol. 2, page 546, provides, inter alia, that any person or party disobeying such order or direction, may be punished as for contempt, the proceedings therefor being prescribed in chapter 87 of the General Statutes of 1878, respecting the punishment of contempt. The above section has reference to the proceedings for alimony in divorces.

The Missouri act concerning divorce and alimony provides that when a party neglects or refuses to pay alimony as adjudged, the court shall have power "to award an execution for the collection thereof, or to enforce the performance of the judgment or order by sequestration of property, or by such other lawful ways and means as is ac-ording to the practice of the court. Gen. Stat. 1886, § 6, chap. 114. Coughlin v. Ehliert, 39 Mo. 285.

In Nebraska it has been held that section 4a of chapter 25 of the Compiled Statutes, title "Divorce and Alimony," established the character of the order for the payment of alimony, with that of a judgment at law, and limited the enforcement and character to the same means; that it was not in the nature of a tort, and in the absence of fraud by the defendant he could not be subjected to a more summary mode of collection than that of levy and sale of property, as upon other executions, and that the commitment for contempt under section 689 of title 20 of the Civil Code was not a lawful remedy. Segear v. Segear, 23 Neb. 306.

Section 4a of the statutes above referred to provides that "all judgments and orders for payment of alimony, or of maintenance in actions of divorce, or maintenance, shall be liens upon property in like manner as in other actions, and may in the same manner be enforced and collected by executions and proceedings in aid thereof, or other execution or process, as other judgments."

The non-payment of a judgment by a defendant is not such willful disobedience of or resistance willfully offered to the lawful process or order of the court, contemplated by the statute. Segear v. Segear, supra.

Upon a failure to comply with the terms of an order for alimony, granted in a limited divorce, he may be punished for contempt under sections 1772, 1773, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Ryckman v. Ryckman, 34 Hun. 235; Mendel v. Mendel, 25 N. Y. Week. Dig. 314.

The proceedings to be taken for that purpose must be such as are prescribed in title 3 of chapter 17 of the Code. Mendel v. Mendel, supra.

By section 1768 of Bliss' New York Code, vol. 2, page 175, where the husband makes default, and payment cannot be enforced by the proceedings prescribed in the foregoing section, or by resorting to the security, the court may, in its discretion, require him to show cause and punish him for his failure, the proceedings being taken as prescribed in title 3, chapter 17 of the Act, and such order may be made without previous sequestration or direction to give security, the court being satisfied that such course would be ineffectual.

Sections 1769, 1772, and 1773, of the New York Code, seem to be to secure the appropriation of personal property, or the rents and profits of real property, or both, by sequestration, if there be any such property, and to authorize the courts to act directly by proceedings to punish for contempt, if any evidence is offered from which it presumptively and satisfactorily appears that payment cannot be enforced by means of sequestration where security has not been given, or by resorting to security if any have been given. Bahl v. Bahl, 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 500, where it was sought to commit the defendant for contempt in not paying alimony and counsel's fees.

Section 1773 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where the husband fails to pay, and it appears presumptively that payment cannot be enforced either by sequestration or by a resort to the security which the husband may have given, the husband may be punished for contempt of court.

Section 2306 of the Code authorizes the proceed-defendant to pay the amount due on the judgment is a condition precedent to the order that he be imprisoned for failure to pay the same.

Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 489; Mahon v. Mahon, 18 Jones & S. 92; Whitney v. Whitney, 26 Jones & S. 885.

Mr. H. W. Barney, for respondent:

ings only when "a right or remedy of a party to a civil action or special proceeding . . . may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced thereby." Mendel v. Mendel, supra.

And by section 2381 of the same, a commitment of a defendant can only be made when it is determined that the accused has committed the offense charged, and that it was "calculated to, or actually did, defeat, impair, impede, and prejudice the rights or remedies of the other party." Ibid.

And section 14 is to the same effect, providing for punishment by fine or imprisonment, or either, of a neglect or violation of duty, or other misconduct by which a right or remedy of a party to a civil or special proceeding, pending in the court, may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced. Ibid.

Section 2368 of the Code authorizes a commitment to prison of a person neglecting to pay a specified sum of money, which the court has required him to pay, and under section 2369 he may be committed without notice; the application for his commitment may be ex parte on proof by affidavit of a personal demand and of refusal or neglect to pay. Isaacs v. Isaacs, 61 How. Pr. 369, 10 Daly, 366.

The proceedings to punishment must be taken in the manner prescribed in title 3 of chapter 17 of the Code of Civil Procedure, section 2299 of the same chapter and title also requiring an order to show cause to be made and served, or a warrant of attachment to be issued, to bring the party before the court. Sandford v. Sandford, 40 Hun, 540.

Where the husband was ordered to pay the costs but upon demand refused, it was held that section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which enacts that a judgment may be enforced by attachment, when the judgment requires "the payment of money into court, or to an officer of the court," did not apply to the case, the section requiring a payment of money other than costs, given by a final judgment to the party or to his attorney. Noland v. Noland, 29 Hun, 680.

The application to punishment must comply with the above provisions if it is made upon a mere notice of motion, it is insufficient. Sandford v. Sandford, supra.

In Pritchard v. Pritchard, 4 Abb. N. C. 298, it was held that under section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where a counsel's fee, disbursements, and costs were awarded to the plaintiff's attorney, in a final judgment decrees in divorce, the order was enforceable by attachment, particularly where an execution therefore has been returned unsatisfied.

It has been held that the power of the court to imprison the husband for the non-payment of alimony, without first giving him notice of the application for his commitment, where it was not adjudicated that it would be of any avail to make an order of sequestration, or for the giving of security turned upon the construction of the phrase "it appears presumptively" and as used by the codifier in compiling the code, the court holding that the intention was to prohibit the commitment, which existed under the revised statutes, until satisfactory proof was given to the court that the money could not be collected in any other way. Isaacs v. Isaacs, supra.

Subdivision 8, section 3477, Revised Statutes, reads as follows:

"All other cases where attachments, and proceedings, as for contempts, have been usually adopted and practiced in courts of record, to enforce the civil remedies of any party or to protect the rights of any party."

The plaintiff was not estopped from enfor-

In Lansing v. Lansing, 4 Lana. 377, it was held that an attachment for the non-payment of costs and alimony was unauthorized under section 236 of the Code, as an execution could be awarded for their collection, and sub-section 3 excepts such cases from punishment by way of contempt, as not being for the non-payment of money.

Where the judgment directed the husband to pay the amount of costs and counsel's fees to the attorneys for the plaintiff, within a given number of days after service of a certified copy of the judgment, it was held that the provisions of section 1778 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to a judgment entered for the recovery of costs in divorce proceedings, and that therefore he could not be committed as for a contempt. Jacquin v. Jacquin, 36 Hun, 378.

The direction given for the payment of costs in the judgment, was not a mandate within the signification of subdivision 3 of section 8 of the Code, that having been defined by sub-section 2 of section 8343 of the Code, as not including a fixed sum of money by a final judgment. Ibid.

In Branth v. Branth, 50 Hun, 623, mem., the court approved and followed Jacquin v. Jacquin, supra, holding that there was no power to commit for the non-payment of costs and allowances, contained in the final judgment in divorce, and distinguished the case from Park v. Park, 80 N. Y. 156, upon the ground that the costs and expenses for which the attachment was issued in that case were the costs and expenses of the proceedings for the attachment.

Where the defendant is arrested and remains imprisoned under the commitment for the full term for which he was imprisoned, under section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he cannot be again imprisoned for the non-payment of other sums of money afterwards becoming due under the judgment; such section providing that "the prisoner shall not be again imprisoned upon a like process issued in the same action, or arrested in any action upon any judgment, under which the same may have been granted." Winton v. Winton, 53 Hun, 4.

The language of the section is very general and entirely unrestrained, and its obvious meaning is that no further process shall be issued against a person, in an action for divorce upon which he shall be committed to prison for the non-payment of a sum of money after he has been once imprisoned and lawfully discharged under the preceding provisions of the section. Ibid.

The right to an attachment in any case under section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not imperative but discretionary, and will not be granted to collect costs or alimony in divorce proceedings, when the party is unable to comply with the demand; imprisonment and consequent disgrace should not be put upon a person who is too poor to pay. Noland v. Noland, supra.

Yet the defendant's answer to the application for his commitment, by way of affidavit, showing his inability to make the payments required from him, was held not to relieve him from the obligation to comply with the directions contained in the judgment, and that his proper course was by way of motion under section 2236 of the Code. Ryckman v. Ryckman, 34 Hun, 236.

Attachment for contempt is the proper method of enforcing a decree for the payment of alimony.

Wallen v. Wallen, 9 Lanc. L. Rev. 99; Ex parte Hart, 94 Cal. 254; Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 874.

Willful non-payment of final alimony in installments, awarded for the support of children after divorce, can be punished by proceedings as for a contempt.

Hand v. Hand, 25 Ohio L. J. 214.

The remedy provided under the code was held to be applicable to judgments previously recovered, and was intended to provide a uniform remedy by which rights of that description might be enforced. Ibid.

Before a defendant can be relieved under the provisions, an opportunity must be afforded to the plaintiff to controvert the statements made by the defendant, for the purpose of securing his release, and such opportunity is not secured where his affidavit may be interposed as an answer to the application for his punishment. Ibid.

To such a proceeding, it has been held that the pecuniary circumstances of the husband showing his inability to pay was no defense to the motion. Strobridge v. Strobridge, 21 Hun, 288.

In the above case it was held that section 20 of 2 Rev. Stat. 538, applied to cases in which the husband was actually imprisoned, and did not extend to an application to be relieved from the order, on account of inability to comply therewith, which must be made to the court upon notice to the parties. Ibid.

In Mahon v. Mahon, 18 Jones & S. 22, an order by default was obtained, the defendant obtaining leave to open the default, and the matter being referred the referee found in favor of the wife; upon motion to compel payment and to commit, the court held that as it was not shown that the offense committed was calculated to, or did, actually defeat, impair, or prejudice the rights or remedies of the plaintiff, the order should not be made under sections 2281, 2283, of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In Ford v. Ford, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 74, 41 How. Pr. 160, decided under 2 Rev. Stat. 535, § 4, it was held that the order for the payment of temporary alimony being interlocutory or ad interim order, it could not be enforced by execution, that process being allowed only upon final judgments, except for interlocutory costs, and that unless a party could be proceeded against under the statute concerning contempts, there would be no remedy for the collection of the alimony unless the court had power to sequester property of the husband, and that even such latter power did not take away the power of the court to punish for contempt.

By section 3297 of the Tennessee Code, ed. of 1884, page 615, the court may enforce its orders and decrees, by sequestering the rents and profits of the real estates of the husband, if he has any, and his personal estate and choses in action, and by appointing a receiver thereof, and from time to time causing the same to be applied to the use of the complainant and her children, or by such other lawful ways and means as are usual and according to the course and practice of the court, as to the court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity and good conscience.

In Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 387, it was held that supplemental proceedings to compel the payment of a judgment for alimony might be instituted under section 15 of chapter 111 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, which provide that actions to annul and affirm a marriage, or for a divorce, and all other matters coming within the provisions of that chapter, not otherwise specially prescribed, shall be conducted in the same manner as other actions in courts, and the court shall have power to award issue to, and adjudge costs, and enforce its judgments as in other cases, such supplemental proceedings being considered as statements in the action, and not by way of separation action.

Section 24 of chapter 111 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin authorizes the judgment of divorce, or a separate judgment upon divorce to provide for alimony for the wife for the maintenance of herself and children, according to the ability of the husband and the circumstances of the parties; and section 28 of the same chapter authorizes a revision of such judgment, and such new judgment as the court may make. Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 205.

It is an undoubted and general principle of the law of divorce that the courts, either of law or of equity, possess no powers, except such as are conferred by statute, and that to justify any act or proceeding in a case of divorce, whether it be such as pertains to the ground or cause of action, or to the process, pleadings, or practice in it, or to the mode of enforcing the judgment, or decree, authorities therefor must be found in the statute and cannot be looked for elsewhere, or otherwise asserted or exercised. Bacon v. Bacon, 43 Wis. 208.

Section 2307 of the Wisconsin Divorce Act, Revised Statute, authorizes the court on adjudging alimony to the wife, to provide that the same may be paid as shall be deemed expedient, or to impose it as a charge upon a specific real estate of the party liable, or to require sufficient security to be given for the payment thereof, according to the judgment, and upon the failure to pay such alimony "the court may enforce the payment thereof by execution or otherwise as in other cases." Keyes v. Scanlan, 65 Wis. 345.

Under section 2307 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, where alimony or other allowance is adjudged the wife, the court may provide for the payment of the same, and such sums and at such times as it shall deem expedient, or may require sufficient security to be given therefor; and if the husband is unable to give the bond, and such fact is proved to the satisfaction of the court, he will not be committed to prison for contempt. Wright v. Wright, 74 Wis. 489.

XIV. English Decisions.

An application for an attachment against a husband for the non-payment of alimony and costs should be made in one motion. Watts v. Watts, 4 Swab. & T. 274.

Under the fifty-second section of the English Divorce Act, 20 & 21 Vict. chap. 25, all decrees and orders in any suit, proceeding, or petition, instituted under the authority of the act, are enforceable and put in execution as judgments, orders, and decrees of the high court of chancery. Ex parte Holden, 18 C. B. N. S. 641, 38 L. J. C. P. 111, 9 Jur. N. S. 940 7 L. T. N. S. 791.

It is not necessary to exhaust other possible remedies to become entitled to the contempt proceeding.

Andrew v. Andrew, 63 Vt. 495; Curtis v. Gordon, Id. 340; Potts v. Potts, 68 Mich. 493.

Alimony is a mere personal duty of the husband, which courts will control and enforce, from time to time, in their discretion.

Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The broad ground is taken by the appellant that the court has no power to enforce, by contempt proceedings, payment of permanent alimony ordered to be paid by a final judgment of divorce. His premises are: First, a judgment for alimony may be enforced by execution. Rev. Stat., § 2867. Second, contempt proceedings for the non-payment of money are only authorized where execution cannot be awarded. Id. § 3477, subdiv. 8. Hence, in the present case, the judgment for alimony being capable of enforcement by execution, contempt proceedings will not lie.

Were the judgment here a judgment for a gross sum, payable at once, it might un-

Where an order was made for the payment of the wife's costs, in a suit for judicial separation, and a demand made therefor by a party, signed by the petitioner's attorney who produced a receipt for the same, the court held the demand sufficient to ground proceedings for attachment. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Swab. & T. 64, 2 L. T. N. S. 390, 8 Week. Rep. 478.

A personal demand for the payment of a sum of money within a specified time is unnecessary where the order for payment has been personally served, and an attachment will issue thereon. Nicholls v. Nicholls, 2 Swab. & T. 637, 31 L. J. Mat. 115, 7 L. T. N. S. 221.

The original order for the payment of costs must be served by showing the same, before the court will grant an attachment, and where such order has been filed in the registry, the court will direct it to be delivered out for that purpose. Davies v. Davies, 2 Swab. & T. 437, 31 L. J. Mat. 104, 6 L. T. N. S. 163, 10 Week. Rep. 447.

A copy of the order must be served, and a copy annexed to the affidavit of service, before the court will grant an attachment for the non-payment of costs pursuant to the order. Busby v. Busby, 3 Swab. & T. 383, 30 L. J. Mat. 172, 5 L. T. N. S. 137.

In Parr v. Parr, 4 Swab. & T. 229, it was held that it was competent to a party to object on a motion for attachment for non-compliance with an order of the court, to the sufficiency of the service of the order on him.

The court will not grant an attachment for the non-payment of costs, unless the original order for payment has been served upon the party liable by showing the same to him. Parr v. Parr, 32 L. J. Mat. 90, 11 Week. Rep. 550, 4 Swab. & T. 229.

In Hamerton v. Hamerton, 1 Hag. Eccl. Rep. 23, it was held that where no sufficient cause was shown for neglect to comply with an order, personally served upon the party, he may be pronounced contumacious, but otherwise, if he has virtually obeyed, or is willing to obey the order.

If the court is satisfied of the husband's inability, through poverty, to comply with the order of the court for the payment of the wife's costs in a matrimonial suit against the husband, an attachment will not be granted for disobedience to such an order, but in such a case the court will allow an execution to be issued for the arrears of alimony pendente lite. Ward v. Ward, 1 Swab. & T. 484, 29 L. J. Mat. 17.

In Hepworth v. Hepworth, 2 Swab. & T. 414, 31 L. J. Mat. 18, 5 L. T. N. S. 385, 10 Week. Rep. 195, the husband disobeyed an order to pay into court, or give security for the wife's costs of the hearing, and alleged as the grounds of so doing, his inability to raise the money or security. The court ordered an attachment but allowed it to remain in the registry for a week.

In Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Swab. & T. 385, where an order was made for the restitution of conjugal rights upon the wife's petition, it was held that the husband was bound to make the first step, by inviting his wife home, and was liable to attachment for neglect of such duty.

And the court will not withhold the enforcement of its order, by reason that the party obtaining such order is in contempt, and is a resident out of the country for the purpose of evading the process of the court. Greenhill v. Greenhill, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 462, where a sentence of separation had been pronounced in favor of the wife and alimony had been allotted.

In Bremner v. Bremner, 8 Swab. & T. 373, 33 L. J. Mat. 202, 10 L. T. N. S. 99, 13 Week. Rep. 444, a balance was due from the husband for alimony and costs, with an agreement between the parties that it should be paid by installments, and that an attachment should be granted, but was to remain in the registry until after default. It was held that the court had power to enforce an attachment after the suit had been dismissed.

In Dickens v. Dickens, 2 Swab. & T. 521, the husband was in custody under an attachment for non-compliance with an order for the payment of costs and it was sought to recover a second attachment against him. The court directed a writ of habeas corpus to issue, and upon the husband's appearing he was charged under the second attachment.

Where the husband was committed for the non-payment of tax costs, and about eight months afterwards moved to set aside the attachment, upon the ground that the amount of costs was indorsed on the writ, the allocatur and order for payment having been served upon him, the court held his application too late. Pearson v. Pearson, 3 Swab. & T. 546, 31 L. J. Mat. 102, 8 Jur. N. S. 153, 5 L. T. N. S. 772, 10 Week. Rep. 410.

In Holland v. Holland, 4 Swab. & T. 73, the court refused to grant an attachment against the husband for the non-payment of certain costs incurred on behalf of the wife in her suit for judicial separation, where, on the husband's uncontradicted answer, it appeared that he had been compelled to separate from her for several months, in consequence of her drunkenness and violence, and had not the present means of complying with the order. 34 L. J. Mat. 65, 13 Week. Rep. 505.

In Shine v. Shine [1893] Prob. 299, the husband, an undischarged bankrupt, was in receipt of a weekly salary, not under the control of the trustee in bankruptcy, and an order of the court was served upon him to pay into court, or give security for a certain sum to cover the wife's costs of the hearing, which he neglected to obey for nearly two years. The court held that although he was an undischarged bankrupt, yet he was liable to an attachment and ordered accordingly.

In De Loessy v. De Loessy, 15 Prob. Div. 115, the decree was made absolute for a divorce on the wife's petition, and as part of the final order, the husband was directed to pay a permanent maintenance to the wife. It was held that there was no power to grant an attachment against the husband for the non-payment of arrears due under the order.

doubtedly be docketed as a money judgment, and execution might issue to enforce it. Keyes v. Scanlan, 63 Wis. 845. In that case the argument would be strong that contempt proceedings could not be resorted to, and the position would not be without authority. Lansing v. Lansing, 4 Lans. 377. This decision, however, has been seriously questioned in New York. Strobridge v. Strobridge, 21 Hun, 288. But conceding the correctness of the doctrine, it cannot apply to the present case. Execution can be issued only on a judgment which has been docketed. Rev. Stat., §§ 2968, 2969. It does not appear in the present case that any judgment has been docketed for any of the installments of alimony. In fact, there seems to be no provision of law for such docketing. A judgment is to be docketed at the time of filing the judgment roll. Id. § 2899. The remarks of the court in Park v. Park, 18 Hun, 466, upon this point, are quite pertinent. It is there said: "It is not explained, however, in that case [referring to Lansing v. Lansing, supra], how a judgment for final alimony is to be docketed,—whether or not a new docket is to be made every time the annual or semi-annual alimony becomes payable. And as a judgment is made a lien only for ten years from the filing of the roll and docketing, it is not clear how, after ten years from the judgment, the amounts of the alimony are to be docketed so as to be a lien on land. And docketing is necessary before the issue of execution. Besides, after the lapse of five years from the entry of judgment, execution is to issue only by leave of the court, granted on notice. How this provision is to apply to alimony is not explained in that decision." This reasoning was concurred in by the court of appeals in the same case. Park v. Park, 80 N. Y. 156. Our conclusion is that contempt proceedings will lie to compel payment of installments of alimony ordered to be paid in the future by a final judgment of divorce. It is true that the remedy is severe and harsh. Imprisonment certainly should not be ordered when it appears that the default is the result of honest inability to pay, on account of business misfortunes, or lack of health or earning ability, or other circumstances which are not the fault of defendant. But where the inability is willfully brought about by defendant himself, with intent to avoid payment, the refusal to pay becomes contumacious, and the inability so resulting will not purge the defendant of contempt. The present case seems clearly one of contumacious refusal to pay. It stands admitted that the defendant, in abusive language, has refused to pay, and declared his intention never to pay, any part of the judgment, notwithstanding he is a strong, able-bodied man, and engaged in an occupation which must, in the natural course of things, bring him considerable returns. He has defied the order of the court, and, in effect, declared his intention to continue such defiance, whatever his financial condition may be. We think that, in such a case, imprisonment for contempt may be inflicted. The question of whether or not the act is contumacious is one which the trial court has far better opportunity to determine than this court. We regard the order of the trial court in this case as practically a decision that the act of the defendant is contumacious, and the record leads our minds to the same conclusion. It was argued that the imprisonment should be limited to six months, under Rev. Stat. § 3492. It is sufficient to say that the order is plainly made under Id. § 3479, and that it is justified under the terms of that section.

*1. Where an action is begun in the district court by a petition seeking legal relief, there being an answer praying for equitable relief, and a trial by jury being waived, an objection to a judgment granting equitable relief upon the ground that the action was at law is not well founded. The district courts are court of general legal and equitable jurisdiction. No forms of action are recognized, and the courts has power to administer either legal or equitable relief according as the pleadings warrant and the proof requires.

NOTE.—Considerable difference of doctrine exists in respect to the question when a certificate of deposit becomes overdue, as to which, see note to First Nat. Bank of Rapid City v. Security Nat. Bank of Sioux City (Neb.) 15 L. R. A. 388.

2. Where an instrument negotiable by delivery is lost before maturity, a bond of indemnity should be required as a condition for recovery thereon; but where it is clearly shown that the instrument was payable to order, and not indorsed, or that it was lost after maturity, no indemnity should generally be required.

3. A certificate of deposit, in the usual form, issued by a bank, and made payable to order or bearer, is negotiable, and a bona fide purchaser thereof for value, before maturity without notice of equities, is protected to the same extent as an innocent holder of other negotiable paper.

4. The negotiability of such a certificate is destroyed neither by a stipulation that it is payable on return of the certificate properly indorsed, nor by a provision that it is payable in current funds, nor by a provision that it shall bear interest if left six months, but no interest after six months.

5. A certificate of deposit as follows: "This certifies that A. B. has deposited in this bank $3,000, payable to order of self, in current funds, on return of this certificate properly indorsed. This deposit not subject to check. With interest at 6% if left six months. No interest after six months,"—is overdue, so as to charge purchasers with notice of equities, after the expiration of six months, and not until then.

6. In actions tried by the court, there must be a general finding and, if requested by one of the parties, a special finding; and if this finding be vague, uncertain, or indefinite, it will not support a judgment, when attacked directly.

7. Accordingly, where there is no general finding, and no special finding upon the issues upon which the form of the judgment depends, the judgment must be reversed.

Mr. J. B. Cesana, also for defendant in error.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion.

A brief statement of the pleadings is necessary to a consideration of this case. The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff in the district court. In her petition she avers that on December 4, 1890, she deposited with the defendant bank $3,000, for which the defendant issued to her a certificate of deposit; that on or about June 6, 1891, she lost the certificate, and at once gave notice of loss to the defendant; that she had not, at the time of the loss, or at any other time, indorsed the certificate, or in any other way negotiated or hypothecated the same. The prayer was for a judgment for the amount of the certificate, with interest. The defendant, by its answer, admits the deposit, and the issuance of a certificate in words and figures as follows: "First National Bank. Hastings, Nebraska, Dec. 4, 1890, 28,906. This certifies that Miss Rose Kirkwood has deposited in this bank three thousand dollars ($3,000.00), payable to the order of self, in current funds, on return of this certificate properly indorsed. This deposit not subject to check. With interest at 6 per cent if left six months. No interest after six months. C. B. Hutton, for Cashier. Certificate of deposit." The defendant further alleged that, when the plaintiff demanded payment, she failed to produce the certificate, claiming that she had lost it; that the defendant was at all times ready and willing to pay the certificate, upon its production, or, if lost, to pay it upon the execution and delivery of a sufficient indemnifying bond. The defendant then denied each and every allegation in the petition not specifically admitted or modified, and prayed that the plaintiff be ordered to execute and deliver an indemnity bond to secure it against any loss by reason of said certificate. There was a trial upon these pleadings, a jury being expressly waived, and the following finding and judgment was entered: "This cause comes finally on to be heard upon the petition of the plaintiff, the answer of the defendant, and the evidence, and the same is submitted to the court. Upon consideration, the court finds that there is due to the plaintiff from the defendant, upon the cause of action set out in her said petition, the sum of $3,000. It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff have and recover of and from the said defendant the said sum of $3,000, and that each party to this action pay half of the costs herein. It is also considered and ordered by the court that the defendant pay the said sum of $3,000 to the clerk of this court, to be paid over to said plaintiff upon the filing by plaintiff with the clerk of this court of a good and sufficient bond of indemnity, with approved sureties, to be approved by said clerk; indemnifying the said defendant against any and all liability which may hereafter arise, and might subject the said defendant to the payment of the said certificate of deposit, as set out in said petition, and heretofore lost by said plaintiff." The plaintiff brings the cause here, assigning several errors; all, however, going to the authority of the court to make an order requiring a bond of indemnity. There is no bill of exceptions, and the case can be reviewed only upon the petition, answer, and judgment.

There is a great deal of argument in the briefs to the effect that the action was begun as one at law; that an action at law can only be maintained upon a lost instrument when it is nonnegotiable, or, if negotiable, when lost after maturity, or unindorsed, and that in any event, in an action at law, no indemnity can be required. These distinctions have been recognized in England, and generally in those of the United States where the courts of law and equity are distinct. But counsel lose sight of the fact that our district courts are courts of general law and equity jurisdiction; that the code abolishes formal distinctions between law and equity, and that, where a cause of action, either at law or in equity, is stated in a petition, the district court may administer relief according to the nature of the case, without regard to forms of action. Had the old practice prevailed, upon the tender of proper issues, if the court had found that indemnity was proper, the plaintiff could have obtained no relief, if she began at law. Had she begun in equity, she would have obtained the appropriate relief according to the pleadings and the proof. Under our practice, she alleging a state of facts entitling her to relief at law, and the defendant, by answer, setting up facts entitling it to equitable relief, the question is not one of jurisdiction, but of proof; and the court had jurisdiction to enter either an absolute judgment, or one conditioned upon the execution of an indemnity bond, according as the proof might justify.

The rule as to whether or not indemnity should be required in an action upon a lost instrument has been practically settled in this state. In Mowery v. Mast, 14 Neb. 510, it was held that where a negotiable instrument is lost after it becomes due, a recovery may be had in a court of law. This was a case where the suit had been begun originally before a justice of the peace, and his jurisdiction depended upon that question. It was there said: "Where a negotiable instrument, in such form that the legal title will pass to the holder by delivery, is lost before it becomes due, there is good reason for requiring a bond of indemnity from the person who has lost the instrument, if he bring an action on such lost instrument to recover the amount due thereon. In such case the action should be brought in a court of equity which, may impose suitable conditions upon the plaintiff before he will be permitted to recover. But where it is clearly shown that an instrument is lost after it has become due, and an action is brought thereon by the actual owner, no indemnity would seem to be necessary. The instrument will stand on the same ground as though it was nonnegotiable, and a recovery thereon by the actual owner will be a complete bar to an action by a party who has received the instrument after it has become due." In Means v. Kendall, 35 Neb. 698, it was held that where a negotiable note is lost before it is due the court will require indemnity, but, where lost after due, no bond will ordinarily be required. It does not appear in that case whether or not the note was negotiable by delivery only; but from the language of the first case cited, and upon general principles, as settled by the weight of authority (Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1481), indemnity will not be required where the instrument is payable to order, and clearly shown not to have been indorsed, even if lost before maturity, because in that event the maker would be subjected to no liability.

Applying the rules to this case, no indemnity should be required, unless the instrument was negotiable. So far as the character of the instrument is concerned, as being a certificate of deposit, and for the present disregarding its particular phraseology, this court has said that: "The established doctrine is that a certificate of deposit, in the usual form, issued by a bank, and made payable to order or bearer, is negotiable; and a bona fide purchaser thereof for value, before maturity, without notice of equities, is protected to the same extent as an innocent holder of other negotiable paper." First Nat. Bank of Rapid City v. Security Nat. Bank of Sioux City, 84 Neb. 71, 15 L. R. A. 886. Was there anything upon this certificate to take it out of the general rule, and render it non-negotiable? It is argued that the provision that it should be payable "on return of this certificate properly indorsed" destroys its negotiability. That, however, was the language of the certificate in First Nat. Bank of Rapid City v. Security Nat. Bank of Sioux City, supra, and these certificates were there treated as negotiable paper. It has indeed, been frequently said that the stipulation for the return of the certificate adds nothing to the instrument. It is merely the expression of a rule which applies to all negotiable paper, and an action may be maintained without a previous presentment. This question was thoroughly considered in the case last cited. As to the requirement that it should be properly indorsed, it would seem that an indorsement by the payee would not be necessary. A "proper" indorsement is such an indorsement as the law merchant requires in order to authorize a payment to the holder. If presented by the original payee, no indorsement would be proper, or at least necessary. If presented by another, "proper indorsement," to show his title, would be requisite. We do not think that this provision operates as a condition destroying the negotiability of the instrument.

It is next said that the amount of payment is uncertain, and the instrument, for that reason nonnegotiable. This argument is predicated chiefly upon the provision that the certificate is payable "in current funds." We are aware that many courts have held that such a clause does not require payment in money, and destroys the negotiability of the instrument. The cases so holding are either cases arising at a time when many forms of bank notes and bills were in use, varying in their values, or cases decided upon the authority of that class, without regard to changed conditions. With regard to existing conditions, we think the Supreme Court of the United States has declared the law correctly in Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, 123 U. S. 105, 81 L. ed. 97, as follows: "Within a few years, commencing with the first issue in this country of notes declared to have the quality of legal tender, it has been a common practice of drawers of bills of exchange or checks, or makers of promissory notes, to indicate whether the same are to be paid in gold or silver, or in such notes, and the term 'current funds' has been used to designate in fact any of these; all being current, and declared, by positive enactment, to be legal tender. It was intended to cover whatever was receivable and current by law as money, whether in the form of notes or coin. Thus construed, we do not think the negotiability of the paper in question was impaired by the insertion of those words." This also is the doctrine of the court of appeals of New York. Pardee v. Fish, 60 N. Y. 265, 19 Am. Rep. 176. And the supreme court of Illinois has held that a check so drawn entitles the holder to demand coin, or its equivalent. Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupper, 28 Ill. 332, 81 Am. Dec. 284. We are satisfied with the reasoning of these cases, as against the contrary authorities, and therefore hold that a provision for payment in current funds is, in effect, for payment in money, and that such an instrument, if having no other requisites, is negotiable.

It is also contended that the negotiability of the instrument was destroyed by uncertainty of amount, arising from the provision that it should draw interest at 6 per cent, if left six months, but no interest after six months. In Lamb v. Story, 45 Mich. 488, it was held that the negotiability of a note payable on or before two years from date was destroyed by a memorandum attached, providing that, if paid within one year, there should be no interest; and that case is cited by Mr. Daniel in support of a similar statement, and is the only authority cited. We are not satisfied with that doctrine. In Hope v. Barker, 112 Mo. 388, the provision was: "Without interest thereon, if paid at maturity. If not paid at maturity, to bear interest from date." It was held that that provision did not destroy the negotiability of the note; the note, on its face, showing what should be paid at any particular time, and being therefore certain in its terms. The circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit has recently held that a provision for interest after maturity, and attorney's fees, did not render a bill nonnegotiable, saying: "It is intended to be a circulating medium until maturity. For this purpose, every purchaser must know exactly what will be, or ought to be, paid on it at maturity. It only has currency upon the hypothesis that it is to be paid at that time. If the sum then to be paid is fixed and certain, we do not see why that is not sufficient." Farmers Nat. Bank of Valparaiso, Ind. v. Sutton Mfg. Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 191, 17 L. R. A. 595, 6 U. S. App. 312. We think the same reasoning applies here. Every purchaser has, upon the face of the note, evidence of the exact amount to be paid. If he takes it within six months, he knows that the amount to be paid, if presented within that period, is the face of the certificate, without interest; that if presented at the end of six months, or at any subsequent time, the amount is the face of the certificate, with interest for six months at the rate of 6 per cent. Nothing could be more certain or more absolute. When did the certificate become due, so as to charge a purchaser with notice of equities? There could be no doubt that, if the certificate had provided simply for payment upon presentment properly indorsed, it would be, in effect, a promissory note payable on demand, and would be overdue, so as to charge a purchaser with notice, at the latest, after the lapse of a reasonable time for presentment. Dan. Neg. Inst. 788. But the terms of this instrument are different. It was to draw interest if left six months, but in no event to draw interest after six months. In First Nat. Bank of Rapid City v. Security Nat. Bank of Sioux City, supra, an instrument payable upon the return of the certificate properly indorsed, bearing across its face the language, "This certificate payable three months after date, with 6% interest per annum for the time specified," was held to be payable three months after date. There the language was absolute, and the construction given was undoubtedly correct. We should here follow the rule adopted in that case, and so construe the certificate as to give effect to every part. It would seem that the result would be to reach an analogy to instruments payable "on or before" a certain date, which are due at the expiration of the time so fixed, and not before. Mattison v. Marks, 81 Mich. 421, 18 Am. Rep. 197; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 43. Surely, a purchaser reading this certificate within six months from its date, observing that, if presented before the expiration of six months, it would draw no interest, but if presented at the end of that period would bear interest, would be justified in presuming that it had not been presented. Equally certain it is that seeing it after the expiration of six months, and observing by its terms that it could draw no interest thenceforth forever, he would be put upon inquiry to ascertain why it had not been presented when interest ceased. We think the instrument should be treated, so far as ascertaining the rights of purchasers, as one payable on or before six months after date, or, if not, that then, from the peculiar nature of the contract, six months after date should be treated as the reasonable time within which it should be presented, and a purchaser taking it within that period should be considered as a purchaser before maturity. Adopting, then, the conclusions we have outlined, this was a negotiable instrument, which a bona fide purchaser for value, within six months from its date, would be entitled to enforce against the defendant.

Recurring now to the judgment, it will be seen that the only finding upon the issues was "that there is due to the plaintiff from the defendant, upon the cause of action set out in her said petition, the sum of $3,090. Does this finding support the judgment rendered? In several cases the general doctrine has been announced that a finding need be no more specific than the verdict of a jury upon the same pleadings. Upon this rule, it has been held that where a justice of the peace rendered judgment, saying "it was found by this court that the plaintiff have and recover" a certain sum, it was sufficient, but the issue in that case was practically the general issue upon a claim and counterclaim. Ranadell v. Putnam, 15 Neb. 643. In Rhodes v. Thomas, 81 Neb. 848, a justice rendered a judgment as follows: "Court convenes, and defense proceeds with examination of witnesses, after which case is argued by parties, and submitted to the court, with the following finding: Oct. 17, 1888, after hearing the evidence, it is therefore considered by me that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendant the sum of $69.15." This was held equivalent to a general finding, but the case rested largely upon the liberality with which records of a justice of the peace should be construed. In several cases, similar judgments have been sustained, as against collateral attacks, upon the ground that, while they might be voidable, they were not void. Black v. Cabon, 24 Neb. 248, is an example of this class of cases. Upon the other hand, it has been several times held that in actions tried by the court there must be a general finding, and, when requested by one of the parties, a special finding, and if this finding be vague, uncertain, or indefinite, it will not sustain a judgment, when attacked directly. Sprick v. Washington County, 8 Neb. 253; Smith v. Silvis, 8 Neb. 164; Crossley v. Steele, 13 Neb. 219; Foster v. Devinney, 28 Neb. 416. Had the issue in this case been simply as to the amount of recovery, or had it been such that a finding of an amount due plaintiff from the defendant would logically cover the essential issues, we might treat it as sufficient to determine the case and authorize a judgment; but the most that can be claimed for the finding is that it determined the amount of the certificate, and that it determined that the plaintiff remained the owner thereof. The determination of these issues was not sufficient to adjudicate the case. The plaintiff avers that she lost the certificate on or about the 6th of June, which would be after maturity, as we have construed the certificate. She also avers that she had never indorsed it. A determination of either of these facts in her favor would entitle her to an absolute judgment against the defendant, without a requirement for indemnity. The defendant, by its general denial, put both facts in issue. If it were shown that she lost the certificate before it was due, and that before its loss she had indorsed it, so that it became payable to bearer, then payment could not be required, except upon the giving of indemnity. We have not the evidence before us, and the court did not find upon either of these issues. Upon their determination the character of the judgment must depend.

There is therefore no finding sufficient to sustain that portion of the judgment requiring indemnity. That portion of the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial upon the issues relating to the defendant's claim for indemnity. Judgment accordingly.

Herman EINSPAHR.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. A purchaser of real estate at a sale thereof on execution acquires thereby, prior to confirmation, only the lien which the execution debtor had on such land.
2. Under our law governing sales of real property on execution, the title of a purchaser thereof depends upon a final confirmation of the sale made; and until this is had, and a conveyance of the real estate is executed and delivered, in pursuance of such confirmation, the legal title of the execution debtor to the real estate is not divested.
3. Where real estate is sold on ordinary execution, the sale confirmed, and a conveyance made and delivered to the purchaser, the title he thereby acquires relates back, and such purchaser obtains the same title to the real estate the execution debtor had at the time the judgment under which the land was sold became a lien thereon, except as affected by subsequent tax liens.
4. But this doctrine of relation back applies only to the title. It has no necessary reference to the quantum of the estate which the execution debtor owned at the time the judgment became a lien.

*Headnotes by RAGAN, C.

NOTE.—As to the nature of the interest of a purchaser at execution sale, see note to Robertson v. Vanleave (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 68.

5. The owner of real estate that has been sold on execution retains the legal title thereto, and is entitled to the possession, rents, profits, and usufruct of such real estate, until a final confirmation of the sale is made.

6. A judgment debtor harvested a crop of wild grass from land after it had been sold on execution against him, but before the confirmation of the sale. In an action of replevin brought by the purchaser of the real estate at the execution sale for the grass,—held that, as the grass was severed from the realty before the confirmation of the sale, the title to the grass did not pass to the purchaser of the land.

ERROR to the District Court for Hall County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful removal of grass from land which had been sold at execution sale. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Batty, Caste & Dungan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Capps, McCreary & Stevens, for defendants in error:

Under our law governing sales of real property on execution the title of the purchaser depends entirely upon the sale being finally confirmed by the court under whose direction it was made, and until this is done the rights of the debtor are not certainly divested.

State Bank of Nebraska v. Green, 10 Neb. 185.

The mortgagor is not liable for rents or profits while he is in possession of the mortgaged premises, and his grantee will take his title, and be protected to the same extent as the mortgagor.

Renard v. Brown, 7 Neb. 449.

A mortgagor would not be required to account for the rents and profits.

Higginbottom v. Benson, 24 Neb. 463.

Purchasers at execution sales are neither entitled to the possession of the property nor to participate in the rents and profits thereof, until their title has become absolute, by the failure of the persons interested to redeem within the time prescribed by law.

Rorer, Jud. Sales, p. 387; Cassidy v. Rhodes, 12 Ohio, 96; Houts v. Showalter, 10 Ohio St. 128.

It is true that for the purpose of perfecting his title to the real estate—that which he bought—the confirmation relates back to the sale, and no other person can in the meantime obtain any rights that will affect the title; but it cannot be held to relate back for the purpose of giving the purchaser the right of possession and the right to the rents and profits.

Beggs v. Thompson, 2 Ohio, 96, 15 Am. Dec. 539.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 9th day of April, 1890, Herman D. Einspahr was the owner of a tract of land in Hall county, Neb. On that date there was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court a transcript of a judgment in favor of Abraham Yeazel, and against said

Einspahr. Execution was duly issued on this judgment, and the land levied upon and sold by the sheriff on the 7th day of June, 1890; Yeazel becoming the purchaser. This sale was duly confirmed on July 21, 1890, and on or about that date the sheriff executed to Yeazel a conveyance for the real estate. At the time of the levy upon this land, and at the time of its sale, there was growing thereon a crop of wild grass. After the sale of the land, but before the confirmation, Einspahr cut this grass, removed it from the land, and sold it to one M. F. White. After Yeazel had procured his conveyance from the sheriff, he brought this action in replevin against Einspahr and White to recover the possession of the wild grass or hay which Einspahr had taken from the land, as above stated. There was a verdict and judgment in the court below for White and Einspahr, and Yeazel brings this suit here on error. All the material evidence in the case is undisputed, and is embraced in the foregoing statement of facts, and the question is as to the correctness of the verdict and judgment upon that evidence. Counsel for the plaintiff contend:

1. That the wild grass growing upon the land at the time of the execution sale was real estate. For the purposes of this opinion, we concede the contention to be correct. We do not decide, however, that growing wild grass is always real estate, nor do we decide that it is personal property. A decision of that point is not necessary here, and we do not decide it.

2. That Yeazel, by his purchase of the land on the 7th of June, 1890, at the execution sale, acquired on that date the legal title to the land, and that, as the wild grass was then growing on the real estate, Yeazel acquired the title to that. We do not agree with this contention. A purchaser of real estate at an execution sale in this state, solely by the purchase, does not acquire the title of the execution debtor to the land purchased. Such a purchaser acquires simply the lien which the execution creditor had on said land at the time. By section 497a of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that the owner of any real estate against which a decree of foreclosure has been rendered, or upon which an execution has been levied to satisfy a judgment or decree of any kind, may redeem the same from the lien of such decree or levy at any time before the sale of the same shall be finally confirmed. Section 498 provides for the examination and confirmation of such sale by the court. Section 499 provides that, upon the confirmation of a sale made of real estate sold on execution, the sheriff or other officer who made such sale shall make to the purchaser of such real estate as good and sufficient a deed of conveyance for the property or land sold as the person against whom such writ of execution was issued could have made of the same at the time the land became liable to the judgment, or at any time thereafter. And section 500 provides, among other things, that the deed so made shall vest in the purchaser as good and perfect an estate in the premises as was vested in the execution debtor at or after the time when the land became liable for the satisfaction of the judgment.

In State Bank of Nebraska v. Green, 10 Neb. 180, Lake, J., speaking for this court, said: "Under our law governing sales of real property on execution, the title of the purchaser depends entirely upon the sale being finally confirmed, and until this is done the rights of the execution debtor are not certainly divested." And in Lamb v. Sherman, 19 Neb. 681, Maxwell, Ch. J., speaking for this court, on that subject said: "A purchaser at execution sale of real estate upon the payment of the purchase money and confirmation of the sale becomes the equitable owner of the property, and in a proper case may compel the issuing of a sheriff's deed to himself."

In Freeman on Executions, § 528, that author, in commenting upon the titles of the purchaser and the judgment debtor before the latter's right to redeem has passed, remarks: "It is certain that, prior to the execution of the sheriff's deed, the purchaser has no title in the lands purchased. He cannot recover possession, nor can he, unless expressly authorized by statute, maintain an action for rents and profits. Frequently his interest is spoken of as that of a mere lienholder. 'The purchaser, prior to the execution of the sheriff's deed, holds merely a lien upon the land, differing from the lien of the judgment in this, that it is more specific, and may continue after that of the judgment has expired, and that the lien is much nearer a complete enforcement than that of the judgment, the single act of the execution and delivery of the sheriff's deed being required.' But the interest of the purchaser is certainly something more than a lien. It seems more like an inchoate title than like a lien, and it is generally, for the purposes both of voluntary and involuntary transfer, treated like real estate. And, while the purchaser has something more than a mere lien, the judgment debtor, until after the expiration of the time to redeem, has an interest different from, and superior to, a mere right or equity of redemption. He is the holder of the legal title, and must in all respects be treated as the owner of the land, even after he has lost his right of redemption, unless a deed has been executed in pursuance of the sale." In Ourtis v. Millard, 14 Iowa, 128, 81 Am. Dec. 400, it was held that "the purchaser of real property at a judicial sale made under execution acquires only a lien for the amount of the purchase money and interest, which may ripen into a perfect title at the expiration of the time allowed for redemption." This case was cited and adhered to in Boeringham v. Braden, 58 Iowa, 185.

The statute of Wisconsin on the subject of the sale and confirmation of real estate on execution in force in 1882 were substantially the same as ours; and under those statutes the supreme court of Wisconsin, in Allen v. Elderkin, 62 Wis. 627, said: "Under section 3169, Rev. Stat. the title to land sold on the foreclosure of a mortgage does not vest in the purchaser until the confirmation of the sale; and until then the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, have the right of possession, and may cut and remove all crops which are in condition to be cut and removed in the usual course of good farming." Taylor, J., delivering the opinion of the court, remarked: "The only question in this case is whether the title to the mortgaged property vests in the purchaser at a mortgage sale upon the day of sale and the execution of the deed to the purchaser, or upon the confirmation of the sale by the court. If the title vests on the sale and execution of the deed, then the circuit court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff; but if it does not vest until after confirmation of the sale, then the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant. . . . The law in this state is plain and unequivocal, and, under it, it is clear that the title of the mortgagor or his assigns is not divested, and vested in the purchaser at a sale upon the foreclosure of a mortgage given by him, until such sale is confirmed."

In view of these authorities, it seems clear that the legal title of Einspahr to the land sold was not divested, nor did Yeazel acquire the legal title to such real estate, until the delivery to him of the sheriff's conveyance made in pursuance of the order of confirmation of the sale. Yeazel acquired an equitable title to the real estate when the sale was confirmed, but the legal title did not pass to him until he received his sheriff's deed.

8. But counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that the legal title finally acquired by Yeazel to the land he purchased related back to the date the sale was made. This is conceded. Indeed, the title which Yeazel finally acquired related back to the date and the hour that the judgment to satisfy which the land was sold became a lien upon the real estate; and the conveyance made by the sheriff to Yeazel vested in him the same title, and as good a title, to the real estate, as Einspahr himself possessed at the time when the judgment became a lien, except as to subsequent tax liens. But counsel confuse the title to the real estate with the quantum of the estate. This doctrine of relation has reference only to the title which the execution debtor had to the real estate at the time the judgment became a lien, but it has no necessary reference to the quantum, whether more or less, of estate which the execution debtor owned at the time the judgment became a lien. The contention of counsel that, because the title which Yeazel finally acquired related back and vested in him the same title which Einspahr had when the judgment became a lien, therefore, as the wild grass was growing on the land at the time the land was sold, Yeazel is owner of such grass,—will be found upon investigation to be untenable. The judgment became a lien upon this real estate from the date of its filing in the clerk's office, and might have so continued for a period of five years. Thus it will be seen that it is in the power of a judgment creditor to maintain a lien against the real estate of his debtor for that period of time without any effort to sell the land. Again, after the sale was made and reported to the court, there was no obligation upon the part of Yeazel to have this sale immediately confirmed. Had he chosen to do so, he probably could have postponed a confirmation for a number of years. Now, if counsel is correct, all the wild grass grown upon this land from the time that the judgment became a lien thereon, although the land might not be sold for a number of years to satisfy such judgment, would become the property of the purchaser of the real estate at the sale finally made. It cannot be doubted, we think, that if, after this judgment became a lien upon the land, or after the land had been sold on execution, Einspahr had built a house, or executed some other permanent fixture upon the real estate, such fixture would have passed to the purchaser of the land along with the title he acquired thereto by the sheriff's deed. Yet if the rule as to the doctrine of relation which counsel contend for should be applied, the purchaser at execution sale, should he finally acquire the title to the real estate by the sheriff's conveyance, would not be entitled to the fixtures placed thereon by the execution debtor after the judgment became a lien or after the sale of the premises. It is not disputed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that Einspahr might have removed a crop of corn or oats from this land at any time before the sale was confirmed, if such crops had been ripe and fit for harvesting; but he claims that this rule does not apply to a crop of wild grass. It is not contended but this grass was ripe for cutting and stacking. It is not contended that the harvesting of this grass by Einspahr was done for the purpose of depreciating the value of the land. Suppose that this land had been planted to fruit trees, and that the fruit had matured between the time of the sale of the land and the confirmation of the sale; can it be contended that Einspahr would not have had the right to gather the fruit and appropriate it to his own use? Suppose that this land had been covered by a sheet of water, and the water had been frozen, then no doubt the ice, while it remained unbroken, would have been real estate. Can it be said that Einspahr might not have cut such ice and sold it between the time of the sale of the real estate and the confirmation of such sale? We think that Einspahr was the owner of the legal title to this land until the sale was confirmed; that he was entitled to the possession of it, to the use of it, to the rents and profits thereof; that he was entitled to harvest all fruit and crops thereon, whether the fruits of industry or of nature, that were in a proper condition for harvesting at any time before the confirmation of the sale, and entitled to appropriate to his own use such crops or fruits.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Louisiana, App't.,
v.
OLYMPIC CLUB.

(46 La. Ann. —.)

*1. A criminal statute denouncing what is commonly called prize fighting to be a misdemeanor, or punishable by fine or imprisonment, coupled with a proviso that the provisions of the act shall not apply to exhibitions and glove contests between human beings, which may take place within the room of regularly chartered athletic clubs, presents a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury as to whether any given contest or series of contests come within the designation of the statute as a prize fight or within the scope and meaning of the proviso as a glove contest.

2. As the state of Louisiana is in court seeking the forfeiture of the defendant's charter on the ground that the corporation has committed acts ultra vires of its charter, and is met with the provisions of an act of her own legislature which, in terms, authorizes just such contests as the witnesses describe the club contests to have been, this court will be excused for declining to disturb a finding of a jury in favor of the defendant on a question of fact.

3. Conceding such contests to be violative of good morals and of a sound public policy, the remedy comes plainly within the prerogative of the legislative department of the government, which alone can be looked to for relief.

(April 23, 1894.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of defendant in a proceeding for the revocation of defendant's charter upon the ground that it was transcending its powers in maintaining exhibitions of prize fights. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. H. McCaleb, Jr., and Benjamin Rice Forman, with Mr. Milton J. Cunningham, Atty. Gen., for the State:

A corporation may be dissolved by the forfeiture of its charter, when it abuses its privileges, or refuses to accomplish the conditions on which such privileges were granted.

Civil Code, art. 447.

When there is proven a clear abuse of its privileges (a) by gambling, by betting on a prize fight, (b) carrying on and conducting a prize fight, (c) paying men large sums of money to commit assault and battery on each other, (d) and do each other great bodily harm, (e) commit an affray, (f) keep a grogshop without a license; and doing such things not contemplated by Act 113, 1883, or by the charter, then the charter should be forfeited.

Prize fighting is none the less prize fighting because conducted under the Marquis of Queensbury rules and because gloves are used.

Century Dictionary, verbo: Prize fighting.

Messrs. Henry P. Dart, Charles H. Lusenberg and Frank Zengel, for appellee:

Statute No. 25 of 1890 does not define the crime of prize fighting with such distinctness as to enable the court to establish what is or is not prize fighting under the laws of Louisiana.

Reference made to any other system or code of laws to obtain a definition of a crime in this state is prohibited by the Constitution of 1879 and by well-settled decisions.

State v. Gaster, 45 La. Ann. 636; State v. Smith, 30 La. Ann. 346.

The proviso of the statute exempting from its provisions "glove contests and exhibitions between human beings in the rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs," is intended to promote boxing and sparring contests, and such contests are not prize fights within the prescription of the statute, nor can they be found to be prize fights under this examination, more especially when it is established by the evidence that they were contests with gloves accompanied by no disorder, by no unlawful assemblages, and held under strict police surveillance, and within the rooms of a regularly chartered athletic club.

The state cannot maintain this action because she has proceeded against the defendant for a state license, based on its receipts from the contests now complained of.

State v. Taylor, 28 La. Ann. 462; State v. Ober, 34 La. Ann. 359; Concordia School Directors v. Hernandez, 31 La. Ann. 158.

The forfeiture of a charter will not be lightly decreed when a full and complete remedy exists to prevent the infraction of the law complained of, and the policy of the court should be to maintain the charter of a corporation which exists for other useful and legal purposes when the objectionable features may be prohibited by injunction.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's suit is for the revocation and forfeiture of the defendant's charter, on the ground and for the reason that it has committed acts ultra vires, and transgressed the powers granted by its charter and conferred upon it by law, in that the corporation, through its officers and agents, has fostered, encouraged, and maintained exhibitions of what is "commonly called prize fighting" in violation of the constitution and laws of this state. Accompanying the foregoing averments is a prayer for an injunction restraining and prohibiting the corporation, its officers and agents, from maintaining, fostering, and encouraging such exhibitions, and also enjoining and prohibiting the defendant from selling or disposing of its property pendente lite. The prayer is concluded by demand for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of its assets and property, and to liquidate and wind up its affairs. In the petition are set forth the various objects and purposes of the defendant organization as they are enumerated in its charter and the amendment thereto,—such as the establishment and maintenance of rooms for literary purposes; for the collection of valuable works of art, books, maps, charts, statuary, coins, etc.; for the promotion of social intercourse, enjoyment, comfort, harmony, refinement of manners, and intellectual improvement; to encourage physical culture and development of athletic exercises, such as boxing, wrestling, fencing, and exhibitions of athletic sport; to organize one or more military companies; to promote and maintain a natatorium, gymnasium, athletic grounds, rowing clubs, bowling alleys, and such other features as may be found necessary to fulfill the purposes for which this corporation is formed. Then follows the averment that "the acts of the incorporation were a fraud upon the laws of the state, the vague and indefinite language employed to express the objects and purposes of the club being purposely used to cloak, cover up, and conceal the real objects for which said corporation was organized," as set out supra. As adjudvatory of the foregoing allegation the further averment is made that the defendant is accustomed to offer large prizes or rewards to noted pugilists of other states and countries; and its arena has been the scene of prize fights that were participated in by them, intending to fight until one of the contestants should give in from sheer exhaustion or injuries received; that the fights were witnessed by large assemblies of persons, there unlawfully congregated for the purpose of encouraging same, who were compelled to pay entrance fees for admission to said exhibitions. It is then further averred that such unlawful assemblies and acts, which were public nuisances, were instigated and maintained by the club; that "these disgraceful exhibitions have attracted to this city a large number of noted thugs, confidence men, and criminal characters from other cities and states, thereby endangering the public peace, and menacing the security of life and property;" that these exhibitions are and have been an "incentive to gambling, and large sums of money have been bet, wagered, and staked on the result thereof;" and that the defendant "has been offering and paying large sums of money to noted pugilists, and has caused and encouraged them thereby to commit assault and battery upon each other;" and that "said prize fights set evil examples to the young, discourage honest industry by disproportionately rewarding sanguinary exhibitions of brute force,—all of which are public nuisances." It is then alleged that a large number of said exhibitions have taken place at the club house of the defendant, by the direction, and under the sanction and authority, of its officers and agents, and that "the said exhibitions of what are commonly called prize fights" have taken place on the dates and between the participants named in the accompanying list, to wit:

The petition further and finally alleges that in conjunction with said exhibitions or prize fights the defendant, on occasions on which same occur, operates and conducts a bar room and retail liquor establishment upon its premises, without paying a license to the state, as required by law.

The defendant moved to dissolve the injunction, on several grounds, to wit: (1) That the injunction was not justified by the facts and allegations contained in the petition. (2) That the writ was improvidently issued, and without cause. (3) That the petition sets forth no cause for or right to an injunction. (4) The allegations on which the injunction was demanded are untrue. (5) That the plaintiff is estopped by her conduct and allegations in the suit of same title as the instant one for the recovery of a license. Contemporaneously therewith the defendant filed exceptions to the suit, of no cause of action, prescription of one year, and estoppel laid on aforesaid record. All of said exceptions were cumulated with the merits, and tried together, the defendant having in the mean while filed an answer, alleging that it was "and is a solvent and existing corporation, lawfully established, and is in the legal and actual possession of all its property, rights, and privileges, and has in no manner abandoned the same, or incurred any liability to forfeiture thereof." The case was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

A fair summary of the charges made by the plaintiff, upon the proof of which the forfeiture of defendant's charter and the perpetuation of her injunction depend, is as follows, to wit: First. That the corporation had committed acts ultra vires, and transcended the powers conferred upon it by its charter and the law, by encouraging and maintaining exhibitions of what is commonly called prize fighting," in violation of the constitution and the law. Second. That the defendant is accustomed to offer large prizes or rewards to noted pugilists, and its arena has been the scene of prize fights that have been participated in by them, intending to fight until one of the contestants should give in from sheer exhaustion or injuries received and which were witnessed by large assemblies of people, unlawfully congregated for the purpose of encouraging same, which assemblies and acts constituted public nuisances, and same were instigated and maintained by the defendant. Third. That these exhibitions have attracted a large number of noted thugs, confidence men, and criminal characters from other cities and states, thus endangering the public peace. Fourth. That these exhibitions are, and have been, an incentive to gambling, and large sums of money have been wagered and staked on the result thereof; and the defendant has been offering and paying large sums of money to noted pugilists, thus causing them to commit assault and battery. Fifth. That in conjunction with said exhibitions or prize fights the defendant operates a bar room and retail liquor establishment upon its premises, without paying a license to the state. The gravamen of the suit is found in the first specification, and is to the effect that the defendant committed acts ultra vires of its charter, by encouraging and maintaining, on its premises, and within its club room, "exhibitions of what is commonly called prize fighting, in violation of the constitution and law," thus making its acts of incorporation a fraud on the law. The remaining four specifications relate to the collateral incidents and surrounding circumstances illustrative of the exhibitions, as an aggravation of the charge complained of.

The solution of the question propounded by this action depends—First, upon a correct and proper interpretation of the phrase "exhibitions that are commonly called prize fights;" and, second, upon a just interpretation of the laws which are alleged to have been thereby violated. As pointing the issue thus formulated, we make the subjoined extract from the plaintiff's brief, viz.: "The questions at issue may be stated thus: Were these pugilistic fights for prizes, held in the arena of the Olympic Club, within the legitimate objects and purposes of the charter, or were they such abuses of its franchises as would justify a perpetual injunction, and a decree of forfeiture of the charter, and the appointment of a receiver to sell its property and distribute its proceeds among creditors and stockholders? Were they not 'what are commonly called prize fights' and did not each fight constitute the crime or offense of assault and battery and breach of the peace, and were they not in violation of the law and public policy of the state? Or were they lawful exhibitions of skill in boxing, permissible under the law, or, as the defendant is pleased to call them, 'glove contests,' whatever precisely that may mean?" The provisions of Act No. 25 of 1890 are referred to and relied upon as having been violated by the defendant, and same are distinctly invoked and quoted by the plaintiff's counsel as the basis of this proceeding. That act is couched in the following terms, to wit: "Act No. 25, 1890. Defining the crime of prize fighting, and to provide for the punishment thereof in and out of the state of Louisiana. Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Louisiana, that any person who shall send, or cause to be sent, publish or otherwise make known a challenge to fight what is commonly called a prize fight, or who shall accept any such challenge, or who shall engage in such fight, or act as trainer for any such, contemplating a participation in such fight, and any such person who shall act as aider or abettor, backer, umpire, second, surgeon or assistant at such fight, or in preparation for such fight, shall upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by imprisonment in the parish jail for not more than six months and be fined not more than five hundred dollars." Section two is omitted, as unimportant. But to this section is appended the following proviso, to wit: "Provided this act shall not apply to exhibitions and glove-contests, between human beings, which may take place within the rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs." Previous to the promulgation of this act, on the 25th of June, 1890, an ordinance was adopted by the city council of New Orleans, of the following tenor and purpose, to wit: "Be it ordained by the city council of the city of New Orleans, that Ordinance No. 1194 be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: That exhibitions and glove contests between human beings for the development of muscular strength be and the same are hereby permitted to take place within the rooms of all regularly chartered athletic clubs in the city of New Orleans, provided that at the time when said exhibitions and glove contests shall take place the sale or giving of spirituous liquors in said club rooms is hereby prohibited; and provided further, that all such exhibitions and glove contests shall be under the supervision of the police authorities of the city of New Orleans; and provided further, that a glove weighing not less than five ounces shall be used in such exhibitions or contests; but under no circumstances shall this ordinance be construed as permitting any sparring contests in such club or clubs on Sunday. Provided further, that for each exhibition the parties shall be required to donate fifty dollars for fund of public charities of New Orleans; and that a good and solvent bond of five hundred dollars cash shall be given, to be forfeited in case of any violation of said ordinance, the proceeds of said forfeited bond to go to the said fund of public charities." The foregoing ordinance bears the number 4386, O. S., and was adopted by the city council on March 5, 1890. It was with direct reference to this ordinance and the act of the general assembly that the defendant procured an amendment to its original charter, whereby, on the 16th of May, 1891, it was reincorporated as a stock company, the objects and purposes of the corporation being therein enumerated as set out in plaintiff's petition. Vide article 2 of amended charter. From the city ordinance it appears, "that exhibitions and glove contests between human beings, for the development of muscular strength," were "permitted to take place within rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs in the city of New Orleans," coupled, however, with the proviso "that all such exhibitions and glove contests shall be under the supervision of the police authorities," and with the further proviso "that a glove weighing not less than five ounces shall be used in such exhibitions or contests." The denunciation of the legislature was addressed to "what is commonly called a prize fight," and declares that any one who shall send or accept a challenge to make such a fight shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished accordingly; but it was careful to insert the proviso that it should not apply to exhibitions and glove contests which may take place in regularly chartered athletic clubs.

Having reproduced the allegations of the petition, the averments of the answer, the purport of the argument, the provisions of the city ordinance, and of the statute of the general assembly, and the provisions of the defendant's charter, the conclusion is plain that our decision must turn upon the distinction that is taken in the statute and ordinance between a glove contest and what is commonly called a prize fight, for upon this distinction depends the criminality vel non of the contests which took place between the combatants. And it is equally clear that, unless these combatants are proven guilty of the acts denounced in the statute as misdemeanors, the defendant cannot be treated as particeps criminis, and its charter revoked, and like contests enjoined. This brings us to the consideration of the evidence that was adduced pro et con in the lower court, and the various rulings of the judge a quo with reference to admissibility of testimony, and, as a preliminary to this examination, it is well to incorporate one of the contracts under which the club contests occurred as the best means of illustrating its character, and the following is selected as a sample, to wit:

"Olympic Club. Articles of Agreement between Stanton Abbott and Andrew Bowen. We, the undersigned, Stanton Abbott, of London, England, and Andrew Bowen, of New Orleans, La., do hereby agree to engage in a glove contest to a finish before the Olympic Club of New Orleans, La., on November 15th, 1893, at nine o'clock P. M., sharp, for a purse of two thousand five hundred dollars, the winner to receive two thousand dollars and the loser five hundred dollars of said purse; said Bowen and Abbott to receive each three hundred dollars for expenses as soon as forfeit of $500.00 is deposited with the Olympic Club. The contest to be with five-ounce gloves, and according to Marquis of Queensbury rules. The club is to select the referee and official time keeper, each of us reserving the right to appoint a time keeper to represent us, said time keeper to be subject to the approval of the club. The referee shall have the power to stop and decide the contest when so directed by the seconds and the contest committee. Should either of us commit a deliberate foul, thereby injuring the other's chances of winning, the one so doing shall lose all interest in the aforesaid purse. We each hereby agree to weigh 133 lbs. at the ring side at 9 o'clock P. M., on day of said contest. To guarantee the faithful performance of the above obligations, we each hereby agree to deposit the sum of five hundred dollars in the hands of the Olympic Club. Should either of us fail to appear at the proper time and place, the one so doing shall forfeit his deposit to the club. [Signed] A. Bowen. Stanton Abbott. Jno. W. Lyons. Witnesses: Thos. C. Anderson. Alb. Spitzfaden. Teddy Wilson. Date, Sept. 25, 1893."

During the progress of the trial question was made with regard to the admissibility of testimony on the part of the defendant as tending to show a difference between a prize fight and a glove contest. The judge a quo ruled in favor of the defendant, and admitted the evidence, and the plaintiff reserved a bill of exceptions. After the evidence had gone to the jury, the same question was presented again, in certain requested instructions to the jury that were presented by the plaintiff's counsel, and refused by the court. To be accurate, we will incorporate the pertinent portions of the charge requested, which is as follows, viz.: "The plaintiff requests the judge to charge the jury as follows: (1) The statute of this state, which applies to both persons and corporations, prohibits prize fighting, and makes it a penal offense; and also provides that this statute shall not apply to exhibitions and glove contests between human beings which may take place within the rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs. All parts of this statute, as well as every other law, must be so construed as to harmonize with each other, and I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that the term 'prize fighting' does not require any definition; it is a simple term, defined in all the dictionaries to be fighting for a prize or reward; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant corporation held one or more fights within its arena, under the auspices of its officers and managers, in which the fighters were offered or promised a prize or reward to be paid to the victor, or either of them, such a fight is a prize fight, within the meaning of the law, and is unlawful, whether the combatants wore gloves or not. It matters not what the rules of the fight were, or how they were clothed, or whether any portions of their bodies were covered or uncovered. If they fought to a finish for a prize or reward, to be given to the successful combatant, it is a prize fight, within the meaning of the law, and the verdict must be for the plaintiff." The legislature cannot be presumed, in prohibiting prize fighting, to have enabled any one to escape the prohibitory or penal clauses of the statute by putting on and wearing a pair of gloves, and thereby evading the penalty prescribed by the law for its infraction. But, to our thinking, the foregoing requested special charge was modified, and the admissibility of such evidence (partially, at least) conceded, by the third and fourth requested special charges, which are as follows, viz.: "(3) I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that if from the evidence you find that the defendant in this case contracted or agreed with certain noted pugilists, residing here or coming here from other states or countries, to engage in a fight for a prize or reward, in the arena of their club, and at such contests the fights were carried on to a finish, and the reward previously promised was subsequently paid to the successful combatant, then this was a prize fight, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff. If it were a mere exhibition of skill in sparring with gloves, not calculated to do great bodily injury, it was a glove contest, within the provision of the law; but, if the jury believe from the evidence that the parties who have engaged in these contests within the arena of the defendant intended to fight until one gave in from exhaustion or injuries received, it was a breach of the law, and a prize fight, whether the combatants fought with gloves or not. (4) Gentlemen of the jury, you are to decide this case from the evidence adduced on the witness stand as to what actually occurred at the time the several contests or fights referred to in the petition, and testified to by witnesses, took place, and not by your preconceived opinions, or the opinions of any other person, as to whether these contests were prize fights or not. In other words, you are to decide this case upon the facts proven by the testimony of the witnesses on the stand, and the law as given to you by the court, and not in accordance with your preconceived opinions, or according to the opinions of any one else." Taken collectively, we understand the objection of plaintiff's counsel to be that it was permissible for witnesses to state the facts and incidents which actually occurred, as coming within the range of their personal knowledge and observation; but that it was not permissible for them to give their opinions, based upon that knowledge and information, same being a conclusion of law, and not a matter for determination by expert testimony. To the judge's declination to give the jury this special charge no bill of exceptions was retained on behalf of the plaintiff, and the state is to be considered as having abandoned it, and acquiesced in the charge that was given by the judge, and which is as follows, viz.: "There is only one question for the jury to decide, and that is as to the character of the exhibitions given at the Olympic Club. . . . The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to make out its case. The defendant is charged here with having violated the terms and conditions of its charter by having given, under its auspices, what are commonly called prize fights. The defendant resists that charge on the ground of a proviso in the law which permits glove contests. There is, then, but one question before you: Does the evidence disclose that these exhibitions were prize fights, or not, or does the evidence disclose that they were glove contests or not? Now, the rule of interpretation of words is that they must be received according to their significance in common use. I am not an expert, and can give you no opinion as to the significance of these words. You must determine for yourselves whether, in common parlance, these exhibitions were prize fights or glove contests. There is no other law in this case." No objection was made to this charge, and no bill of exceptions was retained by the plaintiff to it. When the counsel for the state presented the aforesaid special charges the judge declined to give the jury any other charge than the one above quoted, stating, however, "that this is not a criminal prosecution, but that it is a civil prosecution, for the forfeiture of defendant's charter," reading to the jury Act 25 of 1890. The acquiescence of the plaintiff in the judge's estimate of this controversy is plainly indicated by the paragraph we clipped from its brief at page 10, which we reproduce in this connection for the purpose of emphasizing the correctness of the judge's conclusions: "Were they not what are commonly called prize fights? And did not each fight constitute the crime or offense of assault and battery, and a breach of the peace? And were they not in violation of the law and public policy of the state? Or were they lawful exhibitions of skill in boxing, permissible under the law; or, as the defendant is pleased to call them, glove contests, whatever, precisely, that may mean?" On the face of the statute against prize fighting (Act 25 of 1890) the denunciation of the law is against "any person who shall send, or cause to be sent, publish, or otherwise make known, a challenge to fight what is commonly called a prize fight," not a prize fight eo nomine. And that denunciation is coupled with the proviso "that this act shall not apply to exhibitions and glove contests between human beings which may take place within the rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs." That is the only statute governing such contests or exhibitions to which we have been referred, or of which we are aware; and it is controlling, and conclusively affirms the correctness of the view entertained by the district judge.

Accepting this as the correct theory of this case, it is manifest that the judge ruled correctly in admitting the evidence objected to, and in refusing to give the special charge requested by plaintiff's counsel; for it cannot be readily perceived on what theory expert testimony should have been excluded when the main question for the jury to determine was the proper significance of "what is commonly called a prize fight," as contradistinguished from a "glove contest." Addressing ourselves to the definition of these terms, we are to ascertain the distinction between them in common parlance; that is to say, to ascertain their true significance in the vernacular of the prize ring and athletic club, where such exhibitions are given. Taking the contract between Bowen and Abbott as a sample of the articles of agreement between the contestants before the Olympic Club, we find that it declares they "do hereby agree to engage in a glove contest," and that it further stipulates that "the contest [is] to be with five-ounce gloves," and "according to Marquis of Queensbury rules." It also provides that, if either party shall "commit a deliberate foul, thereby injuring the other's chances of winning, the one so doing shall lose all interest in the aforesaid purse." City Ordinance No. 4336 provides "that exhibitions and glove contests between human beings, for the development of muscular strength be and the same are hereby permitted to take place within the rooms of all regularly chartered athletic clubs in the city of New Orleans." That ordinance provides further that in such contests "a glove weighing not less than five ounces shall be used." We have extracted from the little volume entitled "Billy Edwards' Art of Boxing and Manual Training," which was introduced and filed in evidence by the attorney general on the part of the plaintiff, as immediately bearing on the contracts of the Olympic Club contestants, the Marquis of Queensbury rules. The extract is from page 109, and is as follows, to wit: "The Marquis of Queensbury rules for the English challenge cups (open to gentlemen amateurs). . . . Rule 4. There are to be three judges appointed by the committee. Rule 5. That the boxing is to take place in a 24 foot ring. Rule 6. That no wrestling, roughing, or hugging the ropes [is to] be allowed. Rule 7. That each heat consist of three rounds, with one minute interval between each; the duration of each round to be at the discretion of the judges, but not to exceed five minutes. Rule 8. Any competitor not coming up to time shall be deemed to have lost. Rule 9. That no shoes or boots with spikes or sprigs be allowed. . . . Contests for Endurance. Rule 1. To be a fair stand-up boxing match in a 24-foot ring, or as near that size as practicable. Rule 2. No wrestling or hugging allowed. The rounds to be of three minutes duration, and one minute time. Rule 3. If either man fall, through weakness or otherwise, he must get up unassisted, ten seconds to be allowed him to do so, the other man to retire meanwhile to his corner; and when the fallen man is on his legs the round is to be resumed, and continued until the three minutes have expired; and, if one man fails to come to the scratch in the ten seconds allowed, it shall be in the power of the referee to give his award in favor of the other man. Rule 4. A man hanging on the ropes in a helpless state, with his toes off the ground, shall be considered down. . . . Rule 6. The gloves [are] to be fair-sized boxing gloves of the best quality, and new. . . . Rule 8. A man on one knee is considered down, and, if struck, is entitled to the stakes." As contradistinguished from the foregoing, we refer to the Manual of Billy Edwards, at page 108 et seq., containing the London prize ring rules, from which we find the only distinguishing features to be: (1) That the contests are made without gloves or other covering for the hands; (2) that the fighting boots of the contestants are provided with three metal spikes, which are one eighth of an inch broad, and extend three eighths of an inch from the sole, one to be placed on each side of the boot, near the toe, and the other at the heel; (3) that wrestling, roughing, and hugging are not forbidden,—all the prohibitions being attempts to inflict injury by gouging, tearing the flesh with the finger nails, and biting. Contests under the London prize ring rules are usually out doors, in open public view.

With these rules kept in view, the evidence will disclose whether the Olympic contests were glove contests or prize fights, as the major part of the witnesses were connoisseurs in matters of this sort, if not experts, scientifically speaking. The plaintiff only introduced four witnesses,—gentlemen who had witnessed some of these contests as reporters of the newspapers,—whose testimony was chiefly directed to the consequences of them, rather than to the modus operandi of their management. But, on this subject, the evidence of the defendant is full, and therefrom we find the following summary of facts, and extracts from the testimony of witnesses. During the examination of one of the most prominent of the witnesses the following occurred, viz.: "Q. Have you ever seen any of the contests at the Olympic Club, which are sometimes called glove contests, and which the state now calls prize fights? A. I have seen several of them. Q. Can you mention any of the names of the contestants? A. I saw the Sullivan-Corbett contest; I saw the Fitzsimmons-Maher contest; and I saw the contest between Bowen and Myer, of Illinois. Q. Did you see the McCarthy-Warren contest? A. Yes; I saw that fight. Q. Take the Corbett-Sullivan fight, and describe what you saw at that fight. A. Well, I saw the gentlemen come into the ring, and take respective corners assigned to them, and prepare themselves for the contest. They prepared themselves by divesting themselves of their clothing, except [their] trunks and shoes, and covering their hands with gloves. Then, after the other preliminary arrangements were made, under the rules and regulations governing the contest, time was called, and they were then engaged in their boxing contest. They appeared in the center of the ring, and commenced the boxing exercise,—boxing against each other the best way they could, in order to strike one another, and to get what advantage they could, under the rules and regulations of the contest, by striking, parrying blows, dodging, or retreating; doing all they could in that way, to save themselves from injury, and to administer injury to the opposite party, in a sporting and friendly manner, under the rules and regulations for that character of contest. (Our italics). I saw them through the contest, which consisted of twenty-one rounds of three minutes each. They were required to remain contesting each round for three minutes. After each round they were given one minute's rest, during which they were refreshed by their respective attendants, after which the contest was resumed for another three minutes: and so on until one or the other either surrendered, or was rendered incapable to the call of the contest. Q. Do you know anything of what is commonly called boxing? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any skill in it, yourself? A. Not a great deal. I have boxed some in former years. Q. Do you feel competent to define the physical act that these men committed? A. I will say, then, . . . that what I saw is what I would call boxing, to determine the superior excellence, science, and endurance of the parties to the contest. They were governed by certain rules and regulations which had been prescribed. And each contestant is compelled to conform to those rules and regulations, and while doing so they use all the skill and strength in their possession, each endeavoring to strike the other, using all tactics in their possession, in order to defend themselves from the blows of each other. And they do this, as I said before, by retreating, by dodging, and by parrying the blows. It is very seldom that either one of them gets a square, direct hard blow, because the blow is either parried, or dodged, or they retreat, or they close in to each other, and lock arms, in order to protect themselves from the force of the blow. That is the case in the exercise of boxing,—whether it is for fun, for a prize, or otherwise, it is the same character of exercise. Q. You used the word 'skill.' What do you mean by that? A. I mean that skill or science or expertness of the parties to defend themselves each from the blows of the other, and at the same time to strike the other. It is an exercise that is capable of being carried to a very high degree of skill and science, both in the manner of striking, and in the manner of defending, retreating, and dodging; all of which make up the whole exercise. It is a contest for physical supremacy, physical superiority, endurance, skill, and strength. Q. It is also called 'the manly art of self-defense,' is it not? A. Yes; the manly art of self-defense. That is a comprehensive term applied to the art of boxing. . . . Q. Did you ever see a prize fight, commonly so called? A. Yes, sir. Q. Which one did you see? A. I saw the Sullivan-Ryan fight. That is the only prize fight that I ever saw. Q. Is there any difference between that contest and the contests you have seen in the Olympic Club? A. I can state the facts, and what was done at the contest between Sullivan and Ryan.

They entered a ring similar to that of the other contests we have been speaking of, but they were differently prepared. They had naked fists, and they continued the contest in a more severe manner, and continued the exercise until one or the other had fallen or was knocked down. Then they were allowed to wrestle, and they were allowed to fall upon one another, when they did [fall]. They were allowed to take advantage in their efforts to strike or injure each other that they were not allowed to do in the other contests of which we have been speaking. Then, as soon as the round had been completed by either one of them falling, they then retired to their respective corners, but only for a half-minute's rest, when time was called.

Q. By the Court: That was in case of the Sullivan and Ryan contest? A. Yes, sir. They only had a half a minute's rest after each round, and a round continued up to the point when either of them fell, either of his own volition or from the effect of a blow, a slap, or a wrestle. The contest continued in that way until one of them had gained sufficient superiority over the other to justify the other's seconds to throw up the sponge. That contest, I think, lasted seven rounds, when the seconds of Ryan threw up the sponge; that is, simply surrendered the contest, and admitted that Mr. Sullivan was the superior pugilist.

Q. Were the contestants arrayed as they were in the contest before the Olympic Club? A. No. The shoes were heavier, and they were allowed to have spikes in their shoes, and their hands were not gloved.

Q. Did the Sullivan-Ryan contest that you speak of take place in the open air? A. Yes. It took place in the open air.

Q. Were any of the contestants injured in any of those contests which you witnessed at the Olympic Club? A. In some cases they received slight injuries.

Q. Whereabouts? A. In the Maher-Fitzsimmons fight Maher received a slight injury by the bruising of his lip, and perhaps a little to the nose; sufficient to cause some little flow of blood. It is claimed, quite a considerable of a flow of blood. I saw some blood, but I saw no serious injury.

Q. You saw no serious injury to any one? A. I have never seen any one of the contestants seriously injured.

Q. Have you witnessed those contests from beginning to end? A. Yes. I have witnessed all the principal contests we have had here, from beginning to end. We have selected the testimony of this particular witness, because of his being a typical representative of the conservative element of this community, the president of a college, and a man apparently possessed of accurate and careful information on the subject, as furnishing the most concise exposé of the Olympic Club contests, as he seems to have witnessed the greater number of them, and closely observed them from a scientific standpoint.

The next witness to whose evidence our attention has been attracted is a prominent city official, who states that he has seen nearly all of the contests at the Olympic Club, and specially mentions the Sullivan-Corbett contest. He says that he witnessed the Sullivan-

Ryan fight at Mississippi City, Miss., and Sullivan-Kilrain fight at Richburg, Miss., and says they were prize fights. "Q. Now, will you kindly tell me what, if any, difference there was between that prize fight between Sullivan and Kilrain and the contests which you saw at the Olympic Club? A. Well, the rules for sparring contests are not observed in the London prize ring rules. For instance, in a glove contest, the rules require that when the contestants come together and clinch, they must separate, and, if they do not, the referee separates them by force. But you cannot do that under the London prize ring rules. Under the London prize ring rules the contestants can clinch and stand and thump and punish until one or the other goes down. That is not tolerated in a glove contest. Then, under the London prize ring rules, they are not limited as to the time they shall have for each round. In a glove contest they are. Then, under the London prize ring rules, they wear spiked shoes, and in those contests they are not allowed to use them. Under the London prize ring rules they fight with the bare knuckles, while in these contests they must wear gloves weighing not less than five ounces," etc.

The next witness whose testimony has attracted our notice is a prominent lawyer, who furnishes a like description of the Olympic contests as the first witness did. He says these contests were conducted with a high degree of skill; the participants exhibiting a great deal of skill. The men who participated in those contests were men of scientific training, almost without an exception. He does not think any of the contestants were hurt very much. He saw one or two of them bleeding from the nose or mouth, and possibly saw one bleeding from the ear. States that he witnessed the Sullivan-Kilrain fight in Mississippi, and describes it very much as the second witness does. The next witness is a police commissioner, and he was present and witnessed most all the contests which took place at the Olympic Club. Having heard the testimony of the last preceding witness, he corroborates it in every particular. States that he considers the contest between Corbett and Sullivan as one of the greatest fights that ever took place, as far as skill and science were concerned. The next witness is a leading lawyer of the New Orleans bar. He states that he witnessed several of the Olympic Club contests, and instances the Corbett-Sullivan contest, which he describes much in the same manner as other witnesses have done. That he saw nothing that was objectionable or brutal in that contest. He testifies—as other witnesses had done—that the assemblage of people who witnessed these contests was orderly and well-behaved; or, as the first witness states, these assemblages of people, in point of personal respectability and behavior, were above the average of ordinary political assemblages. He states he heard the testimony of the third witness, and corroborates it throughout. This witness is a member of the school board, and a gentleman of first respectability. The next witness is also a prominent city lawyer of high reputation, and a man of affairs. He states that he has witnessed quite a number of the Olympic Club contests, and his description of them, and the manner in which they were conducted, is quite the same as that of other witnesses whose testimony we have commented on. His description of the effect of these contests upon the contestants physically is quite unique. "Q. The exhibitions which you have described, were they at any time bloody, or was blood shed during any of those contests? A. Well, when two men get opposite to each other and begin boxing, unless one has a pretty tough nose, there is going to be a bloody nose. I have had a bloody nose myself twenty times, when I was taking boxing lessons," etc. With regard to the cruelty or brutality of the Olympic contests this witness' statement is also quite unique. "Q. Was there anything brutal or inhuman about it? A. In my judgment, no, sir. As compared with that popular game nowadays known as football, which I think the American people have gone crazy about, the contests that I have seen at the Olympic Club are superior in every respect, and in point of humanity and as appealing to the aesthetic senses," etc. He states that the contestants were scientific and artistic in the management of their hands. They were experts in boxing. It is commonly called "the manly art of self-defense," both in England and in this country." Quite a number of other witnesses—lawyers, doctors, and professional experts—were called, and gave evidence quite in line with the statements we have detailed.

On the other hand, a fair summary of the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses does not materially differ from that of the defendant's except as to the manner and result of these contests. One witness states that he saw blood running from the ear of one of the contestants in the Goddard-Smith contest,—"just a little." He speaks of the Fitzsimmons-Maher fight as "a bloody fight." He says that in the Sullivan-Corbett contest Sullivan bled at the mouth and nose. He says that in the McCarthy-Callaghan contest the lip of the former was much swollen. Another witness speaks of some of the contestants shedding blood, but his memory of details was not accurate. The case of Maher, in the contest with Fitzsimmons, is the only one about which he is at all positive. The following cross-examination of this witness is worthy of note as characterizing these contests, viz.: "Q. Did you see any of those men bite each other? A. No, sir. Q. Did you see them wrestle with each other, throw each other down, or jump on one another? A. No, not intentionally. Q. This butting you spoke of on the part of Smith was accidentally done, was it not? A. I don't think he fought fairly. Q. You don't think he was a fair fighter? A. No, sir. Q. The referee had to stop them? A. They warned him two or three times about it. Q. But there was no kicking of each other? A. No, sir. Q. They fought, I understand, with five-ounce gloves? A. Yes. Q. They squared themselves for the fight, and from that moment on it was give and take? A. Yes. Q.

Each man trying to land his blows above a certain point? A. Yes. Q. Above his belt? A. Yes. Q. And they used their hands, and nothing but their hands, until the gong struck 'time' for the fighting to end? Q. And the round lasted three minutes? A. Yes."

The testimony of the other witness of the plaintiff is much of the same tenor as that of the two whose evidence we have quoted, and little is left us to say in the way of comment. We have only to answer for ourselves the question the judge's charge propounded to the jury: Does the evidence show that these exhibitions were what are commonly called prize fights or glove contests? We are to make answer to the questions propounded by the state of Louisiana through her attorney general, viz.: Were those contests what are commonly called prize fights? And did each fight constitute an assault and battery, and a breach of the peace? And were they or not in violation of the law and the public policy of the state? Or were they lawful exhibitions of skill in boxing, permissible under the law, or, as the defendant puts it, glove contests, recognized by law? We have only to recur to the instructions that plaintiff's counsel requested the judge to give in charge to jury for a guide in making answer to these queries. They say: "If it were a mere exhibition of skill in sparring with gloves, not calculated to do great bodily injury, it was a glove contest, within the provision of the law." They further say: "Gentlemen of the jury, you are to decide this case from the evidence adduced on the witness stand as to what actually occurred at the time the several contests or fights referred to in the petition and testified to by witness [took place], and not be your preconceived opinions, or the opinions of any other person, as to whether these were prize fights or not. In other words, you are to decide this case upon the facts proven by the testimony of the witness on the stand, and the law as given you by the court, and not in accordance with your preconceived opinions or the opinions of any one else." (Our italics.) Testing the issue presented by the evidence we have detailed—and it is of a kind that all of the evidence is—and the law as given by the court (and that was the reading to the jury of Act 25 of 1890), and there is only one conclusion to which we could come, and that is the one at which the jury arrived, to wit, that the Olympic Club contests were ordinary glove contests, within the terms of that statute, and not "what are commonly called prize fights." Coming within the provisions of a special statute, such contests could not be esteemed assaults and batteries, or as breaches of the peace, unless the evidence should disclose that they were calculated "to do great bodily injury." But the evidence will be examined in vain for any such proof, for its substance and general tenor is to the effect that those contests were but trials of the skill and power of physical endurance between well-equipped athletes; and that, being trained in this so-called "manly art of self-defense," it was matter next to an impossibility for one of the contestants to administer,

"above the belt" of the other, any serious physical punishment, fighting as they did with five-ounce gloves. That a nose was occasionally made to bleed, that now and then a lip was left in a swollen condition, or the face somewhat bruised and disfigured, does not alter the case, as like occurrences are apt to take place in boxing, fencing, or in football. As the state of Louisiana is in court seeking the forfeiture of the defendant's charter on the ground that the corporation has committed acts ultra vires of its charter, and is met with the provisions of an act of her own legislature, which in terms authorizes just such contest as the witnesses describe the Olympic contests to have been, this court must be excused for declining to disturb the finding of the jury on the facts in favor of the defendant. If, indeed, such contests are violative of good morals and a sound public policy, the matter comes plainly within the prerogative of the legislative department of the government, which alone can be looked to for relief. As the suit is sui generis, the decision of which depends upon the interpretation of a special statute of this state, authorities and decisions of the courts of other states and countries would be examined in vain, for the question is one of fact.

Miller, J., takes no part in this opinion, not being a member of the court at the time the cause was argued and submitted.

Nicholls, Ch. J., dissenting in part and concurring in part:

The acts prohibited and made criminal by Act No. 25 of 1890 are prize fights, not as defined by professional pugilists, but as commonly known and understood. This appears by the very wording of the statute. Fights which would be prize fights in the popular acceptance of those words should they take place outside of a club do not cease to be such, nor are they saved from criminality, because they take place within the inclosures of an incorporated club, and held under its auspices. This will scarcely be denied. Any construction of the statute, or any portion of the statute, which would lead up to and carry with it as the result of the construction that prize fights as commonly known are any less prohibited inside than they are outside of a club, is, in my opinion, wrong, would convert a prohibitory preventive statute actually into a permissive one, and defeat the object and purpose of the law, not only as ascertained from its language, but as actually intended by those who took part in and were responsible for its enactment. Glove contests are referred to and permitted in the proviso of the statute, but whatever may be the technical meaning of those words and the technical character of those contests, those which are referred to in this statute are necessarily those of such character, and entered into under such circumstances, as to keep the fighting all the time outside of prize fighting as understood by the people at large. If the glove contest, such as they were in this club, would have brought the contestants within the grasp of the statute had they taken place outside of the club, the same contests inside a club will not protect them. The mere place of exhibition and the patronage of a club does not legally save the situation. It is the popular idea of prize fighting, and the common meaning of those words, and not the ideas of professional sportsmen, which are to control courts in dealing with criminality in this matter. We are not dealing with prize fighting and glove contests technically, but from the standpoint from which the law directs us to view them,—prize fights from the standpoint of what are so considered by the people at large, and glove contests as necessarily subordinated to prize fights as so viewed. I am of the opinion that testimony as to what constitutes prize fighting and what glove contests in a "technical" sense was irrelevant to the issue before the court; that it should have been excluded, but that, having been admitted, it should carry no weight. I am of the opinion that the contests which have been permitted to take place in the Olympic Club fall under the prohibitory terms of the law, and that their further continuance should be checked by injunction. I do not think the charter of the club should be forfeited. I concur in part with and dissent in part from the decision rendered.

Breaux, J. concurring:

The crime of prize fighting is defined with great particularity. The penalty is clearly set forth. No one shall send or make known a challenge to fight what is commonly known as a prize fight, and no one shall engage in such a fight. The penalty is fine and imprisonment. After defining the crime, the act contains a permissive clause, applying to exhibitions and glove contests, within rooms of regularly chartered athletic clubs. It does not refer to mere boxing with padded gloves, which may be practical for exercise, without the necessity of resorting to the rooms of a chartered club. The most extravagant interpretation would not include such exercises within the definition of a prize fight. After denouncing a prize fight, the law expressly excepts exhibitions and glove contests under the auspices of chartered athletic clubs. The character of these glove contests were known at the time, and must have been incorporated in the law, only because it was well known that it would exclude them from the denunciation of a prize fight. If that was not the purpose, the proviso has no meaning. It is a question of legislation. To the legislature all legislative power is granted. Courts, however pleasant to contemplate and inviting it may be at times, are not authorized to decree that one enterprise shall be favored by their decree, even beyond the law, because the purpose in their opinion is praiseworthy, and should receive encouragement. Nor are they authorized to make nugatory a law they deem cannot be sustained on principles of propriety. The legislature must be its own arbiter as to whether glove contests shall be prohibited. Its laws in this as in all other cases must be interpreted by those rules which regulate the decisions of judicial tribunals. I assent to the decision entered in this cause.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on May 7, 1894, the following opinion was delivered:

On a re examination of this case we have reached the conclusion that expert testimony was improperly admitted at the trial, which may have influenced the verdict of the jury, and the interests of all parties will be best subserved by remanding the cause, with instructions to the judge a quo to disallow such evidence. But, as we are satisfied that in no event should the charter of the defendant be forfeited, so much of the decree as appertains thereto will remain undisturbed;

our decree being in all other respects reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is therefore ordered and decreed that our former decree be annulled, except as to the forfeiture of the defendant's charter, which is left in full force; and it is further ordered and decreed that the remaining issues in the cause be remanded to the lower court for a new trial according to law and the views herein expressed, the defendant and appellee to pay the costs of appeal; those of the lower court to await final trial therein.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

NORTH & SOUTH ROLLING STOCK CO., Appt.,

v.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois ex rel., M. W. SCHAEFER, State's Attorney.

(147 Ill. 224.)

1. The existence of a corporation is admitted by filing an information against it by its corporate name to procure a forfeiture of its charter.
2. The burden of showing that a corporation has committed or omitted acts which amount to a surrender or forfeiture of its rights and privileges is upon the one seeking a judgment of ouster for that reason.
3. A charge of falsely and fraudulently posing as a domestic corporation when it had in fact migrated to a foreign state is not shown by the facts that the local office is not at all times open and the books are not always there, if the corporate property is within the state and the officers and books are frequently at the office, at least as often as the business requires.
4. Nonresidence of the officers, directors, and stockholders of a domestic corporation is not, in the absence of statutory requirements, express or implied, a ground for forfeiture of its franchises.
5. The mere fact that the books of a corporation have been kept most of the time in a foreign state, contrary to a statutory requirement, is not sufficient cause to forfeit its franchises, if the two places of location are but a short distance apart across the boundary line and they have been produced at the principal office whenever anyone entitled to do so desired to see them.

6. Neglect of the officers of a corporation to have its property listed for taxation is not sufficient cause for a forfeiture of its franchises.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of East St. Louis in favor of plaintiff in a quo warranto proceeding to annul the charter of defendant for violating the laws of the state. Reversed.

Statement by Bailey, J.:

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto, brought by the people of the state of Illinois, on the relation of the state's attorney of St. Clair County, in the city court of East St. Louis, against the North & South Rolling Stock Company. A petition for leave to file the information having been granted, an information was filed, the substantial portions of which are as follows: "M. W. Schaefer, state's attorney in and for said county, who sues for the people of the state of Illinois in this behalf, comes into court on this day, and for the said people, and in the name and by the authority thereof, gives the court here to understand and be informed that the North & South Rolling

NOTE—Migration as a ground for forfeiting of a corporate charter.

From the paucity of decisions upon the question of compelling a corporation to stay at home it would seem that they were either of very domestic tendencies or that the state authorities have not regarded migration as a sufficient offense for them to notice. Probably the fact is that such migration is attended with more serious consequences to the land of adoption than to the land of birth, hence the former have been more often called upon to pass upon the question. The result of those decisions, together with the dicta on that question, will be found in Cone Export & Commission Co. v. Poole (S. C.) ante, 220.

The decision mentioned in the ROLLING STOCK CO. case seems to be the only authority directly in point. In it the court said: "It is the duty of the corporation to keep its principal place of business, its books and records and its principal offices within the state to an extent necessary to the full jurisdiction and visitatorial powers of the state and its courts and the efficient exercise thereof in all proper cases which concern the corporation," both at common law and by implication of the state statutes, and failure to do so is ground for forfeiture of the charter. State v. Milwaukee, L. R. & W. R. Co. 45 Wis. 573.

In another case the court had occasion to determine the validity of acts done in the state of adoption and it was held that the authority of the legislature would be necessary to permit a corporation to migrate, and that, in the absence of such authority, acts done out of the state would not be recognised by the courts of the state which gave the charter. Aspinwall v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 20 Ind. 492, 83 Am. Dec. 323.

H. P. E.

Stock Company, for the space of two years last past, and more, in the county and city aforesaid, has used, and still does use, without any warrant, charter, or grant, the following liberties, privileges, and franchises, to wit, of owning, buying, and leasing, selling and operating, railroad rolling stock, all of which said liberties, privileges, and franchises the said company, during all the time aforesaid, upon the said people, has usurped, and still doth usurp, in the county and city aforesaid, to the damage and prejudice of the people, and against the peace and dignity of the same. Whereupon the said state's attorney, for the said people, and in the name and by the authority thereof, prays the consideration of the court here in the premises, and due process of law in this behalf to make the said North & South Rolling Stock Company answer to the said people by what warrant it claims to have, use, and employ the liberties, privileges, and franchises aforesaid." To this information, the defendant filed the following plea: "And now, on this day, comes the said North & South Rolling Stock Company, by L. H. Hite, its attorney, and, having heard read the said information, for plea in this behalf, says it is a duly organized and chartered company, incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois, with license and charter duly issued by the secretary of state of said state, authorizing it to carry on the business of owning, leasing, buying, selling, and operating railroad rolling stock; said corporation being organized under and by virtue of sections 1 to 38, inclusive, of an act entitled 'An act concerning corporations,' passed by the legislature of Illinois, approved by the governor, and in force July 1, 1872. And by this warrant the said North & South Rolling Stock Company has used, during all the time mentioned in said information, and still uses, the said liberties, privileges, and franchises of owning, leasing, buying, and selling and operating railroad rolling stock, as the said North & South Rolling Stock Company well might and still may; without this that said North & South Rolling Stock Company has usurped or does now usurp, the liberties, privileges, and franchises aforesaid, or any or either of them, upon the said people, as by the said information is above supposed. All which matters the said North & South Rolling Stock Company is ready to verify," etc. "Wherefore, it prays judgment," etc.

To this plea the state's attorney filed two replications, as follows: "And the said people of the state of Illinois say that the plaintiff ought not to be barred from maintaining the said information by reason of anything alleged in said plea, because the defendant has not kept, or caused to be kept, at its principal office or place of business in this state, correct books of account of all its business, as required by the statute in such case made and provided, whereby the defendant has forfeited its franchises aforesaid. And this the plaintiff is ready to verify. And, for a further replication to said plea, the plaintiff says that all the stockholders, directors, and officers of the defendant are now, and always have been, nonresidents of this state; that the defendant does not now and never has kept an office or place of business in this state, but has hitherto and does now keep its office and place of business in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, at which the business of defendant is transacted; that the franchise of the defendant was procured for the purpose of being exercised outside of this state, in the manner aforesaid, and without any intention of making the defendant a domestic corporation, in fact and substance; and that, in truth, the defendant has, since its organization, acted, for all practical purposes, as a foreign institution, and has maintained in this state a mere nominal existence. And this the plaintiff is ready to verify."

The following rejoinder was thereupon filed by the defendant to the second or additional replication, but by order of the court, entered by agreement of the parties, it was subsequently extended so as to apply to both replications: "And the said defendant, as to the additional replication of the people's" etc., "plaintiff, filed herein November 2, 1891, says that said plaintiff ought not, by reason of anything by them in that replication alleged, to have or maintain their aforesaid action against it, the said defendant because it says, that ever since the granting of its said charter, and since its organization, up to the present time, it had kept an office in the city of East St. Louis, in the state of Illinois, where its elections and stockholders' meetings, and meetings of its board of directors, are regularly held, and where all its records and books of accounts and papers have been and are produced for the inspection of any stockholder or his attorney, or other person interested, whenever requested by such person, and that the said charter and its privileges were sought and procured for the purpose of being exercised in the state of Illinois, and since its organization all its dealings in the matter of handling and running its rolling stock have been in the hands of, and with, the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, an Illinois corporation, and that the situs of defendant's only property, its cars and rolling stock, has actually, all the time, been, and now is, in the state of Illinois; that no stockholder or other person interested, has ever sought to obtain any information, or to do any legitimate business, at defendant's said East St. Louis office, and been denied the privilege or right to do so. And this said defendant is ready to verify. Wherefore, it prays judgment if said plaintiff ought to have or maintain the aforesaid action thereof against said defendant."

This rejoinder was traversed, and issue taken thereon to the country. The cause was then tried by the court, a jury being waived by a stipulation of the parties; and at such trial the court found the issues in favor of the people, and rendered judgment ousting the defendant from the franchises in question, and precluding it from exercising the same under any right or claim whatever, and the defendant was also adjudged to pay the costs of the prosecution. From that judgment the defendant has now appealed to this court.

At the trial, the defendant, to maintain the issues on its part, read in evidence an agreement between Henry O'Hara, J. S. Berthold, and C. M. Jennings, dated December 1, 1887, and by which, after reciting that O'Hara and the firm of Berthold & Jennings were the owners of certain railroad freight cars, and were desirous of putting the same under one management and virtual ownership, for the purpose of avoiding conflicting interests, and for the better management of the property, it was agreed by them to form and incorporate themselves into a joint-stock company, under the laws of the state of Illinois, by the name and style of North & South Rolling Stock Company, for the purpose of owning, leasing, and operating railroad rolling stock, and buying and selling the same, and for any other purpose for which like companies are formed. And it was further agreed that the individuals named should subscribe equally to the capital stock of the proposed corporation,—the amount of capital stock, the number of shares, and the par value of the shares to be agreed upon before making application for incorporation; that the affairs and business of the company should be conducted and managed by a board of directors consisting of the stockholders, who, for the first 12 months, and until their successors were elected, should be the three parties to the agreement; that the officers of the corporation should be a president, vice president and manager, and secretary and treasurer, who should comprise the board of directors, as above stated; that O'Hara and Berthold & Jennings should lease to the proposed corporation the railroad freight cars owned by them, respectively, and then running on the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad (Belle-ville & Southern Illinois Division) and connections, for the term of fifteen years, with the privilege of purchase to be specified in the lease; that O'Hara should lease to the corporation 75 stock cars and 200 box cars, described as bearing certain numbers, and marked "St. Louis & Cairo Short-Line Railroad;" that Berthold & Jennings should lease to the corporation 100 refrigerator cars and 156 box cars and 58 coal cars, all bearing certain numbers, and being marked same as above. And it was agreed that the parties would not be interested in any manner in any other rolling stock running on the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad and connections, other than through the proposed corporation, during its existence. The defendant also read in evidence its certificate of incorporation and accompanying documents, whereby it was incorporated under the provision of the act of the general assembly of this state entitled "An act concerning corporations," approved April 18, 1872. Those documents consisted, first, of a statement signed and acknowledged by O'Hara and Berthold & Jennings, for the purpose of forming a corporation under that act, by the name above stated, in which it was declared that the object for which the corporation was formed was that of "owning, leasing, buying, selling, and operating railroad rolling stock;" that the capital stock of the corporation was to be $300,000, to be divided into 8,000 shares of $100 each; that the principal office of the corporation would be at East St. Louis, St. Clair county, Ill., and the duration of the corporation fifty years. Also, the report of the commissioners appointed to open books of subscription to the capital stock of the proposed corporation, showing the full amount of the capital stock had been subscribed, and that the above-named parties had each subscribed for 1,000 shares. Also, the final certificate of incorporation by the secretary of state, showing a compliance with the statute, and declaring the North & South Rolling Stock Company a legally organized corporation under the laws of this state. It was also shown that the certificate of incorporation was duly recorded in the office of the recorder of St. Clair county, February 17, 1888. The defendant also read in evidence an instrument dated February 1, 1888, by which O'Hara leased to the corporation 76 stock cars and 200 box cars, having the numbers and marks above stated, with an agreement to sell his interest in them to the corporation at any time within ten years, at its election; and it was agreed that all of the rolling stock should remain on the line of the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad and its connections and, retain their respective marks and numbers.

Berthold was then called as a witness, and his testimony was, in substance, as follows: "I am acquainted with the defendant corporation. O'Hara, Jennings and I organized it. We three were the stockholders. At that time, we lived at St. Louis, Mo. The corporation has an office in East St. Louis. It is in the office of T. L. Fekete. We pay him rent. Our meetings are held at the office in East St. Louis. We have never held stockholders' or directors' meetings elsewhere. The property of the company consists of railroad rolling stock. The agreement was that the property should be placed, where it has ever since remained, in the hands of the Cairo Short-Line Railroad Company. That is an Illinois corporation. We have our local office for the purpose of daily business in St. Louis. It is at the office of Berthold & Jennings, southeast corner of Fourth and Chestnut streets. That office has been there ever since the organization of the company, and ever since the principal office was located at East St. Louis. There was never a request by any person to examine the books of account and papers at the principal office in East St. Louis but once. O'Hara made the demand, and they were produced, and examined by him. They were free to all stockholders in St. Louis at any time. He was a St. Louis stockholder, and had his office right across the street from our St. Louis office, and knew where the books were. After the first election, O'Hara, Jennings, and I continued to be directors. I was president of the board; O'Hara, vice president; and Jennings, secretary and treasurer. For the last five years the officers of the corporation have visited East St. Louis, the place of the principal office, two or three times a week, on an average. On an average, the president or vice president or some officer of the corporation has been in East St. Louis on an average of two or three times a week on business of the company." On cross-examination, he said: "At the time the corporation was organized, the persons organizing it, and who became stockholders and officers were nonresidents. These persons all remained nonresidents, and are still stockholders. The company never has had a stockholder or officer who was a resident of the state of Illinois. The capital stock is $300,000, all paid up. At the time of the organization, each stockholder took $100,000 of stock. The corporation was organized for the purpose of leasing, buying, selling and operating cars and locomotives. At that time the individual corporators had a lot of rolling stock. All the rolling stock was turned over by us, and that was considered as paying for the stock. At that time the headquarters of the rolling stock was in East St. Louis, but the stock itself may have been in Mississippi, Alabama, Texas, and all over. It was not leased to any one at the time, but we put it on the roads, and got mileage. After the company was organized, it remained with the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, we collecting the mileage. The only property of the corporation that I know of was the rolling stock on the Short Line. We have acquired cars since, but all we have is on that line. I do not know that we ever listed the property for taxation in the state of Illinois. I have been president, and Jennings has been secretary and treasurer, of the company, all the time. O'Hara has been vice president part of the time. The present stockholders are O'Hara, Jennings, George S. Hoke, and myself. O'Hara has 1,000 shares; Jennings, 999; Hoke, 1; and I, 1,000. The only business transacted by the company has been with reference to the use of the cars, and the collection of the mileage. We have books of account, and corporation records showing stockholders' and directors' meetings. We have a regular set of books. Any one can find our office at St. Louis by getting our address, and going to it. There is no sign to show where the office is. We three gentlemen who organized the company have had other business. Jennings and I had a lumber yard. When we come to Illinois it is to see to those cars. I have not been in East St. Louis on private business of my own for four years. I have come to see about those cars. We have clerks who look after the lumber business. Have no yard now. We have an office in Fekete's office, and pay him $10 a year rent. We have no furniture or other property of the corporation there. The corporation books are not kept there regularly. The only time when the stockholders visit the East St. Louis office is at the directors' meetings. We never did business there, and never had occasion to. We talked over what had been done. That was at a stockholders' meeting. Those meetings were held once a year; it may be, oftener. Anybody interested could find our office in East St. Louis. I do not think the public would need to know where to find it. Our charter calls for a principal office in East St. Louis. We had no sign up there. I go to Fekete's office pretty often. The company never undertook to keep its books there. I do not know that the company ever paid any taxes in Illinois. It does not show on our books that we ever paid taxes there. I do not know what the Cairo Short Line did. As president, in my visits, of two or three times a week, I have been at Fekete's office, where our principal office is, much oftener than once a year. I never heard of any inquiry being made at that office, or in St. Louis, as to the whereabouts of the corporation. There has been no inquiry made in relation to our property, or otherwise, so far as I know. We never owned any roadbed or right of way, nor assumed to run a railroad."

The foregoing was all the evidence offered, and upon that evidence the court found the issues for the relator, and rendered judgment of ouster.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To determine the propriety of the finding and judgment of the court in this case, it is important, in the first place, to notice the precise nature of the issues which were submitted for trial. The information was filed by the state's attorney against the North & South Rolling Stock Company, by that name; requiring it to answer by what warrant it claimed to have, use, and exercise the liberties, franchises, and privileges of owning, buying, leasing, selling, and operating railroad stock. The defendant answered by setting up its incorporation under the general law of this state in relation to corporations; the purposes for which it was incorporated, as declared in its certificate of incorporation, being to use and exercise the precise franchises and privileges mentioned in the information. The relator, by proceeding against the defendant by its corporate name, must be deemed to have admitted the fact of its incorporation. The weight of authority may now be regarded as sustaining the proposition that the effect of filing an information against a corporation by its corporate name, to procure the forfeiture of its charter, or to compel it to disclose by what authority it exercises its corporate franchises, is to admit the existence of the corporation. When, therefore, the information is filed against the defendant in its corporate name, and process is issued and served accordingly, and the defendant appears and pleads in the same corporate character, its corporate existence cannot afterwards be controverted. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 661.

It will thus be seen that the legality of the defendant's incorporation is not assailed, but the relator seeks to bring the case within that clause of the statute relation to quo warranto which authorizes the filing of an information where "any corporation does or omits any act which amounts to a surrender or forfeiture of its rights and privileges as a corporation." For the purpose of showing such acts of omission or commission, the relator has filed two replications. The first alleges that the defendant has not kept, or caused to be kept, at its principal office or place of business in this state, correct books of account of all its business, as required by statute. The second replication alleges that all the stockholders and officers of the defendant are now, and always have been, non-residents of this state; that the defendant does not now and never has kept an office or place of business in this state, but has hitherto and does now keep its office and place of business at St. Louis, Mo., at which its business is transacted; that the franchise of the defendant was procured for the purpose of being exercised outside of this state, in the manner aforesaid, and without any intention of making the defendant a domestic corporation in fact and in substance and that the defendant has, since its organization, acted, for all practical purposes, as a foreign institution, and has maintained in this state a mere nominal existence. The rejoinder constitutes a substantial traverse of these allegations, and upon the issues thus formed the case was tried. No question being made by the respondent as to propriety of these replications, or as to whether they do not constitute clear departures from the case made by the information, we are disposed to treat the issues as properly joined. But it may be observed that, as to all the matters thus submitted for trial, the burden of proof was on the relator, and unless he has proved, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant has committed or omitted acts which amount to a surrender or forfeiture of its rights and privileges as a corporation, the judgment of ouster cannot be sustained. No evidence was introduced, and no witness was called, on behalf of the relator; the cause being submitted upon the documentary evidence introduced by the defendant, and upon the testimony of Berthold, one of the defendant's stockholders and directors, and its president, and who was called as a witness by the defendant.

From the evidence thus introduced, it appears that, on the 1st day of December, 1887, the firm of Berthold & Jennings, who were then, and still are, residents of, and doing business in, St. Louis, Mo., were the owners of a large number of railroad freight cars, which were then leased to the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and were then in use by that company on its Belleville & Southern Illinois Division, commonly known as the St. Louis & Cairo Short Line,—a line of railroad situated in this state; that Henry O'Hara, who also was then, and still is, a resident of, and doing business in St. Louis, was in like manner, the owner of a large number of other railroad freight cars, which were leased to the same Illinois corporation, and in use on the same line of railroad in this state; that for the purpose of placing these cars under one management, and avoiding conflicting interests, and for the better management of the property, these parties agreed to incorporate themselves into a joint-stock company, under the laws of this state, by the name and style of the North & South Rolling-Stock Company; that the three parties should subscribe equally to the capital stock of the proposed corporation, and should constitute its first board of directors and officers; that they should turn over the cars owned by them, respectively, to the corporation, on certain prescribed terms, and should not be interested in any manner, except through the proposed corporation, in any other rolling stock running on the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad or its connections. In pursuance of this agreement, the corporation was organized, its entire property and assets consisting of these cars, and other cars subsequently purchased, and all leased to and in the possession of an Illinois railroad corporation, and in use on a line of railroad in this state, and its entire business, so far as the evidence shows, consisting of periodical settlements with the lessee railroad company for the mileage or other rents earned by the leased cars. It will thus be seen that the property and assets of the corporation, at the time of its organization, were, and ever since that time have been, wholly within this state. To what extent its business has been actually transacted in this state is not clearly shown, but, as the burden of proof on this point is upon the relator, failure of proof militates against the case of the prosecution, rather than that of the defense. It may be said, however, that there is nothing in the evidence tending to show that the corporation had any business which required constant attention on the part of any of its officers or agents, either in this state or elsewhere. As its rolling stock has been operated by the lessee corporation, the defendant had nothing to do with that part of the business, and its settlements for mileage or rents may, so far as appears, have required attention only at fixed intervals. Where those were made, whether in Illinois or Missouri, the evidence fails to show with certainty, although, perhaps, it may be inferred from the fact that the lessee corporation was resident in Illinois, and had its principal office in East St. Louis, and the further fact that the defendant's president made frequent visits to that place on the defendant's business, that the object of those visits was, in part at least, to make settlements with the lessee.

The testimony of Berthold shows—and in this he is not contradicted—that the defendant, ever since its organization, has kept an office in East St. Louis, and that all official meetings of the stockholders and directors have been held there. He admits that no officer or agent of the corporation has been kept in constant attendance at that office, and there is nothing showing that the business of the corporation has been such as to require that to be done. He testifies, however, that he, as president of the company, has been in the constant habit of going to East St. Louis, as often as two or three times a week, to look after its business; and it may fairly be inferred from his testimony that while there he made his headquarters at the East St. Louis office. He also testified that the other officers of the corporation frequently went over to East St. Louis to look after the company's business. It appears, also, that the defendant has also an office in the city of St. Louis,—that office being at the place of business of Berthold & Jennings, and across the street from the place of business of O'Hara; but the evidence leaves it very much in doubt as to how much and what portion of the corporate business was transacted at that office. It seems to have been more convenient for the three stockholders to have the books kept there, but the witness testified that they were kept part of the time at the East St. Louis office, and that they had always been there when any stockholder or other person had desired to examine them at that place. In view of all the evidence, we are of the opinion that the averments of the relator's replication that the defendant's franchise was procured for the purpose of being exercised out of this state, and without any intention of making the defendant a domestic corporation in fact or in substance, and that since its organization it has acted for all practical purposes as a foreign institution, and has maintained in this state a mere nominal existence, are not proved. The property of the corporation is all located in this state, and is managed, used, and controlled here. Upon its organization, it established an office in this state, which it calls its principal office, and where all meetings of the stockholders and directors have in fact been held, and that office has ever since been, and is still, maintained. A considerable, if not the most material, portion of its business, is, and has always been, transacted, and its substantial interests are, and have always been, in this state. Under these circumstances, its existence here must be held to be much more than nominal. If it has forfeited its franchise, it must be by reason of some other act than that of falsely and fraudulently posing as a domestic corporation, while it has, in substance and in fact, accomplished its migration to another jurisdiction.

The facts of this case are different in all their essential features from those appearing in Land Grant, R. & T. Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 245, and Hill v. Beach, 13 N. J. Eq. 81, to which we are referred. In the first of these cases, a corporation had been chartered by the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania, and authorized to engage in certain business enterprises in any of the states or territories of the United States, except the state of Pennsylvania. The corporation went to the state of Kansas, and there engaged in railroad building, and brought mandamus in the courts of that state to compel the county commissioners to subscribe to the capital stock of its railroad. The court, in denying its right to that writ, held that the rules of comity did not require that state to permit the corporation to do business within its borders which it was forbidden to do in the state of its creation, and that, where a corporation attempts to migrate in a body to another state, it dissolves into its original elements, and that the persons who comprise it become only individuals. So, in Hill v. Beach, a corporation was organized under the laws of New York to carry on the business of quarrying stone in a quarry in New Jersey, and it was held that the company would not be recognized in the courts of New Jersey as a legally constituted corporation, and that persons doing business in that state under such assumed corporate capacity would be treated as, and held to the responsibility of, partners. None of the elements forming the ratio decidendi in those cases are present here.

In this case, however, it is proved (1) that the stockholders, directors, and officers of the corporation are nonresidents of this state; and (2) that the corporation has failed to keep its corporate books continuously at its principal office in this state; and it remains to be seen whether either or both these facts constitute a sufficient ground for declaring a forfeiture of its corporate franchise. So far as the ownership of the stock of a domestic corporation by nonresidents is concerned, we are aware of no rule of the common law, and certainly none is prescribed by statute, which forbids it. Nor does the law require that any particular proportion of the stock of such corporation should be owned by residents, except, perhaps, in the single case where a certain part of the directors are required to be residents, and there, doubtless, by implication, the shares constituting the qualification stock of the resident directors must be held by them. But otherwise there seems to be no rule forbidding the ownership of all the stock by nonresidents. Such ownership, as has been frequently decided, has no effect upon the citizenship of the corporation, as affecting the jurisdiction of the federal courts; and we see no reason why, in any point of view, it should have any tendency to take from the organization the position and status of a domestic corporation. So far as we have been able to find, there is no rule of law requiring the directors of corporations organized under the "Act concerning corporations," approved April 18, 1872, or any portion of them, to be residents of the state. Section 11 of article 11 of the constitution provides that a majority of the directors of all railroad corporations shall be residents of this state, and that provision is repeated, in substance, in section 11 of the Act for the Incorporation of Railroad Companies, approved March 1, 1872. But no such provision is to be found in the constitution or statutes applicable to those classes of corporations which may be organized, as was the one now before us, under the general law concerning corporations. The fair conclusion is that while the public policy of the state, as declared by its constitutional and statutory law, requires that a majority of the directors of railroad corporations shall be residents, no such requirement exists in case of other corporations, and that it is no violation of law, and therefore no ground upon which a forfeiture of its franchises can be declared, that all the directors and officers of the corporation now before the court are, and since its organization have been, nonresidents.

Nor are we disposed to hold that the mere fact that the corporate books have been kept most of the time at the company's St. Louis office is, of itself, a sufficient ground for dissolving the corporation. Its two officers are on opposite sides of the Mississippi river, and but a short distance from each other. Whenever the books have been required at the East St. Louis office by any stockholder or other person entitled and desiring to see and examine them, they have been produced at that office, and there is nothing showing the slightest indisposition on the part of the corporation to have its books there, when needed for any lawful purpose. It is true that keeping its books for most of the time in St. Louis may not be a strict compliance with the statute in that behalf, but it does not appear that any interest, either public or private, has been or is likely to be, imperiled or incommoded thereby. The thirteenth section of the statute under which the defendant was incorporated provides that it shall be the duty of the directors or trustees of every stock corporation to cause to be kept at its principal office or place of business in this state, correct books of account of all its business, and every stockholder in such corporation shall have the right, at all reasonable times, by himself or by his attorney, to examine the records and books of account of the corporation. It would seem that the primary object of this statutory provision is to protect the rights of stockholders and the evidence is positive that whenever a stockholder has desired to examine the books at that place, they have been produced there for his examination. It is probable that the statute may have had other objects in view in requiring the books to be kept at the principal office in this state, as, for instance to aid the state in exercising its visitatorial power over the corporation or perhaps to enable creditors of the several stockholders to ascertain the number of shares of stock standing in the names of each, so as to levy their executions or attachments thereon; but there is no reason to suppose that the books would not have been instantly produced whenever required for either of those purposes. It is not every failure to comply with the exact letter of the statute which will expose a corporation to the loss of its franchises. In determining whether such departure from the provisions of the act of incorporation has occurred as will work a forfeiture, the same general principles of construction are applicable in which govern valuable grants to individuals upon conditions subsequent or precedent. In all such cases, a substantial performance of the conditions, according to the intent of the charter, is all that is required, and slight departures are overlooked. High, Extr. Legal. Rem. § 651.

Some stress is sought to be laid upon the fact that neither at the office in East St. Louis, nor at the office in St. Louis, was any sign displayed, advertising to the public the location of the office. But this circumstance seems to have very little significance, when it is remembered that the business in which the corporation was engaged involved no dealings with the general public, but only with the corporation to which its cars, were leased, and that there was, therefore, very little if any occasion to advertise its place of business to the public.

Considerable significance is also sought to be given to the fact that the defendant's officers have never listed the corporate property in this state for purposes of taxation. Whether it was listed by the lessee, who had it in possession, is not shown. The property was all tangible property, existing in this state, and was within the reach of the officers whose duty it was to levy and assess taxes. But, even if its property escaped taxation solely through the negligence of its officers to see to it that the property was properly listed, we are unable to see how such fact would have a tendency to sustain the judgment in this case. Important as is the duty of every property holder, whether a natural person or a corporation, to have his property properly listed for the purpose of taxation, so that each may bear his proper share of the public burdens, we are not aware that a failure by a corporation to list its property for that purpose has ever been held to be an act amounting to a forfeiture of its corporate franchise.

The relator, in his argument, has relied very largely upon the case of State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 45 Wis. 579. While we are not prepared to yield our assent, in all respects, to either the reasoning or conclusion of that decision, it is sufficient for our present purposes to distinguish that case from this by pointing out the fact that in that case there was a demurrer to the information, whereby the facts alleged were all admitted. Those facts were that the principal or general office of the corporation was in the city of New York; that the books and records of the corporation were not, and never had been, kept within the state of Wisconsin, and were then in the city of New York; and that none of the general officers of the corporation resided in Wisconsin, but that its president, secretary, and treasurer all resided in the city of New York. These facts being all admitted, it was held that sufficient ground was shown for dissolving the corporation. In some respects the decision is based upon Wisconsin statutes which are essentially different from ours. In the present case, however, issues were taken upon the allegations of the relator, and many of them failed of being proved; thus necessitating, in our opinion, a different result from that reached in the Wisconsin case.

After carefully considering the entire case, we find ourselves unable to concur with the decision of the learned judge who tried the case in the court below.

The judgment, therefore, will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the City Court of East St. Louis.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

John O. HENDERSON, City Auditor, Appl.,

v.

STATE of Indiana ex rel., James W. STOUT.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The compensation of officers, whether of state, county, or township, is a matter which may be embraced in a single statute.
2. A provision requiring officers to tax and collect fees for the creation of a fund out of which their salaries shall be paid is within the scope of the title of act entitled "an act fixing the compensation and prescribing the duties of officers."
3. The constitutional provision that "justice shall be administered freely and without purchase" is not violated by a statute authorizing officers to tax and collect reasonable fees for services, to create a fund out of which their salaries are to be paid.
4. A statute applying alike to all officers elected, after it takes effect, is not local or special because officers previously elected are exempt from its provisions.
5. The invalidity of a statute as to fees of officers on the ground that it is local and special as far as it applies to other officers does not make it invalid as to sheriffs, if the provisions as to the latter are complete within themselves and capable of being executed independently of provisions relating to other officers.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of relator in a proceeding brought to compel defendant to draw a warrant on the state treasurer in favor of relator in satisfaction of a claim alleged to be due to relator as sheriff of Vigo County for delivery of convicts at the southern state prison. Reversed.

Where an act is void it does not repeal former laws, but leaves them in force.

Mesheier v. State, 11 Ind. 482; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 218.

Where the provisions of an act are not clearly independent and distinct, and part is void, the entire act must fail.

The Act of 1891 assumes to construct a general scheme, and the provisions are so interlocked that severance is impossible.

Where a classification by counties is attempted, it must be a complete classification. Edmunds v. Herbrandson, supra.

All officers are entitled to compensation in a constitutional mode, although this compensation may be graded according to population, so that any one of them has a right to demand compensation under the valid law.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 222.

The Act of 1891 operates as official terms expire, if operative at all, and uniformity of operation is impossible.

To be valid a law must be general in its scope and uniform in its operation. Uniformity of operation is as essential as generality of expression. The practical operation of a statute and not its form determines its generality and uniformity.

State v. Pugh, 48 Ohio St. 98; Edmunds v. Herbrandson, supra; Mitchell v. McCorkle, 69 Ind. 184; King v. State, 8 L. R. A. 210, 37 Tenn. 864.

The act assumes to make one rule for some counties and other rules for other counties.

The salaries are not uniform, nor can they be, inasmuch as they depend entirely upon uncertain contingencies.

The salaries depend entirely upon the fees collected and not upon the population. Special funds, special and local to each county, are provided out of which salaries shall be paid. No fees, no fund; no fund, no salary. It is not possible for uniformity or generality to exist; there is nothing but diversity, all is special, nothing general.

Fulk v. Monroe County Comrs. 46 Ind. 150.

There must be one rule for all counties, and an act which can not operate uniformly in all counties, and upon all officers of a class is void.

State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340; Nichols v. Walter, 87 Minn. 270.

No matter what the language of an act may be, its practical operation must be general and uniform throughout the entire state or it is void.

The suspension of an act until manifold and uncertain contingencies happen renders generality and uniformity impossible.

Freeman, in a note to State v. Ellet, 47 Ohio St. 90, 21 Am. St. Rep. 772; People v. Cooper, 83 Ill. 585.

The Act of 1879 is in force in all its parts, or else the Act of 1891 is practically in force; if so, there is no uniformity, because one act is in force in some localities as to some counties, and as to some persons, while as to some other localities, some other persons, and some other counties, another law is in force.

Travellers Ins. Co. v. Onwego Twp. 55 Fed. Rep. 861.

The legislature has assumed to put the act in force in a mode unknown to the constitution and it is therefore without force.

The constitution provides two modes, and two only, in which statutes can be put into force. These modes are by the declaration of an emergency and by publication.

Const. art. 4, § 28.

The rule that the express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of all others applies with greater force to written constitutions than any other instrument.

The Act of 1891 is in conflict with the amendment of 1881.

The Act of 1891 lays a tax on justice, and in so doing violates the constitutional provision which requires that justice shall be "freely" administered.

State v. Tucker, 46 Ind. 855.

The words "fees" and "compensation" are not synonymous.

Jefferson County Suprs. v. Johnson, 64 Ill. 149.

Messrs. Lamb & Beasley also for appellee.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th day of April, 1898, the appellee filed a petition in the Marion circuit court, the purpose of which was to compel the appellant, as state auditor, to draw a warrant on the state treasurer in favor of the relator, as sheriff of Vigo county, as compensation for the delivery of convicts at the Southern State Prison. It is alleged in the petition, among other things, that the relator is the sheriff of Vigo county, having been elected to that office at the November election in the year 1892; that in the year 1892, and in the year 1893, as such sheriff, he conveyed from Vigo county to the state prison south, and delivered to the warden a given number of convicts, convicted and sentenced in the Vigo circuit court; that he was entitled to receive as mileage for the performance of such duty the sum of fifteen cents for each mile traveled, going and returning, for each convict conveyed to the prison, except when more than one was taken at the same time, to be paid out of the general funds in the state treasury; that there is in the general fund in the treasurer's office far more than sufficient to pay the relator's claim; that on the 21st day of April, 1893, the relator demanded of the appellant, who then was and still is the auditor of state of the state of Indiana, that he draw a warrant on the treasurer of state for the sum due him, to which demand the appellant refused to accede, putting such refusal upon the sole ground that the relator was not entitled to any warrant whatsoever, because the act of the general assembly of the state entitled, "an act fixing the compensation and prescribing the duties of certain state and county officers, and providing penalties for the violation of its provisions," passed notwithstanding the objections of the governor thereto, March 9, 1891, does not allow the sheriff of the state to receive mileage for such services; that the claim of the appellant that the Act of March 9, 1891, precludes the relator from receiving the mileage claimed by him, is wholly and totally unfounded in this, that the act is in conflict with the provisions of the constitution of the state, and is utterly void.

To this petition, and to the alternative writ of mandamus issued thereon, the circuit court overruled a demurrer, and the appellant failing and refusing to answer further, a peremptory writ was ordered, from which action and judgment of the court this appeal is prosecuted. The assignment of error calls in question the propriety of this ruling.

On the 9th day of March, 1891, the general assembly of the state, notwithstanding the governor's objections thereto, passed an act entitled: "An act fixing the compensation and prescribing the duties of certain state and county officers and providing penalties for the violation of its provisions."

The act purports to fix the compensation of the governor of the state, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor of state, treasurer of state, attorney-general, state librarian, clerk of the supreme court, and his deputies and assistants, including his stenographer and type-writer, superintendent of public instructions, director of the department of geology and natural resources, inspector of mines, assistant inspector of mines, chief of bureau of statistics, inspector of mineral oils, secretary of the state board of health, judges of the supreme court, law librarian of the supreme court, sheriff of the supreme court, judges of the circuit courts of the state, judges of the superior courts, judges of the criminal courts, prosecuting attorneys, county auditors, county treasurers, county recorders, clerks of the circuit courts and sheriffs of the several counties of the state.

It requires certain state officers to tax the fees therein fixed, and pay the same into the state treasury. It also requires the clerks of the circuit courts and sheriffs of the several counties to tax the fees therein specified against litigants in court, and pay the same into the county treasury.

The twenty-first section of the act is as follows: "The county officers in this act named shall be entitled to receive for their services the compensation specified in this act, which compensation is graded in proportion to the population and the necessary services required in each of said several counties, subject to the conditions herein prescribed and they shall receive no other compensation whatever."

Section one hundred and twenty-three provides that the sheriffs of the several counties of the state shall, on behalf of their respective counties, tax and charge the fees provided by law on account of services performed by such officers; the fees and amounts so charged shall be designated "sheriff's costs," but they shall in no sense belong to or be the property of the sheriff, but shall belong to and be the property of the county. This section further provides that, in addition to his salary, the sheriff shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses for taking each convict to the state prison, to be paid out of the state treasury upon the certificate of the warden of the prison, accompanied by an itemized statement of such expenses, verified by the affidavit of the sheriff.

The act undertakes to compensate county clerks, sheriffs, auditors, treasurers and recorders by a fixed salary, payable quarterly out of the county treasury, from funds to be known respectively as "clerk's fund," "auditor's fund," "treasurer's fund," "sheriff's fund," and "recorder's fund." The clerks, sheriffs, and recorders cannot draw from the treasury, on account of salaries, a sum in excess of the fees taxed, collected and paid in by each of them prior to the payment of their respective salaries.

Section one hundred and thirty-six of the Act is as follows: "Where any clerk, auditor, recorder, treasurer or sheriff has been elected by the people of his county before the taking effect of this act, such officer so elected, during the time that he holds such term, shall not be subject to the provisions of this act. He shall hold such term of office and perform the duties thereof, and receive the compensation prescribed by law, the same as if this act had not been passed."

The pleadings, including the assignment of error in this case, are in such form as to present for our consideration and decision the question as to whether this enactment is a valid law under the constitution of the state.

In passing upon and deciding the numerous intricate and important questions presented in this case by the learned counsel who have so ably briefed and argued them, it is important that we should constantly keep in mind the oft repeated declaration and rule that the power to declare a statute unconstitutional is a high one, and will never be exercised in doubtful cases. To doubt the constitutionality of a law is to resolve in favor of its validity. An act of the legislature is not to be declared unconstitutional unless it is clearly, palpably, and plainly in conflict with the constitution. It is well to keep in mind also the well-known rules that courts will pass upon such constitutional questions only as are necessary to a decision of the cause upon its merits. Brown v. Buzan, 24 Ind. 194; Anderson v. Caldwell, 91 Ind. 451, 46 Am. Rep. 613; State v. Insurance Co. of North America, 115 Ind. 264; State v. Denny, 118 Ind. 382, 4 L. R. A. 79; Parker v. State, 183 Ind. 178, 18 L. R. A. 567, 579.

Against the validity of the law it is contended by the appellee:

First. That it violates section 19, article 4, of the State Constitution, which declares that, "every act shall embrace but one subject, and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title."

Second. That it violates section 12, article 1, of the Constitution, which requires that, "justice shall be administered freely and without purchase, completely and without denial, speedily and without delay."

Third. That it violates section 22, article 4, of the Constitution of the state, which provides that the general assembly shall not pass any local or special laws, "in relation to fees and salaries, except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and the necessary services required."

Fourth. That it violates section 23, article 4, of the Constitution, which provides that: "In all cases enumerated in the preceding section, and in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state."

The constitutional provision set out in the first objection to the law under immediate consideration has often been before this court for construction and application. It has been repeatedly declared that the purpose of this provision is: first, to prevent the passage of an act under a false and delusive title, which did not indicate the subject-matter contained in the act, whereby legislators might be deceived into the support of measures in ignorance of their true character, and, second, to prevent the combining together in one act of two or more subjects having no relation to each other, whereby members, in order to procure such legislation as they wished, were often constrained to assist in passing other measures obnoxious to them. Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28.

It has been truthfully said that this provision has been the source of much perplexity, both in the legislature and in the courts. The proper construction of its provisions was announced, we think, in the case of Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 223, where it was said by this court: "The constitution does not assume to divide the general scope of legislation and classify the parts under particular heads or subjects; but, of necessity, has left that power to be exercised by the legislature, as it in its wisdom and discretion shall deem proper. The Constitution assumes that different subjects of legislation do exist, and requires that each act shall embrace but one subject, and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title. The purposes of the provision, in view of the evils intended to be guarded against, can only be affected by requiring that the subject expressed should be reasonably specific, or, in other words, should be such as to indicate some particular branch of legislation, as a head under which the particular provisions of the act might reasonably be looked for. . . . But it should be borne in mind that the Constitution only requires that a proper subject of legislation should be expressed in the title, and not the particular features or details of the law. If these relate to the subject expressed, it satisfies the constitutional provision. The words, 'An Act concerning highways,' would express but a single subject, and yet would constitute a comprehensive title, under which almost any desired provision relating to highways might be enacted."

It has been often decided that the title of an act need not go into details, and that it is sufficient if it indicates with reasonable precision and clearness the subject it embraces. Nor is an act invalid because it includes details not mentioned in the title, if the details are germane to the general subject designated in the title. If the subject is properly designated in the title to an act of the general assembly, any legislation properly connected with the subject may be enacted, though there be no mention in the title of such details. In other words, it is always necessary to designate in the title of an act the subject of legislation, but it is never necessary to mention the matters properly connected with the subject. Warren v. Britton, 84 Ind. 14; Bitters v. Fulton County Comrs. 81 Ind. 125; Benson v. Christian, 129 Ind. 535; Farrell v. State, 45 Ind. 871; Thomasson v. State, 15 Ind. 449; Reams v. State, 23 Ind. 111; Hingle v. State, supra; State v. Sullivan, 74 Ind. 121.

It is contended by the appellee that this act embraces a multiplicity of subjects, and that it is for that reason void. It is contended that it embraces the following subjects, namely: (1) county officers; (2) state officers; (3) judicial officers; (4) the duties of officers; (5) compensation of officers; (6) public revenues; (7) fees; (8) salaries, and that each of these are separate and distinct subjects, wholly disconnected.

We are unable to agree with the appellee in this contention. Some of the matters mentioned as subjects are matters properly connected with the subject designated in the title, while others are simply divisions of that subject. The subject of legislation as designated in the title of this act is the compensation of certain state and county officers. It is no uncommon thing in legislation to prescribe the duties of public officers in the same act which fixes their compensation. Nor is it uncommon in this state to fix in one general law the compensation of public officers belonging to different classes. Such was the Fee and Salary Law of 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 130), which fixed the fees and salaries of the state officers and the fees of county and township officers. Of like character was the Act of 1852, Rev. Stat. 1852, p. 493. To the same effect was the Fee and Salary Law of 1859, Act 1859, p. 174.

The same practice was followed by the general assembly in enacting the Fee and Salary Law of 1865, Acts of 1865, p. 128. The same course was pursued in 1875, Acts of 1875, p. 81. Nor are we able to perceive any valid objection to such a course. The title of the act in such cases is sufficiently comprehensive and specific to call every legislator's attention to the subject under consideration. The compensation of the state's public servants, for services rendered, whether such services be rendered for the people of the state at large, or for the people of a single county or township, embraces, we think, but a single general subject, which may be embraced in a single act of the general assembly. To hold otherwise is to affirm that the public officers of the state have been compensated for their services under void legislation since 1852. We cannot give our assent to such a contention. We are unable to perceive any reason which could be urged against such an act, which would not apply also to a single act fixing the fees and salaries of the state officers, because the state is divided into three separate and distinct departments.

We think that a provision requiring officers to tax and collect fees for the purpose of creating a fund with which they may be paid is properly connected with the subject of compensating such officers for their public services, as well as a provision fixing the fees to be taxed and collected. Bitters v. Fulton County Comrs. supra; Walker v. Dunham, 17 Ind. 488; Bank of State of Indiana v. New Albany, 11 Ind. 189; State v. Sullivan, supra; Indianapolis v. Huegels, 115 Ind. 581; Reed v. State, 12 Ind. 641; Brandon v. State, 16 Ind. 197; Robinson v. Skipworth, 28 Ind. 311; Hunter v. Burnsville Turnp. Co. 56 Ind. 213; Gillespie v. State, 9 Ind. 380; State v. Montgomery County Comrs. 26 Ind. 522.

Section 12, article 1, of the Constitution has been before this court for construction on two separate occasions. Wallace v. Marion County Comrs. 37 Ind. 898; Fulk v. Monroe County Comrs. 46 Ind. 150.

In the first case, the judges of this court were equally divided upon the question of the constitutionality of a law requiring fees for services performed by a county officer to be paid into the county treasury. In that case Judge Downey wrote an opinion holding that such a law was valid, while Judge Warden wrote an opinion holding the opposite view. In the latter case of Fulk v. Monroe County Comrs. supra, a majority of the court adopted the opinion of Warden. Neither of these opinions is elaborately reasoned, nor does either of the learned judges cite a single authority in support of his opinion. The case of Fulk v. Monroe County Comrs., we believe stands almost entirely, if not quite alone, and is out of line with all the authorities upon the subject of which it treats. The validity of provisions similar to those found in this statute upon the subject of paying fees into the county treasury, 24 L. R. A.

has been affirmed by the supreme courts of Tennessee, Iowa, Nebraska, Rhode Island, Arkansas, North Carolina, and Nevada. Harrison v. Willis, 7 Heisk. 185, 19 Am. Rep. 604; State v. Howran, 8 Heisk. 824; Adae v. Zangs, 41 Iowa, 536; Steele v. Central Railroad Co. of Iowa, 48 Iowa, 109; State v. Verwayne, 44 Iowa, 621; State v. Lancaster County Comrs. 4 Neb. 537, 19 Am. Rep. 641; Perce v. Hallett, 13 R. I. 363; Lee County v. Abrahams, 34 Ark. 166; Murphy v. State, 38 Ark. 514; State v. Nutt, 79 N. C. 263; State v. Common Pleas Ct. Judges, 21 Ohio St. 11; State v. Fogus, 19 Nev. 247; State v. Renm, 16 Neb. 681.

It is plain, we think, that the general assembly never designed by this act to levy a tax for general revenue. Its purpose in requiring fees, to be taxed and collected is to create a fund out of which those who perform official services may be paid the salaries fixed by the law. It is a matter of no concern to a litigant whether the sheriff who serves his writs is paid by him direct, or whether he receives his pay through the medium of the county treasurer, provided the amount paid by him is the same in either case. The sheriff's fees taxed to litigants under this law is less than the fees taxed under the Law of 1879, and yet we have a litigant here, seeking to overthrow this law on the ground that the fees taxed under it are a tax on litigation, in order that he may collect the higher fees for his own use. The claim, we think is unreasonable, and without a shadow of equity to support it.

In the case of State v. Common Pleas Ct. Judges, supra, the supreme court of Ohio said: "It is competent for the legislature to provide for compensating all its public officers by salaries. If it should see proper to do so, we know of no provision of the constitution that would forbid exacting from persons requiring, and who are specially benefitted by the performance of official services a reasonable compensation therefor, to be paid into the public treasury, to reimburse the public for the expense incurred in providing and maintaining such offices. It is not essential to such exactions that they should enure to the personal benefit of the officer. The officers are but the agents of the state for transacting the public business, and it is, in its nature, a matter wholly immaterial to those requiring their services whether the amount to be paid therefor goes to the officer or into the public treasury, provided no more is exacted than is just and reasonable for the facilities afforded and the services performed. If the exactions are called taxes, they become none the less such, as to those on whom they are imposed, by being paid to the officer than if paid into the public treasury."

This argument would seem to be unanswerable. Indeed, it may well be doubted as to whether a case has ever arisen, in this country, to which the clause of the constitution under immediate consideration was applicable. It is first found, in substance, in Magna Charta, and was intended as a death blow to the corrupt and disgraceful practices of a corrupt judiciary in demanding oppressive gratuities for giving or withholding decisions in pending causes.

We are clearly of the opinion that the provisions of the statute under consideration are not in conflict with clause 12, article 1, of our State Constitution.

In support of the third and fourth objections to the validity of this enactment, it is contended that it is local and special, because it does not include in its provisions persons who were elected to office prior to the time it took effect. It is said that under its provisions, we have a class of officers in one county receiving fees under one law, while the same class of officers in other counties are receiving salaries for the same class of services under another and different law, and that by reason of this fact the statute is local and special in its operation. We are unable to agree with the appellee in this contention. This statute is not different in legal effect from what it would be did it read: "Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Indiana, that all state and county officers hereafter elected shall receive the following fees and salaries and no other." In other words, it was intended to, and does apply alike to all officers elected after it took effect. We do not think such a statute is in conflict with any provision of our state constitution. If such a law is invalid, then it would be utterly impossible to make a valid statute reducing the salaries of our judicial officers, for it is expressly provided by the constitution that such salaries shall not be reduced during the term of an incumbent. A statute which is of general and uniform operation throughout the state, and operates alike upon all persons under the same circumstances, is not subject to the imputation of being local and special. Gilson v. Rush County Comrs. 128 Ind. 65, 11 L. R. A. 835.

It is further contended by the appellee that this statute is local and special, in that it fails to fix a salary for the auditor, treasurer and recorder of Shelby county. This statute does fix a salary for the clerk and sheriff of every county in the state, including Shelby county, and whether this appellee can be heard to complain that the general assembly failed to fix a salary for the auditor, treasurer and recorder of that county depends upon the preliminary question as to whether the provisions of the statute are so interlocked and so dependent upon each other that the act must stand or fall as a whole, for we will not permit him to litigate a matter in which he has no interest. A party cannot be permitted to harass others and take the time of the courts in litigating matters in which he has no interests, and for this reason, if the provisions of the act under immediate consideration are of such a character as that it can stand as to the appellee, while it might fall as to the auditors, treasurers and recorders, we will not stop to inquire whether it is or is not valid as to the latter.

The principle that a statute may be constitutional and valid in part, and unconstitutional and invalid in part is elementary. The rule is that where a part of a statute is unconstitutional, if such part is so connected with the other parts as that they mutually depend upon each other as conditions, considerations or compensations for each other, so as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and if they could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not have passed the residue independently of that which is void, the whole act is void. On the other hand, where a part of a statute is unconstitutional, if by striking from the act all that part which is void, that which remains is complete in itself, sensible, capable of being executed wholly independent of that which is rejected, and is of such a character as that it may fairly be presumed that the legislature would have passed it independent of that which is in conflict with the constitution, then the courts will reject that which is void, and enforce the remainder. Griffin v. State, 119 Ind. 520; State v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514; State v. Gorby, 122 Ind. 17; State v. Friedley (Ind.) 21 L. R. A. 634.

The argument of the appellee is that this statute embraces but one entire scheme, and for this reason, if any portion of the law is unconstitutional, the scheme fails and the entire act must fall.

We cannot bring our minds to the conviction that the attorney-general of the state, for the purpose of obtaining the larger salary given by former statutes, could defeat this law because it was defective as to the type-writer in the clerk's office of the supreme court. Nor do we think the clerk of the supreme court, for the purpose of retaining the fees taxed in his office, could defeat it because it was defective as to circuit judges. Nor do we think the governor of the state could defeat it because it was defective as to some county officer. There is as little connection between the duty of a county sheriff, as such, and the duty of a county recorder, as there is between the duty of the attorney-general and the type-writer in the clerk's office, and his duties are as distinct from those of the county treasurer as the duties of the clerk of the supreme court are from that of a circuit judge. In fact there is no connection whatever, so far as his official duties are concerned, between a county sheriff and a county auditor, treasurer or recorder. This statute as to county sheriffs is complete within itself, and capable of being executed independent of its provisions relating to county auditors, treasurers, and recorders.

In arriving at a conclusion as to whether the legislature would probably have passed the act independent of the provisions relating to auditors, treasurers and recorders, it is not unimportant to consider the evils which the law was intended to remedy. It is a matter of common notoriety, of which the courts take notice, that for many years prior to this enactment, there was a bitter complaint against the practice of taxing what is known as constructive fees. Penal statutes had been passed, as well as statutes inflicting forfeitures, but it was found, on actual experience, that they did not eradicate the evil. The sum illegally demanded and collected in the way of constructive fees was large in the aggregate, but the amount taxed against each individual litigant was so small that it was cheaper to pay than to contest it. This complaint was wholly directed against the clerks and sheriffs of the state, and had no connection whatever with the office of auditor, treasurer, or recorder. It was the purpose of the legislature in enacting this statute to strike an effective blow at the practice of taxing illegal and constructive fees by placing the officers who had previously taxed them upon a salary, depriving them of all fees and thus removing the temptation to wrong-doing in that direction. In view of the evil to be cured and the manifest purpose of the general assembly, we think it not at all improbable that it would have passed this statute independent of its provisions relating to auditors, treasurers, and recorders. Having reached this conclusion, the rule that we will not decide a constitutional question when not necessary to a decision of the cause upon its merits, applies, and we will not, therefore inquire as to whether the statute is or is not valid as to county auditors, treasurers, and recorders.

The title of the act is broad enough to include county sheriffs. The legislature has declared in the act, as we have seen, that the salaries of county officers in the several counties of the state are graded according to the population and the necessary services to be performed. In view of this declaration, we must assume that it had before it all the necessary information to enable it to fix such salaries upon a just and equitable basis, with a view of giving to each officer therein named a reasonable compensation for the services performed. To say that the law in this respect is perfect would perhaps be saying too much, but if there are hardships and inequalities in the law, the remedy is with the legislature, and not with the courts.

We are of the opinion that this statute, so far as it relates to county sheriffs, is not subject to the constitutional objections urged against it, and that it is as to them a valid law.

It follows from this that the circuit court erred in overruling the appellant's demurrer to the complaint in this cause.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the circuit court to sustain the appellant's demurrer to the complaint.

McCabe, J., dissenting:

I heartily concur in the foregoing opinion in so far as it holds the act not unconstitutional because of there being a plurality of subjects of legislation embraced therein. I also concur in the prevailing opinion as to the duty of the courts to resolve doubts as to the constitutionality of a statute in favor of its constitutionality, because of the extraordinary power exerted in overthrowing the deliberate act of a co-ordinate branch of the state government. But in the balance of the opinion I cannot concur. When there is no doubt as to the unconstitutionality of an act, as in my opinion is the case here, then the highest and most sacred duty that ever devolved on a tribunal or court calls loudly on the court to uphold the constitution and let the statute go down. Statutes, though entitled to implicit obedience when valid, are temporary and can be remodeled every two years. But constitutions are supreme and permanent. They are not so ephemeral as statutes. Our state is now seventy-eight years old, and yet during that whole time we have made but one new constitution. One of the most formidable objections urged against the constitutionality of the act is the provision in section 186, by which it is provided that, "whenever any clerk, auditor, recorder, treasurer or sheriff has been elected by the people of this county before the taking effect of this act, such officer so elected during the time that he holds such term shall not be subject to the provisions of this act. He shall hold such term of office and perform the duties thereof and receive the compensation prescribed by the law, the same as if this act had not passed." Section 20 makes the same provision as to state officers. It is claimed that this makes the act both special and local, in violation of sections 22 and 23, of article 4 of the Constitution. So much of said sections as is applicable reads as follows:

"22. The general assembly shall not pass any local or special law in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: then follows seventeen subjects enumerated, among which is the following: "In relation to fees and salaries, except that the law may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and the necessary services required." The words italicised were added to the section by the amendment to the Constitution March 14, 1881.

"Sec. 23. In all cases enumerated in the preceding section, and in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state."

It is contended that the act is local, because it only operates in those counties where the several officers named have been elected since the passage of the act, and in those counties where a part only of those officers have been elected since the passage of the act, it only partially operates in such counties. An act may be special that is not local, within the meaning of this provision of the constitution, that is, special as it applies only to a part of certain things, all of which would be included if it were made general, or to a part of the people, all of whom would fall within its purview if it were made general. Mitchell v. McCorkle, 69 Ind. 184.

Where a statute applies to and operates only in a certain locality in the state, it may then be said to be both special and local. Local because it is confined in its operation to a certain locality, and special both because it is confined in its operation to that locality, and to the people of that locality. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 127.

On the seventeen subjects named in section 22, above quoted, before the amendment of March 14, 1881, the enactment of both special and local statutes was forbidden. Section 23 forbids such legislation as to all other subjects, "where a general law can be made applicable," all of which general laws it required to be of uniform operation throughout the state. It is not even claimed by the learned counsel for the appellant that section 23 has been so changed by the amendment of March 14, 1881, as to authorize the enactment of the special provision exempting from its operation all officers elected prior to the taking effect of the act, but it is contended that the act is not made special by that provision, but that its operation remains general and uniform throughout the state, notwithstanding such provision. Special and local laws upon the subject of fees and salaries are still forbidden under this provision of the constitution, with the one exception, namely, that the laws "may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and the necessary services required."

The provision that all officers elected before the taking effect of the act shall not be subject to its provisions, has nothing whatever to do with "grading the compensation of officers in proportion to population and necessary services required." Nor are these provisions either in aid of, incident to, or necessary for the accomplishment of such gradation. It could have been accomplished as well, and even better without such a provision. Had the act been made local and even special, necessarily in accomplishing the constitutional permit "to grade compensation of officers in proportion to population and necessary services required," a very different question would have been presented. The question then is, Does this provision make the whole act special and not of uniform operation throughout the state within the meaning of the two sections of the constitution referred to? It may be readily conceded that the legislature in passing a new law to take the place of an old one, often has and may provide for special cases falling close to the line where the old law goes out and the new comes into force, to the effect, that such cases are to be governed by the old law, even after the new law takes effect. The power to so legislate arises out of necessity, because without such power some cases would have no law to govern them. This court has held that "the legislative authority of this state is the right to exercise supreme and sovereign power subject to no restrictions except those imposed by our own constitution, by the Federal Constitution, and by the laws and treaties made under it." Beauchamp v. State, 6 Blackf. 299; McComas v. Krug, 81 Ind. 830, 42 Am. Rep. 135; Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 478; Mount v. State, 90 Ind. 29, 46 Am. Rep. 192; Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768.

This broad and sweeping power to legislate by necessary implication carries with it the power to legislate so as to provide for every conceivable case, and so that no case will be without a law to govern it. But there was no such necessity in this act. It would have been so framed that all officers would have been subject to its provisions whether elected before or after it took effect, and so that all people who are liable to pay costs and fees to such officers under its provisions would have been alike entitled to its benefits, or, on the other hand, if not beneficial, that all alike would have been subject to its burdens. So that we conclude that in order to conform to the sections of the constitution referred to in respect to the objection under consideration, the act must be general and of uniform operation throughout the state. This leads us to inquire what is a general law? And when is a law of general and uniform operation throughout the state? The attempt to define such a law was made by this court in Grosch v. State, 42 Ind. 547, where it is said: "It cannot be held that the framers of the constitution intended that the operation of laws throughout the state should be uniform in any other sense than that their operation should be the same in all parts of the state under the same circumstances and conditions."

And in Hanlon v. Floyd County Comrs. 53 Ind. 126, the definition is, that a statute is general when "it operates uniformly and alike in all parts of the state, under like facts." The same definition was repeated and adopted in State v. Reitz, 62 Ind. 159, and in Gilson v. Rush County Comrs. 128 Ind. 69, 11 L. R. A. 835, a general statute was defined to be one that "operates alike upon all persons under the same circumstances." These cases are confidently relied on by the learned counsel for the appellant as a complete refutation of the charge that the Act of 1891 is special, because they say it operates throughout the state, on all persons, under the same circumstances and under like facts. It must be confessed that the act does operate throughout the state upon all persons under the same circumstances, and under like facts. This leads us to inquire whether or not the foregoing definitions of what it takes to constitute a general statute of uniform operation throughout the state are not too narrow for all cases. They were broad enough, and strictly correct as applied to the cases in which they were used. But it is manifest that there may be cases in which such definitions would be entirely too narrow. For instance, suppose, instead of the provisions that officers elected prior to the taking effect of the act should not be subject to its provisions, it had provided that officers less than five feet high, or officers with blue eyes, officers of a designated political faith or party, or officers of a certain religious denomination, or officers of a certain nativity, should not be subject to its provisions. It is believed that no one would be bold enough to assert that such a law would be general and of uniform operation throughout the state, and that all must admit that it would be special within the meaning of the constitution. And yet if the foregoing definitions are to be accepted as broad enough to cover all cases, such a law must be held to be no infringement of the sections of the constitution referred to. The courts of last resort in other states have encountered the same difficulty that this court has in attempting to define what it takes to constitute a general statute of uniform operation throughout the state. In State v. Wood, 49 N. J. L. at p. 88, it is said: "Such a law must embrace all and exclude none whose condition and wants render such legislation equally necessary or appropriate to them as a class."

In People v. Cooper, 88 Ill. 585, it is said: "A law is not 'general' in any correct sense of the term, but is 'special' where it is suspended in one locality where there exists a proper subject-matter on which to operate, but remains in full force and vigor in another locality of exactly the same kind."

Mr. Freeman, in a note to State v. Ellet, 47 Ohio St. 90, 21 Am. St. Rep. 772, states the law thus: "Any legislation which is arbitrary, which deals with particular persons or things of a class, or which confers privileges or burdens on towns or cities while other cities or towns in like situation are excepted from its operation, is special and void."

In Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 552, 36 Am. Rep. 47, it is said: "A general law must include within its sanction all who come within its purpose and scope. It must be as broad as its object."

Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 127, says: "Special laws are those made for individual cases, or for less than a class requiring laws appropriate to its peculiar condition and circumstances. Local laws are special as to place. When prohibited, they are severally objectionable for not extending to the whole subject to which their provisions would be equally applicable, and thus permitting a diversity of laws relating to the same subject. The object of the prohibition of special or local laws is to prevent this diversity. Each subject as to which such laws are prohibited is by such inhibition designated as a subject of only general legislation, which shall have a uniform operation. Generality in scope and uniformity of operation are both essential. A law which embraces a whole subject would still be special, if not framed to have a uniform operation."

It will be observed from these quotations, that the task of adequately and satisfactorily defining what is meant by the term "general laws of uniform operation throughout the state" is a difficult one. It may be that no general definition can be devised that will suffice in all possible cases, and that each particular case as it may arise in the future may add to the material out of which a satisfactory and sufficient definition may be constructed. This case furnishes the means of adding something to the definition hitherto given by this court, correct enough so far as it went, and as applicable to those cases. A statute cannot be rendered general and of uniform operation throughout the state within the meaning of the constitution by an arbitrary act of the legislature in fixing a certain set of circumstances and facts under which all persons must come or be found, before the statute can operate upon them, if those facts and circumstances are such as to deprive those not coming or found under such circumstances of their equal rights as between man and man, or citizen and citizen. And the same would be true if the facts and circumstances arbitrarily fixed deprived those found or coming under such circumstances, and upon whom alone the law is to operate, of their equal rights possessed by them in common with those upon whom the law is not to operate. The equal rights of all before the law is a principle inherent in the genius of our government, and the maintenance of that principle is amply secured by the various sections of article 1 of our State Constitution, commonly called the Bill of Rights.

If the Act of 1891 is an improvement of the condition of the officers upon whom it operates, if it is more beneficial than the old law, then there is no principle of right, justice or equality of rights between men that can justify the provision that these officers, both state and county, who were elected before the taking effect of the act, shall not be subject to, and entitled to the benefits of its provisions, while those elected since are entitled to such benefits, and likewise, if its provisions are beneficial to the numerous persons who are to pay costs and fees, there can be no justification on the principle of equality of rights, in depriving them of the benefits of the act which it does, simply because the officers to whom they are to pay such fees and costs happened to be elected before the taking effect of the act, while all those officers who are elected since the taking effect, and all those persons who are to pay to them fees and costs specified in it are to enjoy its benefits and advantages simply because such officers happened to be elected since the taking effect thereof, while the officers elected prior to the taking effect of the act, and those who are to pay them their fees and costs are bearing the burdens heaped upon them by the old law. On the other hand, if the new law is less beneficial and more burdensome to the officers and those who are to pay them the costs and fees provided for, there can be no justification on the principle of equality of rights in compelling them to bear the increased burdens and disadvantages of the new law simply because such officers happen to be elected since the taking effect of the act, while those officers elected prior to the taking effect of the act, and all those who are to pay them the fees and costs, are bearing the lighter burdens and enjoying the superior advantages of the old law. This court must take judicial knowledge of the fact that many of the clerks, auditors and recorders had been elected to four year terms prior to the taking effect of the act, and which terms did not begin until long after it took effect. Thus very many four years terms began and will end after the new law was to take effect, and consequently, if the law is upheld, there will scarcely be a county in the state where one and the same law will prevail regulating fees and costs. In nearly every county, some of the officers and some of the persons who pay costs and fees will be governed by one law, and other officers and those who pay costs and fees to them will be governed by another law. I do not mean to assert that the legislature has no power to pass a local or special law. On the contrary, our cases abundantly establish that on any subject other than the seventeen mentioned in section 22, article 4, of the Constitution, the legislature may pass a special or local law, if a general law cannot be made applicable. But the act here in question falls within the category of one of the seventeen subjects where a special law is absolutely prohibited, unless it be in the gradation of the compensation of officers in proportion to population and necessary services required. As we have already seen, the provision in question has no reference to or effect upon such gradation.

Appellee's counsel make copious quotations from the case of People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, in support of their contention that the Act of 1891 is not special. The legislature of that state had created a police court for the city of Oakland, with a schedule of fees payable to the city. Afterwards, a general act was passed, providing that the police powers of every city having over thirty and under one hundred thousand inhabitants should be vested in a police court, to be held therein by the city justices to be designated by the mayor. Exclusive jurisdiction was given to these courts over certain offenses. The act then provided as follows: "The act to go into effect upon the expiration of the term of office of the present police judge of said cities, or when a vacancy occurs therein."

It is hardly necessary to say that the case is not very strongly in point because it only applied to one officer in each municipal government, so that perfect uniformity of operation of the law as to everybody and everything within each municipal government was strictly preserved. A citizen or office holder of one of such municipalities has no right to complain because the term of the police judge in another municipality expired before that of the police judge in his own municipality expired, thereby bringing the new law into effect in his neighboring municipality before it did in his own. This would afford him no more ground for complaining that such law was not of general and uniform operation then would the fact that the rate of taxation in his own municipality for municipal and local purposes is much higher than in his neighboring municipality.

Other reasons might be suggested why that case is not in point. But the supreme court of California has decided a case that is exactly in point here. The legislature of that state having passed a fee and salary law, afterwards passed an act making important and extensive amendments thereto. The following provisions were added to the amended law:

"Sec. 3. The salaries herein provided shall not take effect nor be in force until the expiration of terms of the present officers, except as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 4. The salaries herein provided for the officers of the tenth, thirty-fifth and forty-sixth classes shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of the first month next succeeding its passage."

The court said: "By these sections, the operation of the law upon the subject of the compensation of officers in the fifty-two counties of the state, except the counties of three classes, is suspended until the expiration of the terms of the then incumbents in office, and is put in force almost immediately upon officers of the three specified classes."

Unquestionably, the legislature has power to suspend the operation of the general laws of the state. 'But when it does so,' says Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, page 391, 'the suspension must be general, and cannot be made in individual cases, or for particular localities.' A law speaks from the time it goes into effect. People v. Johnston, 6 Cal. 673. In forty-five of the forty-eight classes into which the fifty-two counties of the state have been divided, the Statutes of 1885 do not speak at all. They speak only in counties of three classes. In other words, after classifying the counties of the state and regulating the compensation of the county officers therein, the laws by which the classification and regulation are accomplished are declared inapplicable during the terms of officers of forty-five of the forty-eight classes, and applicable during the terms of office of three classes only: the operation of the law is therefore exceptional and eccentric, and is causative of discrimination between the officers upon whom it is to operate. It in effect declares that the law shall not operate upon the large majority of county officers in the counties of the state, but shall operate upon the officers of three or four counties only. The very few are thereby excluded from the privileges accorded to the many. This the legislature could not do. The constitution requires that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation. Sec. 11, art. 1. Where particular persons are excepted from the operation of a general law, it destroys the uniformity of its operation. Omnibus R. Co. v. Baultein, 57 Cal. 165. So it is said in French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 544: "The legislature cannot discriminate or grant an indulgence to one which is not accorded to another. Every general law must have a uniform operation, that is to say, it must operate equally upon all persons and upon all things upon which it acts at all."

It will not do to say that the holding of the act in question special, and therefore unconstitutional, for the reasons stated, would result in declaring it constitutionally impossible for the legislature to reduce the salaries of the judges of the supreme and circuit courts. The true and only reason why a legislative act reducing the salaries of the supreme and circuit judges must and can only be made to apply to those elected or appointed after the taking effect of such an act, is that section 18 of article 7 of the Constitution forbids their salaries from being reduced while they are in office. Therefore, an act making such reduction to apply only to such judges as were elected or appointed after the taking effect of such act would not be special within the principles I have laid down, because it would operate upon every one of the class to which it refers, on whom it would be constitutionally possible for it to operate. No such principle applies to county and State officials. I cannot entertain a shadow of a doubt that the act is general in its nature, and that it is made special within the meaning of the constitution by sections 20 and 186. I think it is also in conflict with section 12 of article 1 of the Constitution, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 57. That section requires-justice to be "administered freely and without purchase." And this leads me to inquire what was the intention of the framers of the amendment of March 14, 1881, to section 22 of article 4 of the Constitution as to the nature and kind of legislation on the subject of fees and salaries and compensation of officers, they and the people had in mind in adopting it. They must have intended to so change that section of the Constitution as to permit such legislation as the section inhibited as it stood before. That section did not forbid legislation before, requiring officers to pay into the county or state treasury fees and costs collected for services rendered by them, and the amendment is utterly silent upon that subject. Therefore, no purpose or intention to authorize legislation requiring such payment into the treasury can be gathered from the section as amended. At the time of the adoption of the amendment, decision of this court had been standing for seven years, and it still stands undisturbed, to the effect that a fee and salary law requiring officers to pay into the public treasury fees and costs collected by them for services rendered, was and is unconstitutional, because a violation of said section 12 of article 1 requiring justice to be administered freely and without purchase. Fulk v. Monroe County Comrs. 46 Ind. 150; Wallace v. Marion County Comrs. 37 Ind. 888.

If it had been the intention of the framers of the amendment to authorize or permit a fee and salary law, or a law providing compensation for officers, to require them to pay costs and fees collected, for services rendered by them, into the public treasury, they would undoubtedly have framed an amendment to said section 12. Because we must presume that the framers of the amendment know that this Court had long since decided that that section was an insurmountable obstacle in the way of such legislation, and that such a system for the compensation of officers could not be authorized by statute. I am therefore of opinion that it was not within the contemplation or intention of the framers of the amendment of March 14, 1881, to so change the constitution as to permit legislation providing for the compensation of public officers so as to require them to pay into the public treasury costs and fees for services by them collected, and that therefore the Act of 1891, in its that respect in violation of the constitution and void. But it seems to me that the purpose and manifest intention of the framers of the amendment was to so change the section amended as to permit the enactment of a statute upon the subject that the section before forbid; so, as it now stands, no local or special law can be enacted "in relation to fees and salaries; except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and necessary services required." That is, if it is necessary, in order to so grade the compensation that act may be made both special and local in the accomplishment of that object, and not otherwise. We take judicial notice that one important factor that gave rise to the amendment was the fact that according to the ordinary schedules of fees and costs which would produce no more in a county of small population than a reasonable compensation for its officers, would in counties of the largest population produce large fortunes to the officer in a single term. Now, it was to obviate this evil that the amendment was adopted. The design was to authorize such legislation as would prevent such officers from drawing from those who unfortunately are liable to pay their costs and fees, a greater amount than will make a reasonable compensation for such service when the whole official service for a year or a term is considered together. This has always been the guide in fixing the rate of fees and costs, namely, what rate will raise a sufficient sum at the end of a given period to adequately compensate the officer for his service and his time. When the constitution was adopted, no large centers of population existed in the state, and the population of each county was sparse compared with what it was at the end of thirty years thereafter, when the amendment of 1881, was adopted. The increase of business has more than kept pace with the increase of population, thereby rendering any fixed schedule of fees for all the counties alike, as was required before the amendment, wholly unjust; that is, if it should be fixed low enough to make only a reasonable compensation for time and service of the officers in the more populous counties, it would not yield enough to compensate the officers in the counties of smaller population. And on the other hand, to fix the schedule high enough to yield a sum sufficient to adequately compensate the officers of counties of smaller population for their time and service, it would yield a sum sufficient in the counties where centers of population existed, to make fortunes in a single term for some of their officers. The necessity for legislative power to regulate the compensation according to population and service was at once seen, and hence the amendment was suggested and adopted. Before the amendment, the rate to be fixed in the schedules must necessarily be the same in every county, because to fix a different rate for different counties would make the act so doing both special and local, in direct contravention of the section before its amendment. Before amendment, it read thus: "22. The general assembly shall pass no local or special law in the following enumerated cases: . . . that is to say: . . . In relation to fees or salaries." Since the amendment, it reads thus: "22. The general assembly shall pass no local or special laws in the following enumerated cases: . . . that is to say: . . . In relation to fees or salaries, except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and necessary services required." All will agree that it was the manifest purpose and intention of the amendment to so change the section as to permit legislation of a character in relation to fees and salaries that the section before forbid, else there would have been no reason for making the amendment. There can be no gradation of compensation of state officers in proportion to population, and therefore the amendment had reference to county officers alone. Their compensation can be graded both in proportion to the population and services required. The scheme of the Act of 1891 is to accomplish such gradation by placing all county officers on salaries varying in amount in proportion to population and necessary services required. This is conceded by appellee's counsel. And as a part of that scheme, a schedule of fees and costs is fixed for official services which litigants and persons liable are required to pay, and all of which is to be paid after collection by the officers into the county treasury. Now that part of the Act of 1891 which places county officers on salaries in proportion to population and services required, was not certainly within the purpose of the amendment of the Constitution already referred to, because this court had expressly decided in Hanlon v. Floyd County Comrs. 53 Ind. 128, that such a gradation of compensation of county officers was not a violation of the section of the constitution in question before its amendment. That case had stood as the declared law unquestioned for fifteen years when the amendment was adopted, and still so stands. The framers of the amendment must be presumed to have known what the law was, as every body is presumed to know what the law is. They knew that no amendment of the constitution was required to authorize the legislature to make such a gradation of compensation to county officers. They therefore must have had in contemplation some other method of gradation than that embodied in the Act of 1891, or that of 1875, held valid in the case above referred to, the gradation in both Acts being alike so far as the question here involved is concerned.

Another reason why the method of gradation and compensation adopted in the Act of 1891 was not designed by the framers of the amendment is found in the fact that such method is a violation of the section as amended. What is it that the section as amended requires to be graded in proportion to population? The section as amended almost answers the question itself. Local or special laws are prohibited by it, "in relation to fees or salaries, except that the laws may be so made as to grade the compensation of officers in proportion to the population and necessary services required." Manifestly, fees are to be graded as well as salaries. Graded how? Why, in proportion to population and necessary services required. What does that mean? It means, as all candid minds must admit, that the amount of the fee to be fixed in the statute for a designated official service, shall bear some relation to the work of the service, and also to the size of the population in the county. It means that both of these matters must be taken into consideration in fixing the size or amount of the fee in the statute for each item of official service. It can mean nothing else, because there is nothing else to which the words can be applied. In a county containing a great center of population, a lower fee ought to be fixed than in a county of small population, and yet the necessarily increased service on account of increased population must not be ignored, and must be taken into consideration also in fixing the amount of fees. In other words, the intention was to require the fees to be fixed at such amount as would be a fair compensation for the service to be performed, taking into consideration these two elements. But the method adopted in the Act of 1891 is utterly contrary to this intention. The same fees are fixed by it for a county of the largest population, that are fixed for a county of the smallest population. No matter what the service required, no matter what the population, the fees are the same throughout the state, just as was required by the section before its amendment. There is no gradation of fees according to population and necessary services required, and therefore the act violates the manifest purpose and intent of the section as amended. But that is not all. The fees are made the property of the county and a source of public revenue, and enure to the benefit, not of the class who were the sufferers by the old system, but enure to the benefit of the public, who did not suffer under the old system. The evils complained of under the only system allowed before the amendment, and which gave rise to the amendment, were that those who had to pay costs and fees were compelled to pay too much, more than the service was worth, so that a single official term, in some instances, would make a fortune for the officer. In determining what meaning words in a constitutional provision were intended to have, it is proper to consider the circumstances under which the provision was adopted and its purpose. Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 416. The act, instead of supplying a remedy for the relief of the only sufferers from the evils complained of, which was the manifest design of the amendment, leaves those evils practically untouched so far as those sufferers are concerned, and turns the stream of unearned wealth unjustly taken from them without value received, into the public treasury, as a source of public revenue. Instead of relieving the unfortunate who have the costs and fees to pay, by reducing them down to the actual value of the service, considering population with necessary service, they are placed at such a rate, regardless of service and population as will yield a public revenue beyond the amount necessary to pay the officers' salary. Multitudinous ways have hitherto been devised in governments among men for raising revenue. The incomes of the rich and the luxuries of the wealthy, and those who succeed to property by inheritance or devise, have all been taxed in various ways to raise public revenue, but it has been reserved to the nineteenth century to lay tribute upon men's losses and misfortunes to raise public revenue out of costs of litigation, and that too, under a constitution requiring justice to be administered freely and without purchase. Clearly, the method of regulating fees adopted in the Act of 1891, was not intended and not contemplated in the amendment to the Constitution of March 14, 1881. There is only one other method the framers of that amendment could have contemplated, and that is to classify the counties according to population and necessary services required, and fix a separate and different schedule and rate of fees for each class. Such a method could not have been adopted before the amendment, but is in perfect harmony with it, and accords with all the circumstances leading up to its adoption. But it may be suggested that the method designed in the amendment is only permissive, and not mandatory or compulsory on the legislature; that the old method of fixing a schedule or rate of fees uniform throughout the state is not inhibited by the section as amended. That may be conceded, and yet if the fees are not "graded in proportion to population and necessary services required," then there is nothing in the act to take it out of the operation of the inhibition in the section as amended, against the enactment of a special law in relation to fees and salaries; and we have seen the act is special, and not of general and uniform operation throughout the state. As before remarked, the amended section permits a law in relation to fees and salaries to be both local and special, when that is necessary in order to grade fees and salaries in proportion to population and necessary services, and in no other case. Therefore, as the local and special feature of the act is not in aid of a gradation of fees according to population and service required, the only case in which such special and local features is allowed, and outside of which it is forbidden, the act is clearly in conflict with the constitution in that respect.

I think the act is unconstitutional in another respect. It provides a schedule of fees to be taxed by all county officers in the state and make such fees when taxed the property of the county in which they are taxed. It provides a salary for every county officer in the state, except in Shelby county, where it provides no salary or compensation for the treasurer, auditor or recorder. As we have seen, that makes the act both local and special, and it is not done in aid of, or as incident to a gradation of fees nor salaries.

In speaking of a similar act, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "It was not then a general act. It did apply to a great number of counties, but there is a dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be either one or the other. If it apply to the whole state, it is general. If to a part, it is local. As a legal principle, it is as effectually local when it applies to sixty-five counties out of sixty-seven as if it applied to one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the act makes it local." Montgomery v. Com. 91 Pa. 125; Devine v. Cook County Comrs. 84 Ill. 590; McCarthy v. Com. 110 Pa. 248.

Another act applicable to one county was held local. Com. v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 840; Weinman v. Wilkinsburg & E. L. Pass. R. Co. 118 Pa. 192; Sutherland, Stat. Constr., § 127, supra, and §§ 128, 129.

Nor can I agree with the prevailing opinion that conceding this constitutional objection well taken, that it only nullifies a part of the act, and that the other part can stand. That is, I understand the prevailing opinion to hold that at most, the objection could only vitiate so much of the act as relates to auditors, treasurers and recorders, and as the appellee here is a sheriff, and not an auditor, treasurer, or recorder, it does not vitiate as to sheriffs and clerks, and therefore that appellee has no interest in the question, etc. It is true that a part of a statute may be unconstitutional and another part constitutional, and when the part constitutional does not depend upon the unconstitutional part, and is capable of being enforced and operative without the aid of the unconstitutional part, then the unconstitutional part may be stricken down and the other part upheld and enforced. But that only can be done when the part upheld is not rendered local or special, or otherwise conflicting with the constitution by striking down the other part. State v. Blend, 121 Ind. 154, and authorities there cited.

If, by striking down an unconstitutional part of a statute, the remaining part is thereby brought into conflict with the constitution, such part cannot be upheld simply because such part is not inimical to the constitution while the whole stands together. Therefore, if it be conceded that by leaving out treasurer, auditor, and recorder of Shelby county, the act is unconstitutional as to the three offices named, all over the state, the part of the act relating to clerk and sheriff is not relieved from the charge of being special by striking down that relating to the other three offices, but is thereby made more special than before. There is no escape from this unless we assert successfully that the fees and salaries of clerks and sheriffs belong to one subject of legislation, and that those of auditor, treasurer and recorder belong to another and entirely different subject. To successfully maintain that proposition would be to render the whole act void for conflicting with another provision of the constitution. To hold that the act may be upheld as to sheriff and clerk, and stricken down as to auditor, treasurer and recorder is to hold that clerks and sheriffs, as to fees and salaries, may be governed by the Law of 1891, and auditors, treasurers, and recorders may be governed by the Law of 1879, or no law at all. It is to assert that clerks and sheriffs shall not own the fees they tax for their services, and that such fees shall belong to the county, but that they shall be compensated by a salary while auditors, treasurers, and recorders shall own the fees they are authorized to tax, and shall receive them in compensation for their services. If this does not make the act special within the meaning of the constitution, then all the authorities I have quoted on that point are at fault. To say that appellee's relator, Stout, is not interested, because the defect in the law as to Shelby county does not affect sheriffs, and the defect as to being special in not applying to those elected prior, as he was elected sheriff since it took effect, seems to me wholly without foundation in reason or authority. He presented a claim to the auditor of state, every dollar of which, amounting to over two hundred dollars, he was entitled to receive in the form in which he presented the claim to the auditor, if the Act of 1891 is unconstitutional and void, and not a cent of which is he entitled to receive if the act is valid, besides, if the act is valid, he must pay the costs of this litigation, amounting probably to one hundred dollars more, none of which would he have to pay if the act is invalid. If he can secure a decision that the act is unconstitutional, he gains three hundred dollars; if not, he loses it. It seems to me that makes him so much interested that he is not a mere volunteer. This brings him within the requirement of the law to enable him to raise the question of the constitutionality of the act. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 196, 197; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 676.

In People v. Purdy, 2 Hill, 86, it was said by Bronson, J.: "Written constitutions will soon become of little value if their injunctions may be lightly overlooked, and the experiment of setting a boundary to power will prove a failure." Again, in the same case, in the court of errors, Purdy v. People, 4 Hill, 898, it was said: "If courts venture to substitute for the clear language of the instrument their own notions of what it should have been, or was intended to be, there will be an end of written constitutions. In construing the language of the constitution, courts have nothing to do with the argument from inconvenience." "Their sole duty is to declare, ita lex scripta est," thus saith the constitution. People v. Morrell, 21 Wend. 584.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

NOTE.—As to the liability of a master for assaults committed by his servant, see note to Davis v. Houghtelin (Neb.) 14 L. R. A. 737.

Messrs. Elliot & Elliot, for appellants:

If the board of police commissioners had seen fit to appoint another person than Kiley as the special policeman for appellant's theatre they would have been bound to have taken the man selected, and it would be contrary to the best settled rules of jurisprudence to compel a party to answer for the acts of one chosen to fill the place of peace officer by state or municipal authority. This doctrine is declared in the numerous cases which hold that the municipal corporation is not liable for officers acting in its behalf but not chosen by it. It is a matter of common knowledge that special policemen, ordinarily called merchant policeman, are appointed by the police commissioners in cities; that they are paid by business men and private citizens and act as watchmen and policemen with reference to particular and private property, both residence and business. It certainly would not be contended that if one of these officers in making an arrest wrongfully assaulted the person and used excessive force, that the citizen would be liable for any excess of force that the officer might use in making such arrest; still, such would be an analogous case to the one at bar.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 974, 975; Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 180, 44 Am. Rep. 1; Lafayette v. Timberlake, 88 Ind. 880.

If the city cannot be held responsible for the wrongful acts of its police officers acting within the scope of their duty as such officers, how can it be held that a private citizen shall be held liable for the acts of a police officer in the performance of his duty, or while acting as such officer within the scope of his official duty, when he has, like the city, no power to appoint or discharge, and no control over the acts of the officer?

Messrs. Miller, Winter & Elam, Elliott & Elliott, Pierce Norton and Hawkins & Smith, in support of petition for rehearing:

A private citizen cannot make a public officer his agent as to any act within the general scope of the officer's duty.

Kiley, the policeman, was an officer appointed according to law, owing his place solely to the appointing power and exclusively under the control of that power.

Where a public officer acts within the scope of his duty he cannot be the agent of a citizen, hence the doctrine of respondent superior cannot apply.

If the appellants instructed Kiley, the policeman, to assault Waldron, the appellee, they may, if the assault was unlawful, be charged as wrongdoers but they cannot be held liable upon the general ground that Kiley was their agent.

Where there is an unlawful act all who wrongfully unite in it are liable as joint wrongdoers, but not otherwise.

Sagers v. Nuckolls, 8 Colo. App. 95.

The theory upon which the case was tried is that the policeman was the agent of the appellants, and as that theory is unsound, the judgment must be reversed.

Meers, Otto Gresham, Joseph B. Kealing, and Martin M. Hugg for appellee:

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 1, 1887, and at the time of the bringing of this suit, appellants were the lessees and managers of the Park Theater, in the city of Indianapolis. At the entrance to the theater, about three feet from the sidewalk, a flight of stairs ran up to a landing at the rear of which was the box office for the sale of tickets. At either side of the landing a flight of stairs led up to the east and west entrance doors to the theater. At the top of the first flight of stairs, at the edge of the landing, gates were placed, four feet high, to keep the crowd back. Between these gates was an opening where the chief officer of the theater, named Klingensmith, an employé of appellants, stood while the crowd was coming up, after which the gates were opened and this officer went to keep order in the gallery.

Appellants also managed and controlled other theaters in Indianapolis and elsewhere, and in their absence John Dickson, brother of the appellant, George A. Dickson, was the general manager of Park Theater, acting for appellants. He also assisted in selling tickets.

John M. Kiley was the head janitor of the theater, and lived with his family in the theater building. He was also door keeper and stood at the west door, but could leave in case of emergency. At the request of appellants, he was granted special police powers by the metropolitan board of police of the city of Indianapolis, such powers to be exercised at the Park Theater. He received his pay from appellants. He had been in the employment of appellants at the theater before receiving his police powers, and his pay was not increased after receiving such powers. Appellants requested his appointment at the suggestion of the chief police officer, Klingensmith, for the purpose of assisting him in preserving order in the theater. He was not relieved of any of his duties in the theater after being appointed special policeman. His instructions from appellants were not to make any arrests, except to assist Klingensmith, unless otherwise ordered by appellants, or by John Dickson. In Klingensmith's absence, Kiley acted for him. Joseph Gordon was treasurer and ticket-seller for the theater.

On the evening of October 1, 1887, Joseph Gordon was in the box office selling tickets. John Dickson was also in the box office assisting in the sale of tickets. On that evening, appellee, who was a conductor on the I. D. & W. Railroad, came, with four friends, to attend an entertainment at the theater. Appellee testifies that he went up stairs to the ticket office for a ten-cent ticket; that he gave the ticket-seller, Joseph Gordon, a silver dollar, and received from him his ticket and only seventy cents in change, and that another of the party, named Doran, also had some misunderstanding as to the purchase of his ticket. The testimony of appellee then proceeds: "I do not remember just exactly whether Doran had purchased his ticket before me or after I did. He wanted a ticket to go up stairs too, and they gave him a ticket to go down stairs, and I says to the ticket-seller like this, I said: 'Here is five of us in a party and want to go together; you have made a mistake in our tickets.' He said: 'What is the matter with you? Get away from that window and give others a chance.' I said: 'I am not going until I get my right change. You have made a mistake in my change, too,' and held out my hand. I had not taken my hand down from the shelf in front of the window and he reached through the window and grabbed my change and ticket and slapped me in the face at the same time and said: 'Damm you, get away from that window,' and reached for my brakeman and grabbed his ticket and said, 'Police' or 'Johnny.' I do not know which, 'Police' or 'Johnny,' arrest that man for a vag.' A man named Kiley there, a private policeman for the theater company, stepped up at the side of me or behind me and knocked me down." He testifies that the first blow was on the left forehead, which knocked him partly down on his left elbow; that when he attempted to rise Kiley struck him again; that altogether, he was struck six times on the head, three times on the left shoulder, and twice on the left forearm; that during this time Kiley said nothing to him, but that he asked Kiley what he was beating him for, "and I said if he had anything to arrest me for to arrest me, and for God's sake not to beat my brains out." That somebody then interfered and Kiley for the time withdrew, and then Gordon came out of the ticket office and grabbed appellee about the neck with his left arm and began pounding him in the face with his fist, then knocked him down and kicked him two or three times; that Kiley then arrested him and sent him to the police station.

The testimony of appellant's witnesses as to the transaction differs in almost all the details from that given by appellee, but not in the main facts; that is, the beating of appellee in front of the ticket office by Gordon and Kiley; that the quarrel resulted from disputes as to the purchase of tickets; that both assaults were made upon appellee before his arrest by Kiley, and that appellee did not strike either of his assailants.

The testimony of Joseph Gordon and John Kiley shows their treatment of appellee to have been most brutal. Gordon testifies that he and John Dickson were in the ticket office when appellee came up and threw down a silver dollar and asked for a ticket, not specifying what priced ticket; that he gave him his ticket and the proper change. His testimony then proceeds: "He," Waldron (appellee) "said, 'You did not give me my right change.' I said, 'Yes sir.' He said, 'No sir.' I said, 'I gave you just the exact change with your ticket, and if you did not get your change somebody else got it.' He said, 'You did not.' I said, 'I did.' . . .

I sold two or three tickets while he stood there arguing." That appellee then called him a vile name. "I said, 'Be careful, I won't take that off of anybody, you or anybody else.' He said, 'I want my change.' I said, 'your change was right, and if it is not, when we make up the house our cash will show it, and if there is any over we will make it good to you.'" That thereupon appellee repeated the vile name and Gordon went out of the ticket office and attacked appellee. "He was standing up pretty near the office, and I hit him and he turned around and squared and I hit him again. . . . I could not say how hard I hit him. I hit him pretty hard; I tried to.

In the face." That there was nothing said between them after Gordon came out of the office. "Then we got on over to the stairway and I hit him again, and got my arm around his neck and we were about three or four steps down from the top. . . . I caught him around the neck with my arm and pulled him down. . . . I got him down on the stairway and hit him two or three times more and I kicked him a couple of times. . . . I hit him in the face.

I hit him three or four times there and kicked him and then he said 'I have enough.' Mr. Kiley was down stairs at the time, out on the sidewalk.

I had quit when he holloed, 'I have enough.' Kiley was coming up when he said that, and I said, 'Kiley, arrest this man.' " When Kiley came up "I started to let go when (some) fellow said, 'Give it to him,' Kiley hit him with the mace." That when Kiley hit Waldron (appellee) the latter was "partially down; just about half way up. . . . I was very near up on my feet. . . . When Kiley came up and hit him, I let go of him and went upstairs and went into the office and sold tickets."

The witness Adkins, who was ticket-holder at the east door, testified, "I thought I would go down and see and stop that fussing if I could. . . . They had hold of each other when I got there. . . . I just stooped down and put my hand under their shoulders and assisted them. . . . Just as I was in the act of raising them up I threw my eyes down the stairway and saw Mr. Kiley coming up, and just about the time they got straightened on their feet. Mr. Gordon said to Mr. Kiley, 'Arrest that man.' Mr. Kiley came up to him and I saw Mr. Kiley throw up his left hand, . . . and the next I saw he struck him . . . with his mace."

Kiley himself testified that the appellant, Henry M. Talbott had instructed him that his "duties were to take tickets at the door and supervise the cleaning of the house and assist Mr. Klingensmith in making arrests, or preserving order." That sometimes when employes would come to him and tell him that there was a disturbance in some part of the house he would go there. As to the disturbance he testified, "I was walking up the stairway and happened to glance up and I saw Mr. Gordon having a fight, fighting with a man on the stairway. . . . The man's head was up against the casing on the west side of the stairway. . . . He was sitting facing me as I came up. . . . He (Gordon) was on the step above him and had hold of him. . . . I did not hear the man say anything; Gordon only said, 'Arrest this man.'" "What did you do after striking Mr. Waldron?" "I arrested him."

John Dickson had remained during the whole time in the ticket office and had seen the greater part of the conflict as detailed by Gordon, and Kiley in his testimony corroborates most of their statements. He says: "I went on selling tickets and took no further notice of it. Things of that kind are liable to occur every once in a while." That he remained selling tickets; did not go out during the whole trouble; did not say anything to Gordon when he first told him what the trouble was, did not give any directions to anybody; saw Kiley coming up the stairs to where Gordon had hold of Waldron and they were struggling and partly raised up, getting on their feet. "I do not think I said anything to him (Kiley) . . . I went on selling tickets."

The appellant, George A. Dickson, testified that Kiley was not to assist in any arrest unless called upon by Klingensmith or unless under instructions of appellants, or of John Dickson; that John Dickson acted for them in their absence.

The appellant Henry M. Talbott testified that he agreed with the evidence given by his co-appellant, and that the answers given by him were correct. He stated further that while Kiley was in the theater he generally did what appellant told him, but was not sure that he gave Kiley orders personally; that "John Dickson was deputized to look after that." John Dickson was not only present on this occasion, but was generally at the theater during entertainments. He testified that he "wore off his vest" leaning against the inside shelf of the ticket office. He acted for appellants in signing the firm name to the request made for Kiley's appointment as policeman. This request was as follows:

"To the Board of Metropolitan Police Commissioners of the City of Indianapolis, Ind.
"Indianapolis, Ind. April 21st, 1887.

"The undersigned respectfully request your board to confer special police powers on John M. Kiley, who is employed and paid by the undersigned, the said Police powers to be used in and about Park Theater and Dime Museum, Indianapolis, Ind. And in consideration of said grant of police powers the undersigned hereby become responsible for his obeying your rules, and for all illegal acts done by said John M. Kiley while doing duty as said special policeman.

Dickson & Talbot.

J.

"Approved N. R. Ruckle, Pres't Bd. M. P. Commrs."

The complaint was in seven paragraphs, alleging three causes of action against appellants: assault and battery, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution. The court refused to admit evidence as to the charges of false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, and instructed the jury to find for the appellants on those issues. The court also instructed the jury that the appellants were not liable for the alleged assault and battery by Gordon, the ticket-seller. Whether there was error in such ruling and instructions in favor of appellants we need not inquire, since appellee has not insisted on it. The jury found a general verdict for appellee as to the assault and battery and for appellants as to the other two charges.

The jury also found, in answer to special interrogatories, that John M. Kiley, while in appellant's theater, on October 1, 1887, struck appellee a number of blows upon the head with a mace and thereby inflicted severe wounds. That such blows resulted in appellee's losing the hearing of his left ear and otherwise permanently disabling him and causing him to lose his situation as freight conductor. That appellee at the time and place mentioned, in the view of John M. Kiley, did not commit any crime or violate any ordinance of the city of Indianapolis, and that the said Kiley had no warrant for the arrest of appellee. That John M. Kiley at the time alleged was an employé of appellants; that he said nothing to appellee before assaulting him; that it was one of the duties of Kiley, as the servant and employé of appellants, to preserve order and suppress disturbances in appellants' theater, and that he had received from appellants general authority for that purpose. That appellee while in appellants' theater on said occasion had not committed any crime nor violated any ordinance of said city; that the said Kiley, at said place and time, assaulted and beat appellee on the head with his mace before he arrested him; that the said Kiley when so assaulting appellant, was acting as the servant and employé of appellants and engaged in their business, and acting within the general scope of the duties of his said employment. That John T. Dickson, brother of one of the appellants, was at said time present in the box office of said theater and did, on said occasion and prior thereto, sell tickets for appellants; that with the knowledge of appellants, at and prior to said time, the said John T. Dickson went to said theater and gave instructions to appellant's employés, and that in the absence of appellants, the said John T. Dickson was deputized to act for them at their said theater as manager; that he signed the firm name to the application for police powers to be conferred upon the said John M. Kiley, and that he had authority to so sign said firm name.

That appellants were at said time the lessees and managers of said theater; that all the injuries received by appellee in and about said theater on said evening were inflicted by said John M. Kiley.

That said Joseph Gordon was an employé of appellants, as one of the ticket-sellers on said evening, and was then and there on duty.

That said John M. Kiley was an employé of appellants as janitor and as ticket-taker at the west entrance door of said theater on said evening; that he was commissioned as special policeman about April 22, 1887, to act in connection with his other duties at appellant's said theater, and at their special request.

That at the request of said Gordon, said Kiley did arrest appellee on said evening; that all the wounds and bruises received by appellee at said theater on said evening were inflicted by said Kiley near said ticket office and before the arrest of appellee.

That neither of appellants was present at the time appellee received his injuries, and neither of them had directed or advised any assault upon appellee.

It is enough to say that these answers are fully sustained by the evidence in the record. The main question in this case, and perhaps the only one that need be decided, is whether appellants are liable to appellee for the injuries inflicted upon him by their employé, John M. Kiley.

The treatment due from a carrier to his passenger, from an inn-keeper to his guest, and from a theatrical manager to his patron, while perhaps differing in degree, is similar in kind.

The duty of a railroad company to its passengers is well expressed in Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Ind. App. 202. This was a case where a passenger, having purchased his ticket, was in the company's station on his way to his train, when he was assaulted by one of the "gatemens," and it was contended by the company that the gateman in making the assault was not acting in the scope of his employment. The court said: "It seems to us reasonably clear . . . that the servant was, at the time of doing the acts complained of, on duty for his master, and at or near his proper place, and that the assault was committed on appellee while he was properly on the master's ground and under charge of the master's servants and entitled to their protection rather than their abuse. . . . Moreover, the appellee did not bear the relation of a stranger to the appellant, but, on the contrary, it owed to him an affirmative duty to protect him from the violence and insults of its own servants at the station. It is well settled that one who has purchased his ticket, and is passing at the proper time from the depot to the train, is a passenger, and entitled to the rights of a passenger. . . . One of the prime duties resting upon a railroad company is to protect its passengers from assaults and injuries by its servants, nor does the question of its liability for a breach of this duty depend upon whether or not the servant in the performance of the act is within the scope of his employment."

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 87 L. ed. 97, it is said: "A corporation is doubtless liable, like an individual, to make compensation for any tort committed by an agent in the course of his employment, although the act is done wantonly and recklessly, or against the express orders of the principal." Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Willosby, 184 Ind. 563.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 87 Mich. 205, Cooley, Ch. J., speaking for the court, says: "It is, in general, no excuse to the employer that an injury which has occurring was caused by disobedience of his orders, whether they be express orders or implied orders. He assumes the risks of such disobedience when he puts the servant into his business and the reasons for holding him responsible for the servants' conduct are the same whether the injury results from a failure to observe the master's directions, or from a neglect of the ordinary precautions for which no specific directions are deemed necessary. It will be conceded that for a positive wrong beyond the scope of the master's business, intentionally or recklessly done, the master can not be held responsible; this being very properly regarded as the personal trespass or tort of the servant himself. But when the wrong arises merely from an excess of authority committed in furthering the master's interests, and the master receives the benefit of the act, if any, it is neither reasonable nor just that the liability should depend upon any question of the exact limits of the servant's authority. The master fixes these, and it is his duty to keep his servant, in what is done by him, within the limits fixed. An act in excess would still have the apparent sanction of his authority; the occasion for it would be furnished by the employment, and the injured party could not always be expected to know or be able to discover whether it was or was not without express sanction.

In Higgins v. Waterliet Turnp. & R. Co. 46 N. Y. 23, 7 Am. Rep. 293, the following is quoted with approval from an English case: "It is said that though it cannot be denied that the defendant authorized his guard to superintend the conduct of the omnibuses generally, and that such authority must be taken to include an authority to remove any who misconducts himself, yet the defendant gave no authority to turn out an inoffensive passenger and the plaintiff was one. But the master, by giving the guard authority to remove an offensive passenger, necessarily gave him authority to determine whether any passenger had misconducted himself. It is not convenient for the master personally to conduct the omnibuses, and he puts his guard in his place; therefore, if the guard forms a wrong judgment, the master is responsible."

In Drew v. Peer, 93 Pa. 284, which was a case where Peer and his wife had purchased tickets and entered a theater, and were ejected with force by the attaches of the theater because of their being colored persons, the following were approved as correct instructions to the jury: "If the ticket agent had called upon any one of the crowd 'to put that nigger out,' and some ruffian had done so, the defendant would be liable. . . . If the injury was committed by an agent out of the usual course of employment, the defendant was not responsible; but if the injury was committed by the defendant's door-keeper or ticket-taker, then it was in the course of their employment."

In the case at bar, it was the ticket agent, Joseph Gordon, who called out to have appellee arrested, and it was not a ruffian bystander who put him out, but it was appellant's door-keeper, acting in the course of his employment. In this case also, the evidence shows, and the jury so found, that appellee was without fault. The trouble was occasioned entirely by a dispute as to the purchase of tickets, and both the ticket-seller and the door-keeper acted within the business of their employment, maintaining that side of the controversy which was in their master's interest. In Higgins v. Waterliet Turnp. & R. Co. supra, it was claimed that no authority had been given to turn out an inoffensive passenger, and that therefore there was no liability for the servant's acts; but the court held that the authority to remove an offensive passenger necessarily carried authority to determine whether any passenger was offensive or not. So here, the matter was about the master's business, and the servant, of necessity, must be the judge as to whether the conduct of appellee was such as to require his removal; and if a mistake was made, and an inoffensive patron of the theater was unjustly attacked and injured, the master must respond.

"It is not convenient for the master personally to conduct the (business of keeping order in his theater) and he puts his guard in his place; therefore, if the guard forms a wrong judgment, the master is responsible." See also Goff v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 El. & El. 678.

But this case is even stronger; not only as the master here represented by his ticket agent and his janitor or door-keeper, but his special agent, John Dickson "deputized to act in his absence," was present in the theater ticket office and looking out through the window upon the whole transaction. He testifies that he said and did nothing in the premises, and his silence can be taken only as his and appellant's approval of what was done. Indeed, no rule is better established than that a principal is responsible for the acts of his agent performed within the line of his duty, whether the particular act was or was not directly authorized, and whether it was or was not lawful. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. McKee, 99 Ind. 519, 50 Am. Rep. 783; Pennsylvania Co. v. Weddle, 100 Ind. 141; American Exp. Co. v. Patterson, 73 Ind. 430; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 293, 54 Am. Rep. 319.

But common carriers, inn-keepers, merchants, managers of theaters and others who invite the public to become their patrons and guests, and thus submit personal safety and comfort to their keeping, owe a more special duty to those who may accept such invitation. Such patrons and guests have a right to ask that they shall be protected from injury while present on such invitation, and particularly that they shall not suffer wrong from the agents and servants of those who have invited them. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fleeman, 103 Ill. 546, 43 Am. Rep. 33; Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 86 Wis. 657.

But it is said that John M. Kiley was a policeman, and therefore appellants are not responsible for his attack upon appellee. Whether, at the time of the injuries complained of, Kiley was acting as a policeman or as agent of appellants, must depend upon the acts done by him; because he was a police officer it does not follow that all his acts were those of a policeman; and because he was an agent of appellants, it does not follow that all his acts were those of such agent. Even if he were a regular patrolman, called in off the street by appellants or their agents, to aid in enforcing the regulations of the theater, he would for such purpose be only an agent of appellants, and for his conduct as such agent, within the scope of his employment, appellants would be responsible. If, however, after entering the theater, he should discover appellee in the act of violating a criminal law of the state, or a penal ordinance of the city, and should proceed to arrest him for it, such act of arrest would be that of a police officer. And if such arrest were made on the officer's own motion, without direction, express or implied, on the part of appellants, then appellants would not be responsible. Jardine v. Cornell, 50 N. J. L. 485.

In this case, however, such questions do not arise. The court expressly withdrew from the consideration of the jury the issues made under the allegations of false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, and directed a verdict for appellants on these issues. Nor was any evidence admitted on these issues. Besides, the evidence given by both appellants and appellee showed unquestionably that all the injuries received by appellee were inflicted upon him before he was arrested, and it is still further established that appellee had done no act for which he should be arrested, and the jury so find.

Kiley's acts as a policeman were committed after he had assaulted and beaten appellee. It could not be seriously contended that Kiley could do no wrong as a janitor and door-keeper, but that every wrong done by him should be charged to his official character. This would enable a proprietor to have all his employes commissioned as police officers, and thus escape all liabilities for their misconduct to his patrons.

It is a question whether appellants should not be held liable for all the acts of Kiley, whether as special policeman acting only for his employé, or as janitor or door-keeper, all being within the scope of the business of his employment, but, as we have seen, such question is not before us. The verdict of the jury is in favor of the appellee on the charge of assault and battery, and the evidence, as well as the findings of the jury, show that all assault and battery committed upon appellee was committed before Kiley exercised any of his powers as police officer, and before he made the arrest of appellee. If appellee had attempted to resist arrest, or if he had attempted to get away after arrest, and he had received his injuries in consequence of such attempts, or if he had even committed any crime for which he should be arrested, there might be some reason in appellant's contention on this point. But, on the contrary, it is clear that appellee was innocent of any wrong doing for which he should be arrested; he never even struck back at either of his assailants. He neither resisted arrest nor tried to get away when arrested. The only words uttered by him were rather a request to be arrested and so avoid further danger to his person. "I asked him what he was beating me for, and I said if he had anything to arrest me for to arrest me, and for God's sake not to beat my brains out."

The case of Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 881, 100 Am. Dec. 448, and Hershey v. O'Neill, 86 Fed. Rep. 168, are cases relied upon by appellants. In the first of these cases it seems to be held by the court that a clerk or superintendent of a store has not, by virtue of such employment, authority "to arrest, detain and search any one suspected of having stolen and secreted about his person any of the goods kept in such store." We think this cannot be the law. It is not in harmony with the weight of authority, nor with sound reason. If a superintendent or clerk of a store has such suspicions aroused in his mind by the actions of some visitor at the store, but two courses remain for him, either to let the supposed thief go free or to search him. The first course cannot be taken without unfaithfulness to the interests of the employer. The employer must therefore be held to sustain his superintendent in taking the second course, and if a mistake is made, the employer must certainly be liable. He has selected his clerk, and must rely upon his judgment to act for his interests in his store. The clerk in securing the stolen property is not acting for himself but for his employer.

In the case of Hershey v. O'Neill, the court places its decision, not on the grounds assumed by appellants, but on the grounds that the plaintiff had, in fact, been guilty of an attempt to steal the goods, and that, consequently, a just verdict had been rendered, which ought not to be disturbed.

The other alleged errors discussed by counsel for appellants show no sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment rendered. The complaint was sufficient under the statute.

There was no available error in the rulings of the court on the evidence. The instructions to the jury were all that appellants were entitled to ask, and were more favorable to appellants than to appellee. There was a verbal error in one of the answers of the jury to an interrogatory, but it was harmless to appellants; the interrogatory was fully answered by the answer to the preceding interrogatory. The verdict and the answers to interrogatories are fully sustained by the evidence, and we find no available error in the record.

On petition for rehearing:

Howard, J.:

Owing to the importance of this case, we have given particular consideration to the petition for a rehearing, and to the reasons therefore advanced by counsel, but find no cause to change our opinion on the merits of the case.

Because the complaint alleged that appellee's mind had been impaired by reason of his injuries, and because evidence in support of this allegation had been received, it is urged that the court erred in allowing appellee to be called, and to testify as a witness. Whether, at the time of the trial, the appellee, or any other person offered as a witness, was in fact competent to testify, was a question that must be decided by the court then and there. The witness was before the court and jury, and, whether he had been injured in body or in mind on the occasion of the assault, it does not follow that at the trial he was incompetent to testify. That was a question for the court to determine, and we do not find that any abuse of discretion was shown. It was for the jury to give such credit to the testimony offered as it was entitled to receive.

Counsel also argue that, because Kiley was appointed special policeman by the board of metropolitan police commissioners under the statute of the state, therefore this case is widely different from the cases cited in support of the opinion, in which police powers are conferred by law upon a particular class of persons in a particular line of employment, as, for instance, conductors on railway trains. Counsel say that such persons are not appointed by any public official and that their choice and selection, their employment and discharge, are entirely within the power and control of the persons who are their superiors, and who are engaged in carrying on the business with which such appointees are connected; and counsel conclude that the reason for the difference between such appointees and special police officers is founded upon the principle that the person who selects another to act for him is bound to select one who will do no wrong.

When police powers are conferred by law upon a particular class of persons in a particular line of employment, it is difficult to see why a different rule should apply from that which obtains when such powers are conferred by a public official who himself derives his authority, also, from the law. In the one case, the law confers the powers directly. In the other, the powers are conferred by an official authorized by the law itself to do so. In both cases, the selection is made by the person for whom the officer is to act, as, in this case, Kiley was selected by the appellants, and they expressly bound themselves that they would be responsible for his acts; in other words, that he would do no wrong. Kiley, by this appointment, was not "made appellants' agent without their consent," but was appointed police officer for their house at their special instance and request, as the record shows. He received his pay from, and was employed solely by, appellants, and they might discharge him at any time.

But, besides this, the jury found that the wrong done by Kiley was not done in his capacity as policeman, but that, "when he assaulted and beat the plaintiff, he was acting as the servant and employé of the defendants, and engaged in defendants' business, and within the general scope of the duties of his employment by the said defendants." And these findings are supported by the evidence.

Anna C. McILHINNY.

(.....Ind.....)

The word "issue" is a word of purchase and not of limitation, in a deed creating a life estate with remainder to the issue of the body of the life tenant.

(April 18, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant, Jennie L. McIlhinny, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Floren & Broadus for appellant.

Messrs. Conner & Frost for appellee.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit by appellee to quiet title against appellant. Overruling appellant's exceptions to the conclusions of law stated on a special finding by the court is assigned here for error. The substance of the special finding is that on the 21st day of December, 1881, one William Merrill, the father of appellee, was the owner in fee simple and in possession of the real estate described in the complaint, which was 65 acres of land. That on said day, while he was such owner, he and his wife executed to his daughter, Annie Merrill, then aged fourteen years, a deed for said real estate, reading as follows: "This indenture witnesseth that we, William Merrill and Annie Merrill, his wife, of Fayette county, in the state of Indiana, convey and warrant to Annie Merrill, Junior, of Fayette county, Indiana, for and during her life, with remainder over to the issue of her body born alive, but, in the event of the said Annie Merrill, Junior, dying without issue of her body born alive, then with remainder over to John Merrill, for and in consideration of the sum of eight thousand dollars, as an advancement made to the said Annie Merrill, Junior, by the said William Merrill in his estate, the following real estate in Fayette county, in the state of Indiana, to wit [then follows a description of the land]. In witness whereof the said William Merrill and Annie Merrill,

NOTE.—While the rule in Shelley's Case has been abolished in so many states that it is now much less important than formerly, it is still in force in some jurisdictions and in these the above decision will be of interest. The decision is clearly in harmony with established doctrine as to the scope of the rule, as shown by decisions to the same effect in respect to the use of the word "children," but it seems nevertheless to have very few precedents in respect to the effect of the word "issue" under this rule.

his wife, have hereunto set their hands and seals this 21st day of December, A. D. 1881. William Merrill. Annie Merrill." That the execution of said deed was duly acknowledged before the proper officer on the same day by the grantors. That the plaintiff, Anna C. McIlhinny, is the same person named in said deed as Annie Merrill, Jr. That at the time of said deed the plaintiff was an unmarried daughter of said William Merrill, and did not have born to her any children until the 27th day of July, 1890. On that day Jennie L. McIlhinny was born to the plaintiff, she being the plaintiff's first and only child, and is now living. That after the execution of the deed the appellee took possession of the premises conveyed. That the defendant John Merrill is the John Merrill mentioned in the deed. That John Payne is now, and was before the beginning of the suit, the legal and qualified guardian of said Jennie L. McIlhinny. That the appellee has not parted with the title to said real estate conveyed to her by said deed, but is still the owner of whatever title said deed conveyed to her. That John Merrill and John Payne, appellant's guardian, both claimed, prior to bringing the suit, that the appellee was not the owner in fee simple, and that they had some interest in the land. That said claim casts a cloud upon the title of appellee in fee simple. The conclusions of law are "that appellee, Annie C. McIlhinny, was at the beginning of the suit, and is now, the owner in fee simple of the real estate described in the complaint, setting out the description by metes and bounds; and that said John Merrill and Jennie L. McIlhinny have no interest in said real estate."

It is contended by the appellee's counsel that the rule in Shelley's Case applies to the deed, and that, by that rule, a title in fee simple vested in the first taker by virtue of the deed. The appellant's counsel contend that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and, if that rule does not apply, the plainly-expressed intention of the grantor was to vest a life estate in the appellee, with remainder over in fee to the issue of her body born alive. It is not denied by the appellee's counsel that such was the apparent and plainly-expressed intent of the grantor, but, invoking the aid of the rule in Shelley's Case, and quoting from Chancellor Kent, they say: "And yet it [the rule in Shelley's Case] is admitted to interfere in most cases with the presumed, and in many others with the declared intention of the parties to the instrument to which it is applied." They therefore conclude, if the deed in question falls within the rule in Shelley's Case, the question of intention is foreign to the discussion in this case. The rule in Shelley's Case is this: "Where a freehold is limited to one for life, and by the same instrument the inheritance is limited, either mediately or immediately, to heirs of his body, the first taker takes the whole estate either in fee simple or fee tail; and the words 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body' are words of limitation, and not of purchase." Andrews v. Spurkin, 85 Ind. 292. In Ridge-way v. Lamphear, 99 Ind. 253, this court said: "The rule in Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 83, is the law of this state, and in all cases where the facts make it applicable we must enforce it, although we may think there was not much reason for it at the time of its adoption, and none at all under the existing system of tenures and conveyances. But in accepting the rule, we take it as construed and enforced by the courts which formulated and proclaimed it. Pressed by the evils wrought by the rule, and shocked by the great number of instances in which it operated to utterly overthrow the intention of the testator, these courts centuries ago affirmed that there existed an important difference between wills and deeds, and that the rule should not be so strictly enforced in the case of a will as in the case of a deed. It has long stood as the law that there is a material distinction between wills and deeds, and that the rule in Shelley's Case will not be allowed to override the manifest and clearly-expressed intention of the testator, but that the intention will always be carried into effect if it can be ascertained. It is true that, where the words used are such as bring the case within the rule, it will be given full force and effect; but where the context clearly shows that the testator annexed a different meaning, that meaning will be adopted, and the rule will not be allowed to frustrate his intention."

But the appellee insists that King v. Rea, 56 Ind. 1, is parallel to and directly supports, the conclusions of law stated by the trial court in the case at bar. It must be confessed that, if that case was correctly decided, the judgment in this case must be affirmed. One of the deeds involved in that case, executed by Andrew Wallace, reads: "Conveys and warrants to Martha W. Rea, during her life, with remainder to the issue of her body, their heirs and assigns forever." The court held that Martha W. Rea, by the deed from Andrew Wallace, took a fee simple in the lands, and that the words "issue of her body" must be held as words of limitation, and not words of purchase. It was held in Gonzales v. Barton, 45 Ind. 295, Downey, J., delivering the opinion of the court, that the words "lawful issue" were words of limitation, and not words of purchase."

This court, in following that case, lost sight of the fact that that case was one involving the construction of a will, and the distinction between the force of the word "issue" when used in a deed and when used in a will. It has long been established law that when used in a will the word "issue" may be a word of purchase or it may be a word of limitation, depending on the testator's intention as expressed in the context; but when used in a deed it is always a word of purchase. Elphinstone, Interpretation of Deeds, 318, 819; Bagshaw v. Spencer, 2 Atk. 583; Doe v. Collins, 4 T. R. 294; Bowles' Case, 11 Coke, 79b; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 876, 877, and authorities there cited; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. *654, 655. It also is held in Nelson v. Davis, 85 Ind. 478, and in Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 192, 50 Am. Rep. 82, that the word "issue" is very frequently a word of purchase. It was properly enough held in Gonzales v. Barton, supra, that the word "issue" in the will involved in that case, under the context therein, was a word of limitation, and not a word of purchase. Quite a large number of English cases are therein cited to support that construction of the word, but they are all will cases. It is quite natural that in the light of all those cases construing the word "issue" to be a word of limitation, and not a word of purchase, the distinction between the force and effect of the word when used in a will and when used in a deed should escape the notice of the court in citing Gonzales v. Barton, supra, in support of the ruling in King v. Rea, supra, and therefore this court felt constrained to say "this case must be followed." The legitimate offspring and fruit borne by King v. Rea, supra, is Fletcher v. Fletcher, 88 Ind. 418, which is also cited and relied upon by the appellee here. In that case, Stoughton J. Fletcher and Allen M. Fletcher sued their minor children to quiet title to real estate, showing that at the date of the execution of the deed they were unmarried, and neither of them ever had any children born unto them, but that since the execution of said deed both of them had become married, and had children born unto them, who are still living, naming them as defendants. The deed was by Stoughton A. Fletcher and wife, who "convey and warrant to Stoughton J. and Allen M. Fletcher during their lives one undivided moiety each, and then, after their death, to their children respectively, in fee simple, for the sum of $39,000, the following real estate in Marion county, in the state of Indiana. Then follows a description of the land. In witness whereof, the said Stoughton A. Fletcher and Julia A. Fletcher, his wife, have hereunto set their hands and seals this 30th day of December, A. D. 1873. S. A. Fletcher. Julia. A. Fletcher." The foregoing deed is such as at common law would be a conditional fee, and was called a "fee tail" or "estate tail," the quality of which is defined to be that it is liable to be defeated by the failure of the contingency or condition on which it is made to depend; and in that event, at common law, it reverted to the donor. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 106, 107, and authorities there cited; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 879, and authorities there cited. By our Statute (2 Burns' Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3378) "estates tail are abolished and any estate which, according to the common law, would be adjudged a fee tail, shall hereafter be adjudged a fee simple, and if no valid remainder shall be limited thereon, shall be a fee simple absolute." Now, as the contingency of the grantor, in the foregoing deed, having children surviving might never have happened, the estate was a conditional one, and at common law would have been a fee tail or estate tail, and, but for the latter clause of the above-quoted statute abolishing such estates, it would be a fee simple absolute in the first takers, and their children would have taken nothing. The question, then, arises, was there a valid remainder limited thereon? If there was, then the first takers did not take a fee simple absolute, unless the rule in Shelley's Case applies. Section 3380 of the same statute provides that "a remainder may be limited on a contingency which, in case it should happen, will operate to abridge or determine the precedent estate." Accordingly it has been held by this court, and so ruled at common law, that a valid remainder might be limited on a particular estate for life to unborn children, and on their birth during the life tenancy the remainder would immediately vest. The remainder is contingent before and vested after the birth of the remainderman. Amos v. Amos, 117 Ind. 19, 117 Ind. 87; 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 854, 855; 2 Washb. Real. Prop. 5th ed. *610, 611; Glass v. Glass, 71 Ind. 892. It follows that the deed in the Fletcher Case limited a valid remainder upon the particular estate granted, and, the children to whom it was limited being unborn, it was a contingent remainder until their birth, when it became vested, unless this manifest intent was defeated by the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. That rule is cited, along with King v. Rea, supra, as authority for the conclusion reached. That the rule in Shelley's Case has no application to that case is too plain for argument. The word "children" used in the deed has always been held in this court and the courts of England as a word of purchase, and not a word of limitation. Sorden v. Gatewood, 1 Ind. 107; Doe v. Jackman, 5 Ind. 283; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 229-238, and authorities there cited. The result is, if we follow the two cases of King v. Rea, and Fletcher v. Fletcher, supra, we shall extend the rule in Shelley's Case further in this state than it was ever extended in England or in this country, so far as we have been able to discover. While it is a rule of law too firmly established to be shaken by the courts, and which the courts should enforce, not because it is just or wholesome, but because it is law, yet its operation more frequently defeats the just and undoubted intention of grantors and testators than any other effect it has. For this reason the courts everywhere are inclined to circumscribe its operation within the strict limits of its own boundaries.

It follows from what we have said that there was no word of limitation used in the deed to the appellee, but that, the word "issue," used therein, being a word of purchase, the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply. Therefore we are left free to give effect to the manifest intent of the grantor therein, William Merrill. That intention is very clearly expressed to create a life estate in his daughter, the appellee here, with remainder over to the issue of her body born alive, but, in the event of her dying without such issue born alive, then with remainder over to John Merrill. Such a deed, as we have seen, would have conveyed what is known at common law as a conditional estate or fee, called an "estate tail," liable to be defeated by the failure of the condition, namely, issue of her body born alive, and failure of the contingent remainderman, John Merrill, to be living at the termination of her life estate. In such case, at common law, the estate would revert, as we have seen, to the donor. But our statute, as we have seen, charges that feature of the estate, and makes it a fee simple in the first taker,—the appellant,—unless there was a valid remainder over, limited to the issue of her body, or, on failure of such issue, to John Merrill. As we have already seen, the remainder limited was a valid one, both under the statute and at the common law. It was contingent at the date of the deed, and became vested by the birth of the appellant as issue of appellee's body born alive. Having become vested in appellant, the contingency on which John Merrill's interest depended, his contingent interest has ceased, and he has and can have no further interest. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 629; 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 850, and authorities there cited. The remainder vested in appellant on her birth, subject to be opened up to let in those afterwards born alive as issue of appellee's body before the termination of her life estate. 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 855, and authorities there cited. In so far as King v. Ren, supra, is inconsistent with this opinion, it is modified, and Fletcher v. Fletcher, supra, in so far as it conflicts with this opinion, is overruled.

It is but just to the learned judge of the trial court to say that he was under legal compulsion to follow the cases just referred to so long as they stood unmodified, and not overruled by this court; hence he was fully justified in holding in line with those cases that the rule in Shelley's Case applied, and that the appellee took a fee simple. We are of opinion that the trial court erred in its conclusions of law.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to restate its conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois, ex rel. GERMAN INS. CO. of Freeport,

v.

Thomas C. WILLIAMS.

(145 ILL. 573.)

1. An eligible person lawfully appointed to a vacant office of town clerk and duly notified thereof may be compelled to accept, by mandamus.

2. The imposition of a penalty for failure to serve in a public office does not preclude proceedings to compel the service.

3. No demand is necessary before application for a mandamus to compel acceptance of a public office.

(March 31, 1893.)

NOTE.—Compelling citizen to accept office.

The enforceable duty of one who had been elected to office, to accept and serve in the same, seems to have been settled so early that the records of the case in which it was established have been lost. In the folios, records of proceedings against persons who had been elected to office, for refusing to accept same, are quite frequent, and there does not appear to be any question at that time but that the proceeding was a proper one.

In Rex v. King, 3 Keb. 197, an information was filed against one for refusing the office of constable, and after adjournment for consideration, a judgment was rendered for plaintiff at page 230 of the same volume.

So, in Rex v. Bernard, Skin. 669, Comb. 416, an indictment was filed against one for not taking the office of constable, and a similar proceeding for a similar offense appears in Anonymous, 1 Vent. 344.

In King v. Shacklington, Andr. 201, note, an information was moved against a Quaker for not taking the office of sheriff.

In Rex v. Lone, 2 Strange, 920, it was held that an indictment would lie for not taking the office of constable.

In Rex v. Woodrow, 3 T. R. 731, the court granted an information against one refusing to take upon himself the office of sheriff.

In Rex v. Burder, 4 T. R. 778, Nolan, 111, an indictment against one for refusing to take the office of overseer of the poor was held good.

So it was held that an indictment will lie against one for not taking upon himself the office of overseer of the poor, although he occupied the house which was relied upon to make him a householder only by a clerk for a majority of the time, coming to the property himself daily merely for the purpose of business. Rex v. Poynder, 1 Barn. & C. 173, 2 Dowl. & R. 268.

In Rex v. Bedford, 1 East, 79, in which the question was as to the propriety of ordering a new election, the court said: "Supposing the election to have been properly made, the refusal of the one elected to take upon him the office did not avoid the election, but rendered him indictable for such refusal."

In State v. Ferguson, 31 N. J. L. 107, the court as the basis for their decision that an officer cannot resign his office, lays it down as established law that one may be compelled to take upon himself an office to which he has been elected by the sanctions of the common law.

It seems to have been doubted for some time whether or not the provisions of the toleration act were sufficient to protect one who was not qualified for office because he had not complied with the requirements of the church from prosecution for not accepting the office.

In Rex v. Larwood, 1 Salk. 167, 3 Salk. 134, Skin. 574, Comb. 316, 2 Vent. 248, note, Holt. 503, Carth. 306, 1 Ld. Raym. 29, 4 Mod. 270, 12 Mod. 67, in which it was held that a dissenter could not plead the toleration act as an excuse for not qualifying himself for the office of sheriff, it was stated: "That the king hath an interest in every subject and a right to his services, and no man can exempt himself from the office of sheriff but by act of parliament or letters-patent." But in the report in 4 Mod. 270, it is said that defendant was merely fined for his refusal, and it would seem that the fine was the municipal penalty for refusal to accept, although that element is not brought out in the reports in the other books. In the report in 12 Mod. 67, it is said, a majority of the court would not give an opinion upon the question, but that Justice Samuel Eyre declared that the statute excused the defendant.

In Harrison v. Evans, 3 Bro. P. C. 465, it was held that a dissenter was not even liable for the penalty for not taking an office which he could not take

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to assume the duties of town clerk. Granted.

Statement by Shope, J.:

This is an original proceeding in this court to mandamus to compel the respondent, Thomas C. Williams, to accept, assume, and take upon himself, and execute the office of town clerk of the town of Mt. Morris, in the county of Ogle, in this state; to take and subscribe the oath of office; and to file such oath in the office of the town clerk. The petition shows that on the 31st day of March, 1891, the board of town auditors of the town of Mt. Morris, in said county, acting under a peremptory writ of mandamus issued from this court, audited and allowed to the relator in this proceeding the sum of $45,050, as indebtedness owing by said town upon its bonds belonging to the relator, and made a certificate thereof in conformity with the statute. It is then alleged that the town clerk of said town had absconded from the state of Illinois, and there being no town clerk of said town then present, and the justices of peace of said town, and the supervisor thereof, having failed and neglected to fill the vacancy in said office of town clerk by appointment, the said board of town auditors did not, nor could, deliver said certificate to the town clerk of said town, to be by him kept as required by law, and the aggregate amount thereof be certified by the town clerk to the county clerk of said Ogle county, as required by law in such cases.

The petition then shows that at the annual town meeting held in 1891 a town clerk of said town was elected, but the person so elected neglected and refused to qualify as by law required. The petition alleges, further, that, after the failure of the elected town clerk to qualify as aforesaid, there was sued out of this court an alias peremptory writ of mandamus, directed, among others, to the supervisor of the town of Mt. Morris, the town clerk, the justices of the peace of said town, commanding them, as they had theretofore been commanded, that they immediately, without further excuse or delay, do every act and thing devolving upon them by law, as such officers, for the levy, collection, and payment of a tax sufficient to pay the amount of said claim, etc., and that they certify obedience, etc.; that said writ was served upon all of said officers, except the town clerk; that thereafter divers and sundry persons eligible to said office were, and have been by the said justices of the peace and supervisors of said town, duly and successively appointed to said office of town clerk of said town, and duly notified thereof, all of whom have neglected and refused to accept, qualify, and serve said office, as required by law; that no annual town meeting or election whatever has been held in said town since the annual election of 1891; that no town clerk has been elected, said office continuing vacant; that a pluries writ of mandamus issued, but that, said office of town clerk continuing and remaining vacant, said pluries writ cannot be served upon that because of his disability in failing to qualify himself by taking the sacrament.

And in Rex v. Grosvenor, 2 Strange, 1193, 1 Wills. 18, an information was vouched against a dissenter for refusing the office of sheriff, it appearing that there were acts of the common council that had provided penalties against refusers, and the information was refused on the ground that the penalty was the proper remedy; especially since it had never been settled whether the refusal was a crime or not.

Penalties imposed by corporations.

Apparently as a means of self-protection, municipal corporations at an early date began to provide for penalties to be exacted from those who refused to serve in offices to which they were elected.

And it was held that a corporation may pass a by-law fining members who will not take office. London v. Vansacker, 1 Ld. Raym. 496, 5 Mod. 493, 12 Mod. 299, Carth. 480, Holt. 431.

If the steward of a city neglects to take the oath required by statute, he is subject to the fine provided by the by-laws. Exeter v. Starre, 2 Show. 159.

When this mode of procedure became firmly established, the objection began to be made that the municipal penalty was the only one to which the refusing candidate was liable.

And informations to compel persons to accept the office of common councilman were refused in Anonymous, 11 Mod. 122; Reg. v. Hungerford, Id. 142.

But in Rex v. Jones, 2 Strange, 1146, which was an indictment for not taking the office of overseer of the poor, it was objected that Statute 43 Eliz. 42, had inflicted pecuniary penalties for neglected duty, and that therefore an indictment would not 24 L. R. A.

lie; but the court said these penalties were for neglect of duty after taking the office, and did not prevent an indictment for refusing the office.

And apparently in accordance with such contentions and the qualified recognition which it received, the court in State v. McEntyre, 26 N. C. 171, held that the legislature may make it an indictable offense to refuse the office of town magistrate and commissioner, but there is no principle of the common law making it such.

So a statute providing a penalty for not taking the office of town constable is not unconstitutional. London v. Headen, 76 N. C. 72. In that case State v. McEntyre, supra, is approved, but it is said that the doctrine of the common law is that every citizen, in peace as well as in war, owes his services to the state when they are demanded.

In Edwards v. United States, 103 U. S. 471, 26 L. ed. 814, it is stated that in England a person elected to a municipal office subjected himself to a penalty by the refusal to accept it.

Before the penalty can be collected under a by-law for failure to serve in an office, there must be some evidence that the one elected was qualified to take the office. Reg. v. Richmond, 11 Week. Rep. 65.

Debt for a fine for not serving in the office of sheriff was brought in York v. Tounie, 1 Ld. Raym. 502, 5 Mod. 444, but the form of action seems to have met with disapproval.

An action of debt failed in Worthingham v. Johnson, Cas. t. Hardw. 235, because the by-law under which the action was brought had not provided a penalty for refusal to take the particular office refused in that case.

Mandamus.

Just how mandamus came to be resorted to as a remedy in this class of cases is not clear, but officer, but remains in the hands of the sheriff, awaiting the filling and incumbency of that office, to be served. The petition shows that since the audit, allowance, and certification of said $45,050 was made, the said board of town auditors of said town have audited and allowed the further sum of $2,650 to the relator, as interest upon said bonds, in addition to said previous audit and allowance. The petition further alleges that, there being a vacancy in the office of town clerk of said town, on the 17th day of September, 1892, the justices of the peace of said town, and the supervisor thereof, again met on that day in said town, for the purpose of filling said vacancy in said office, and by their warrants, under their hands and seals, appointed one Thomas C. Williams, who for more than ten years then last past had been a resident of said town, and who was on said day a legal voter, and had been for five years or over next before his said appointment; that said board of appointment forthwith notified him of his said appointment, but the said Thomas C. Williams has hitherto wholly neglected and refused to accept said office, and take and subscribe the oath required by law, whereby said office of town clerk has continued to be vacant. It is then alleged that, because of there being no town clerk of said town, the said certificate of audit so made by said board of town auditors cannot be delivered to the town clerk of said town, to be by him kept, etc., nor can the aggregate amount thereof be certified to the county clerk of said county at the same time and in the same manner as other amounts required to be raised for town purposes in said town, to be levied and collected as other town taxes, as is by law required, whereby the relator is unable to obtain the levy and collection of a tax upon the property of said town, wherewith to pay the amount so audited and allowed. The prayer is that, as ancillary to the original proceeding before mentioned, wherein the said several peremptory writs issued have proved unavailing, by reason of there being no town clerk upon which to serve the same, a writ of mandamus be now here awarded, commanding said Williams to accept, assume, and take upon himself said office, etc. The respondent filed a general demurrer to the petition.

Mr. J. A. Crain for relator.

Mr. Rector C. Hitt, for respondent:

Was this the common law of England prior to the fourth year of James the First? If, said Best, J., this application—one to hold an election, had been made a century ago, it would not probably have been granted, for at that time a mandamus was held to be only to compel the performance of a ministerial duty, but modern cases have gone much further, and a mandamus will now lie for the performance of any public duty.

King v. Forcey, 2 Barn. & C. 596.

This was said more than two centuries after the adoption of the common law in this country, and shows that anciently mandamus was confined to very narrow limits. The ruling of Lord Mansfield in Rea v. Barker, 1 W. Bl. 800, 8 Burr. 1265, was made over a century and a half after our adoption of the common law, and is not binding.

Clarks v. Bishop of Sarum, was decided in 1788, 2 Strange, 1082; and King v. Bower, in 1823, 1 Barn. & C. 596.

The petitioner does not show that it has made a demand upon the defendant to accept the office. A demand and a refusal are necessary.

that it was resorted to is certain, and it is also certain that in England it came to be regarded as an unquestionable remedy.

In 55 Geo. III. a mandamus was granted to compel one elected to the office of mayor to take it upon himself, although the result would be to compel him to remove his residence from the country into the town, and to prevent him from acting as magistrate for the county. Rex v. Leyland, 3 Maule & S. 184.

So payment of the fine will not relieve from a mandamus unless it is stated in the by-law to be in lieu of the service. King v. Bower, 1 Barn. & C. 596, 2 Dowl. & R. 842.

And one may be compelled to take the office of mayor either by mandamus or indictment. Rex v. Colchester, 4 Dougl. 14.

American decisions.

The question has not been frequently raised in this country and the few decisions that have been made are on rather minor branches of the question.

It was said arguendo in Hinze v. People, 22 Ill. 406, that no man can be compelled to give his time and labor to the public without compensation.

In Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294, it was held that one might refuse to take the office of justice of the peace to which he had been elected, for the purpose of rendering himself eligible to be elected county treasurer. And in the dissenting opinion it is said: "We cannot hold that a man selected or chosen against his will or consent is, so far as concerns his own rights, elected so as to be ineligible 24 L. R. A.

to other offices, however it may be as to the public."

So one elected to two offices at the same election may accept the one he chooses, and will not be compelled to accept both, nor can he be indicted for refusal to accept the rejected one. Hartford Twp. v. Bennett, 10 Ohio St. 441.

An act imposing a penalty of $100 on every person who shall refuse to discharge the duties of election officer, if appointed thereto, is constitutional. Brooklyn v. Scholes, 81 Hun, 110.

In New York, one appointed inspector of elections is bound to accept the office under a penalty. Goettman v. New York, 6 Hun, 182.

One not accepting an office may be liable to a penalty therefor, but cannot be liable to the penalties provided for neglect of the duties of the office. Bentley v. Phelps, 27 Barb. 524.

Under the New York act providing a penalty for refusing to take the office of overseer of highways, the penalty is in lieu of the service, and after one has refused the office and paid the penalty, he cannot during the same term be again appointed to the same office. Haywood v. Wheeler, 11 Johns. 432.

But the penalty cannot be exacted unless the town proceeds to a new election. Winnegar v. Roe, 1 Cow. 258.

Under the Wisconsin statutes, it seems that a refusal to accept office is permitted. State v. Washburn, 17 Wis. 658.

As to the right to resign an office, see note to Reiter v. State (Ohio) 23 L. R. A. 621. H. F. F.

People v. Hyde Park, 117 Ill. 462.

Mandamus will not lie against a private citizen.

State v. Powers, 14 Ga. 388; State v. Larabee, 3 Wis. 788; State v. Bridgeman, 8 Kan. 458.

This defendant is a private citizen.

See State v. Powers, supra.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question presented is whether mandamus will lie to compel acceptance of a municipal office by one who, possessing the requisite qualification, has been duly elected or appointed to the same. It is stated by text writers that no case has arisen in this country involving this precise question (Merrill, Mandamus, § 145; Dill, Mun. Corp. § 162); and in the researches of counsel, and our own examination, none have been found. There are, however, a number of cases where analogous questions, involving the same principle, have been elaborately discussed and determined in the state and federal courts. Very many English cases are found in which it has been held that it was a common-law offense to refuse to serve in a public office, to which one had been elected or appointed under competent authority, and that mandamus will lie in such case to compel the taking of the official oath, and entering upon the discharge of the public duty. It is objected that these cases do not show that mandamus would lie, for the refusal to accept public office, prior to the fourth year of James the First. If the contention be true, it is unimportant whether the particular remedy was by mandamus, by the ancient common law, or not. The important subject of inquiry is whether it was a common-law duty to accept and discharge the duties of a public municipal office. The writ of mandamus was in use as early as the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Rez v. University of Cambridge, Fortes. 202; Rez v. Dr. Gower, 3 Salk. 230. It appears from Dr. Widdrington's Case (A. D. 1662), 1 Lev. 23, that mandamus had been in use as early as in the time of Edward II. and Edward III., between 1307 and 1377. Originally it was a letter missive from the sovereign power, commanding the party to whom it was addressed to perform the act or duty imposed. Later it obtained sanction as an original writ emanating from the king's bench, where, by fiction of law, the king was always present. But it does not seem to have been frequently used, nor adopted as the remedy to compel the acceptance of office, until late in the seventeenth century. In modern times the uses of the writ, and the purposes to which it will be applied, have been greatly enlarged, and it has come into general use wherever there is a legal duty imposed, and no other remedy is provided by law for a failure to discharge it; and in many other cases, against those exercising an office or franchise, where there may be another remedy, but it is less direct and effective. In this state, as in most if not all the states of the Union, the proceeding is regulated by statute. Rev. Stat., chap. 87.

The common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, and all statutes or acts of the British parliament made in aid of, and to supply the defects of, the common law, prior to the fourth year of James I. (excepting certain statutes), and which are of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, are by our statutes made the rule of decision until repealed by the legislature. Thereby the great body of the English common law became, so far as applicable, in force in this state.

It is held in numerous English cases that by the common law it was the duty of every person having the requisite qualification, elected or appointed to a public municipal office, to accept the same, and that a refusal to accept such office was punishable at common law. The case of Rez v. Lone, 2 Strange, 920, was an indictment for refusing to execute the office of constable by one who had been chosen to it, and it was held that he was indictable by the common law. Rez v. Jones, Id. 1145, was an indictment for not taking upon himself the office of overseer of the poor. It was held that the offense was indictable upon the principles of the common law. See Rez v. Burder, 4 T. R. 778. Rez v. Larwood (A. D. 1695), 4 Mod. 270, was an information against the defendant for his refusal to take the office of sheriff, to which he had been duly appointed. The defense was that the defendant, being a dissenter, had not taken sacrament within a year before he was chosen, and so his appointment was void, under 25 Car. I., chap. 2, 80 Car. I., chap. 1, disabling papists, etc. It was held that it was the fault of the defendant not to have received the sacrament, and that his neglect of duty was no excuse, and that he was liable, etc. In Vanacker's Case (A. D. 1699), 1 Ld. Raym. 496, it was held that the city of London, a municipal corporation, of common right possessed authority by by-law of the corporation, to impose penalties for refusal to accept office; Lord Holt remarking that, "If a franchise be granted to a corporation, it is under a trust that the corporation shall manage it well. . . . The acceptance of the charter obliges the body politic to perform the terms upon which it was granted, and, as every citizen is capable of the benefit of the franchise, so he ought to submit to the charge, also. . . . And therefore, as they have advantage by some franchises, so they ought to submit to the charges of others. . . . Therefore it is necessary that they should have coercive power to compel persons to take the office upon them, and that without any custom, otherwise this office might be lost to the city." King v. Raines, 3 Salk. 162. About the beginning of the eighteenth century the English courts adopted mandamus as an appropriate remedy in such cases, as it would seem, and the practice has been since followed. Reg. v. Hungerford (decided in 1708), 11 Mod. *142, was an information in the nature of quo warranto, against a common councilman of Bristol, for refusing to take upon himself the office, etc. The remedy was denied, but it was said, "If they had applied to the court for mandamus, they fendant to take the oath, and to take upon himself, and execute, the office of common councilman of the borough and town of Lancaster. The court said: "It is an offense at common law to refuse to serve an office, when duly elected," and refused to hold that the payment of a fine imposed by by-law of the corporation discharged the obligation to accept and serve in the office, and a peremptory writ was awarded. See Rea v. Bedford, 1 East, 79; King v. Fowey, 2 Barn. & C. 584; Clarke v. Bishop of Sarum, 1 Strange, 108; Pelton's Case, 2 Lev. 252; Vintner's Co. v. Passey, 1 Burr. 239; Rea v. Grosvenor, 1 Wils. 18; Rea v. Whitwell, 5 T. R. 86; Rea v. Leyland, 8 Maule & S. 184.

Further citation from cases will not be necessary. So uniformly has the doctrine been maintained that there is a legal duty to accept an office when duly elected or appointed, in a public or municipal corporation, at common law, and that mandamus is an appropriate remedy in cases of refusal, that it is accepted by all the text writers. Thus Mr. Grant (Law of Corporations, p. 230) states the rule: "On the other hand, when, not being exempt or disqualified, a man is duly elected to an office, the court, if the corporation is a public one, and the office of a sufficiently important nature to justify its interference, and in all cases where the office is connected with the administration of local jurisdiction vested in the corporation, or the administration of justice, will interfere by mandamus to compel him to take upon him and serve, the office." To the same effect, see Willcock, Mun. Corp. 128; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 243; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 834; Shortt, Information, 324-328; Tapping, Mandamus, 189. In Merrill on Mandamus, § 145, it is said: "A party who has been elected to an office owes a duty to the public to qualify himself therefor, and to enter upon the discharge of his duties. Such duty being incumbent on him by law, he may be compelled by the writ of mandamus to assume the office, and take upon himself the duties thereof. Though he may be subject to an indictment or fine for failure to do so, still the writ of mandamus will be granted, because neither the indictment nor the fine is an adequate remedy in the premises, since it does not fill the office, and prevent a failure of the discharge of the public duties." It follows, necessarily, if to refuse the office is a common-law offense, and punishable as such, that a legal duty attaches to the person to take upon himself the office, which may now be enforced by mandamus.

While this class of offices, in England were accepted as a burden, they have not been generally so regarded in this country. Under our system of local government, even the smallest offices are generally accepted, either because they are supposed to lead to those which bring higher honors and greater emoluments, or because of a sense of duty. To this fact, and perhaps to the prevalent but mistaken idea that one holding a public office may resign at will, is to be attributed the absence of decision in this country upon ordinarily arisen where the incumbent has sought to resign from public office; and it has been uniformly held that the power to resign did not exist, or resignation become effective to discharge the officer from the public duty, until accepted by lawful and competent authority. In Edwards v. United States, 103 U. S. 471, 26 L. ed. 814, Edwards had been elected supervisor of the town of St. Josephs, Berrien county, Mich., on April 8, 1876, and entered upon the duties of his office, and on the 7th of June following resigned in writing, and filed the same with the town clerk. No action upon such resignation was alleged to have been taken by the township authorities, and the question was, "Was the resignation complete without an acceptance of it, or something tantamount thereto, such as the appointment of a successor?" The court held that it was not, and says: "In England a person elected to a municipal office was obliged to accept it, and perform its duties, and he subjected himself to a penalty by a refusal. An office was regarded as a burden which the appointee was bound, in the interest of the community and good government, to bear." And it is said that it followed from this, as a matter of course, that, after the office was assumed, it could not be laid down at will; and, that court holding that the common-law rule prevailed in Michigan, the judgment awarding a peremptory writ compelling the performance of the duty as supervisor, etc., was affirmed. In the case of Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677, it is said, in passing upon the question there at issue: "An officer may certainly resign, but without acceptance his resignation is nothing, and he remains in office. It is not true that an office is held at the will of either party. It is held at the will of both." And after saying that the acceptance of resignations, in respect of lucrative offices, has been so much a matter of course that it has become the common understanding that to resign is a matter of right, but the law is otherwise, it is said: "The public has a right to the services of all the citizens, and may demand them, in all civil departments, as well as the military." In State v. Ferguson, 81 N. J. L. 107, the question was whether the respondent, at the time of the service of the writ of mandamus, was an overseer of highways, etc. The respondent proved that, before the service of the mandamus, he had sent in his resignation of said office, on which certain of the township committee had indorsed acceptance. It was insisted that the officer had a right to resign at will, and that the mere notification of the proper officers of the fact relieves him from performance of the official duty. The chief justice, after reviewing the common-law authorities, says: "I think it undeniable, therefore, that upon general principles of law, as contained in judicial decisions of the highest authority, the refusal of an office of the class to which the one under consideration belongs was an offense punishable by a proceeding in behalf of the public. Regarding, then, the doctrine of the law as established, it seems to be an unavoidable sequence that the party elected, and who is thus compelled, by force of the sanction of the criminal law, to accept the office, cannot afterwards resign it ex mero motu. If his recusancy to accept can be punished, it cannot be that he can accept, and immediately afterwards, at his pleasure, lay down, the office." The same principle has been announced more or less directly in Van Orsdall v. Hazard, 8 Hill, 243; London v. Headen, 76 N. C. 72; Winnegar v. Roe, 1 Cow. 258; People v. Barnett Twp. Supra, 100 Ill. 832; Badger v. United States, 98 U. S. 599, 23 L. ed. 991. The reason assigned in Re v. Larwood, 1 Salk. 168, for the public duty is "that the king hath an interest in every subject, and a right to his service, and no man can be exempt from the office of sheriff but by act of parliament or letters-patent." In a republic the sovereign power rests in the people, to be expressed only in the forms of law; and if the duty, preservative of the common welfare, is disregarded, society may suffer great inconvenience and loss before, through the methods of legislation, the evil can be remedied. Upon a refusal of officers to perform their functions, effective government pro tanto ceases. In civilized and enlightened society, men are not absolutely free. All citizens owe the duty of aiding in carrying on the civil departments of government. The burden of government must be borne as a contribution by the citizen in return for the protection afforded. The sovereign, subject only to self-imposed restrictions and limitations, may, in right of eminent domain, take the property of the citizen for public use. He is required to serve on juries, to attend as a witness, and, without compensation, is required to join posse comitatus at the command of the representative of the sovereign power; and he is required to do military service at the will of the sovereign. In all these, private right and convenience must yield to the public welfare and necessity. It is essential to the public welfare, necessary to the preservation of government, that public affairs be properly administered; and for this purpose civil officers are chosen, and their duties prescribed by law. A political organization must necessarily be defective which provides no adequate means to compel the observance of the obvious duty of the citizen, chosen to office, to enter upon and discharge the public duty imposed by its laws, and necessary to the exercise of the functions of government.

It is admitted by the demurrer that the respondent was legally appointed town clerk of the town of Mt. Morris. The office is connected with, and necessary to, the levy of taxes to carry on the municipal concerns of the town, and the administration of its local jurisdiction. It is shown that there was a public necessity, as well as that relator had a private interest in the performance of the duties of that office. No election had been held in the town since the annual town meeting of 1891. Numerous persons had been appointed to said office, but it remained vacant, and the duties, consequently, undischarged. It is admitted by the demurrer, also, that claims against the town in favor of the relator, to a large amount, had been audited by the board of town auditors of said town, and allowed, and certificate thereof duly made, as provided by law, but that the same could not be delivered to, or filed with, the town clerk, because of such vacancy in said office, nor could the aggregate amount thereof be certified to the county clerk of said county, to be levied and collected as other town taxes. It is conceded that the respondent was eligible to the office; that a vacancy therein existed; that he was appointed conformably to the law, and duly notified thereof. Rev. Stat., art. 10, chap. 189, §§ 1-3. The statute provides that every person appointed to the office of town clerk, before he enters upon the duties of his office, and within ten days after he shall be notified of his appointment, shall take and subscribe before some justice of the peace, etc., the oath or affirmation of office prescribed by the constitution, and within eight days thereafter file the same in the office of the town clerk. Rev. Stat., art. 9, chap. 189, § 2. Section 8 of the same article provides that if any person elected or appointed to said office shall neglect to take and subscribe the oath, and cause the same to be filed as aforesaid, such neglect shall be deemed a refusal to serve. And section 7 of the same article provides: "If any person elected to the office of . . . town clerk shall refuse to serve, he shall forfeit to the town the sum of $25." One of the special duties enjoined upon a town clerk is: "He shall annually, at the time required by law, certify to the county clerk the amount of taxes required to be raised for all town purposes." Rev. Stat., art. 12, chap. 189, § 4. Rev. Stat., 1874, chap. 120, §§ 127, 128, provides that the county clerk shall determine the rate per cent upon the valuation of the property of towns, etc., that will produce not less than the net amount of the sums certified to him according to law, to be extended by the county clerk upon the equalized valuation of property in such town, etc. The only mode provided by law by which a tax can be levied upon the property of a town for the payments of its debts or current expenses is by the certificate of the town clerk of the town to the county clerk, as thus prescribed. It is apparent, therefore, that a public necessity exists for the discharge of the public duty.

It is insisted that, the legislature having provided a penalty for the refusal to accept the office, that remedy is exclusive, and that a payment of the penalty imposed was intended to be in lieu of the service. We cannot concur in this view. The purpose of imposing the penalty was to enforce the acceptance of the office, and performance of its duties; and the statute cannot be construed as intending that the person chosen should be discharged from the duty by payment of the penalty, and thereby the purposes of the creation of the office frustrated, and the public duty remain unperformed. Authorities supra. It is to be presumed that, had the legislature intended that the payment of the fine should be in lieu of the service, they would have so enacted, and, not having done so, the duty remains, notwithstanding the imposition of the fine or penalty. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 834, supra.

It is also insisted that the demurrer should be sustained for the reason that no demand is averred to have been made upon respondent to accept the office, and perform its duties. It is alleged that he was duly, forthwith, notified of his appointment, by the board authorized by law to make the same (Rev. Stat., 1874, art. 10, chap. 189, § 8), and that he refused and neglected to accept the office. Upon being notified, it was his duty, by law, to take and subscribe the oath of office, and file the same, and enter upon the discharge of the duties.

Relator was not alone interested, nor did the failure of respondent to qualify affect its interest only. On the contrary, the duty, the performance of which is sought to be enforced, is a public duty, commanded by public law. The case is therefore clearly distinguishable from one in which the act sought to be enforced is for the benefit of some private party. In cases of this class no formal demand was necessary, as preliminary to the application for mandamus. People v. Upper Alston School Dist. Board of Education, 127 Ill. 624.

We are of opinion that the respondent ought to be required to accept the office of town clerk of said town, to which he has been duly and legally appointed, to take and file the oath as such town clerk, as provided by law, and to discharge the duties of said office, and a peremptory writ of mandamus is awarded accordingly.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Minnesota

v.

C. E. CORBETT.

(..... Minn. ....)

- *1. Laws 1893, chap. 66, entitled "An act to regulate the sale and redemption of transportation tickets of common carriers and to provide punishment for the violation of the same," is not unconstitutional, either as "class legislation" granting special privileges to carriers.
2. Or as a delegation of the police power of the state to grant licenses to engage in a business.
3. Or as an interference with interstate commerce.
4. Or (at least as to tickets purchased after the passage of the act) as depriving a citizen of his property "without due process of law."
5. If a business, as that of common carriers, is a proper subject of police regulation, so are its incidents and accessories; as, for example, the issue and sale of transportation tickets.
6. The word "owner," as used in the act includes all those who operate a railroad or steamboat in the transportation of passengers; as, for example, lessees, receivers and the like.

(May 25, 1894.)

CERTIFICATION by the District Court for Ramsey County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a demurrer to an indictment for selling railroad tickets contrary to law, after the entering of an order sustaining the demurrer. Order reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. W. Childs, Atty. Gen., Pierce Butler and C. W. Bunn for the state.

*Headnotes by MITCHELL, J.

NOTE.—As to validity of statutes against ticket brokerage or "scalping" see Burdick v. People (Ill.) 24 L. R. A. 152 and note.

See also 43 L. R. A. 264.

Messrs. Horton & Denegre, for defendant.

The law is unconstitutional as class legislation.

It places in the exclusive control of a privileged class the right to buy and sell a certain kind of personal property. It is not questioned but that a railroad ticket is property.

Hoffman v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 45 Minn. 58.

As property easily transferred and assigned it is merchantable. The privilege granted under the law is the exclusive right to sell railroad tickets and the donee of this privilege is the railroad company. A railroad corporation as such can only act through agents. It is difficult then to perceive how a burden is placed upon them by the provisions of a law which directs that they operate in the natural way through agents, licensed by themselves, and make redemption of their unused tickets, or parts of tickets, in most instances at a profit to themselves and in no cases at a loss. The agent licensed under this act is but a creature of the railroad who creates and exterminates him at pleasure. The state can license only such as the railroad selects. The privilege of selling the property rights in a railway ticket is thus limited to the appointees of the railroad, and thereby raises in them a favored class with privileges that no others can enjoy.

Everybody has the right to dispose of his property as he will so long as he does not interfere with his neighbor.

Arrowsmith v. Burlingim, 4 McLean, 497.

The law secures to every citizen the right to do with his own what he will.

Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 662, 37 L. ed. 601.

The law is in violation of section 1, article 14, of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives the citizen of his liberty and property without due process of law.

A ticket even though purchased from one not a licensed agent entitles the holder to travel thereon and such a contract is valid and can be enforced.

Sleeper v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 100 Pa. 259, 49 Am. Rep. 380.

The general purpose of the legislature will be defeated if it shall be held valid as to some cases and void as to others.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 181.

The only possible justification that can be found for this law is the police power of the state. This term means simply "the power of the state to impose those restraints upon private rights which are necessary for the general welfare of all and is but the power to enforce the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas."

Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 23 L. R. A. 837; Willis v. Standard Oil Co. 50 Minn. 297.

The legislature certainly cannot give to an act the character of a police regulation by calling it such.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 186.

The business is legal.

Hirschfeld v. Dallas, 29 Tex. App. 242.

A man's business if legal, is one of his most sacred property rights. In destroying the business of ticket brokerage, this law takes from the ticket broker his property in a manner otherwise than by the law of the land and deprives him of the liberty guaranteed him in the bill of rights.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, § 102; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 115, 121, 32 L. ed. 623, 625; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 369, 30 L. ed. 220, 226; Wynshamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 878, 484.

In order to prohibit the prosecution of a trade altogether, the injury to the public which furnishes the justification for such a law must proceed from the inherent character of the business.

Rep. 209.

It has never been questioned and the scalper law of Illinois is to-day a dead letter.

People v. Gilbert, 25 Chicago Legal News, 312.

The Texas law was declared unconstitutional in State v. Mercer, Houston Daily Herald of October 6, 1893.

The law is in violation of section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "That congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indians tribes."

Warren v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 84; Slauson v. Racine, 13 Wis. 399; Allen v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 80, 26 L. ed. 818; Burkholts v. State, 16 Lea, 71; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 62 Tex. 630; Jones v. Jones, 104 N. Y. 384; Pom. Const. Law, § 378; Welton v. Mis-

The power to regulate interstate commerce is exclusively vested in congress, and any attempts to do so on the part of the states are void. It makes no difference in what language the statute is framed, its purpose must be determined by its nature and reasonable effect.

This law attempts to destroy the rights of property in tickets owned in this state though purchased and to be used upon railroads in another state; it attempts to destroy the right of property in tickets purchased in this state and for use upon railroads in another state; it attempts to prevent the transfer and regulate the redemption of tickets sold in another state for use in this state; it attempts to legislate against a business established for the purpose of conducting ticket agencies for the sale of tickets upon railways operated in the different state of the Union. All of which said purposes are interstate commerce, and in so far as this law interferes with or regulates any of the same it contravenes the interstate commerce clause of the constitution.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted for selling on October 18, 1893, a railroad ticket of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company from St. Paul to Little Falls, in this state, contrary to the provisions of section 2, chapter 66, Laws, 1893, entitled "An act to regulate the sale and redemption of transportation tickets of common carriers and to provide punishment for the violation of the same," approved April 19, 1893. The trial court, having sustained a demurrer to the indictment, has certified the case to this court, pursuant to Gen. Stat., 1878, chap. 117, § 11. We think the statute contemplates that the report and certificate of the trial judge should indicate the particular questions of law which he deems so important and doubtful as to require the decision of this court. In the present case the "memorandum" of the judge, which is incorporated in his report, is the only thing which points out the questions of law upon which he desires our opinion, and it is apparent from this that the only question which he considered or passed upon in sustaining the demurrer was the constitutionality of the statute under which the indictment was found. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to the consideration of the objections raised to the validity of that statute. These objections may be all summed up as follows: (1) It is "class" legislation, in that it gives to persons named by the carriers the exclusive privilege of conducting the business of dealing in transportation tickets. (2) It delegates to the carriers the police power of licensing persons to conduct the business of dealing in such tickets. (8) It deprives the citizen of his property in such tickets without due process of law. (4) It is an unlawful interference with interstate commerce. (5) It discriminates between incorporated and non-incorporated carriers of passengers, because section 7 imposes a penalty on the former, and not on the latter, for refusing to redeem unused tickets.

Before examining the provisions of the act, or entering upon the consideration of these objections, it may be well to refer briefly to a few elementary principles applicable to such cases. That the transportation of passengers by common carriers is a proper subject of police regulation by the state is unquestioned; and, if a business itself is the subject of police regulation, then so are all its incidents and accessories. That the matter of the issue and transfer of tickets, as evidences of the contracts of the carriers, is an incident and accessory of the business, needs no argument. And, where a business is a proper subject of the police power, the legislature may, in the exercise of that power, adopt any measures, not in conflict with some provision of the constitution, that it sees fit, provided, only they are such as have some relation to, and some tendency to accomplish, the desired end; and, if the measures adopted have such relation or tendency, the courts will never assume to determine whether they are wise, or the best that might have been adopted. State v. Donaldson, 41 Minn. 74; Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 22 L. R. A. 857. Furthermore, courts are not at liberty to declare a statute unconstitutional because, in their opinion, it is opposed to the fundamental principles of republican government, unless those principles are placed beyond legislative encroachment by the constitution; or because it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the constitution, but not expressed in words, or because it is thought to be unjust or oppressive, or to violate some natural, social, or political rights of the citizen, unless it can be shown that such injustice is prohibited or such rights are protected by the constitution. Except where the constitution has imposed limitations upon the legislative power, it must be considered as practically absolute; and to warrant the judiciary in declaring a statute invalid they must be able to point out some constitutional limitation which the act clearly transcends.

With these elementary propositions in mind, we proceed to consider the evils, or supposed evils, which the legislature designed to remedy, and the measures which they have adopted to accomplish that end. It was commonly asserted and believed (to what extent correctly is not important) that spurious and stolen tickets, and tickets which had expired by limitation, or that were not transferable, were often put on the market to such an extent as to work great frauds upon both the public and the carriers; that frequently those selling such tickets were irresponsible, so that the party defrauded had no redress; that the business of trafficking in such tickets often furnished an inducement to railway employes to steal tickets, or issue spurious ones, and put them on the market. It was also commonly believed that, in order to evade statutes designed to secure uniformity of rates and to prevent discriminations, some carriers of passengers were in the habit of placing large blocks of their tickets with "scalpers," ostensibly not their agents, for sale at cut rates. To remedy these and similar abuses, real or supposed, this statute was passed. That all its provisions have some relation to, and tendency to accomplish, this end, is quite clear. Do they transcend any constitutional limitation upon legislative power? It seems to us that most of the objections to the act—certainly the first two—are based upon a radical misconception of its provisions, and of the character of transportation tickets as property. Counsel for the defendant seems to assume—First, that such tickets are vendible chattel property, which are the legitimate subject of barter and sale, the same as any other chattels, and, second, that this statute is designed to be a "license law," in the ordinary sense of that term. With these two premises assumed, the task of successfully assailing the validity of the act is a very easy one. While a "railroad ticket" is, in one sense, "property," yet it is not merchandise or a chattel. It is merely the evidence of the contract of the carrier to transport the holder between the points, and on the condition, therein named. Treating it as the contract itself, it is in the nature of a chose in action. No one with whom a carrier makes such a contract has any inherent constitutional right to insist that it should be assignable. At common law, all choses in action were nonassignable, and if the legislature had deemed it necessary, in order to prevent the supposed evils, to provide that all transportation tickets should be nontransferable, or even to prohibit the issue of tickets altogether, and require carriers of passengers to collect fare in cash, we fail to see why they had not the power to do so.

Again, the act has not the first element of a "license law" in the common meaning of the term. It must be borne in mind that these tickets are the contracts, or evidences of the contracts, of the carriers, and hence, in the nature of things, can in the first instance be issued or sold only by the carriers themselves, who, as a matter of course, have the exclusive right to appoint their own agents for that purpose. Now, what the act provides is that the carriers shall only issue or sell their tickets through agents appointed in a particular manner, and the evidence of whose appointment has been authenticated by certain formalities. While the certificate of a compliance with these requirements, issued by the state, is called a "license," yet it is merely the evidence of the appointment of the agent, its purpose being to secure and preserve public written evidence of that fact, so as to prevent evasions of the law, and to enable every one who buys a ticket to ascertain whether the person with whom he is dealing actually represents, and has authority to bind, the carrier. The agent is given no authority to sell or deal in tickets of other carriers, but only authority to sell the ticket of the carrier appointing him, and providing him the certificate of such authority. So far from granting any special privileges to the carrier, it imposes a burden upon him—First, by limiting his right to issue or sell tickets to agents provided with a certificate from the state of their authority; and, second, by requiring him to repurchase or redeem unused tickets. And then, in order to prevent the frauds already referred to, the act prohibits entirely the sale, barter, or transfer, within the state, of the whole or any part of any ticket, or other evidence of the holder's right to travel on any railroad or steamboat, whether situated or operated within or without the state, except by the agent of the carrier possessing the certificate of authority provided for in the first section of the act.

The fact that the purchaser of a ticket is prohibited from selling it to whom he pleases does not "deprive him of his property without due process of law." The disposition of property may always be limited or regulated where public interests so require. The ticket is not destroyed or taken from the holder, nor is his right to ride on it at all limited. The only limitation is upon his right to transfer it. If he wishes to ride on it, which is the purpose for which a ticket is presumably bought, he can do so; but, if he does not use it, his only course is to require the carrier who issued it to redeem it. As already suggested, a man has no constitutional right to insist that these contracts for transportation shall be transferable; and if the legislature had seen fit to declare that they should not be, and that they could only be used by the party to whom they were originally issued, they might have done so, even without making any provision at all for their redemption by the carrier if not used. This might not be true as to tickets, by their expressed or implied terms transferable, purchased before the passage of the act; but as to the tickets issued and purchased after that it is unquestionably true, for the statute becomes a part of the contract expressed in the ticket, and is inherent in the property in it. Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 218, 6 L. ed. 606.

The indictment in this case charges defendant with selling the ticket nearly six months after the passage of the act, and, if the law should be regarded as invalid as to tickets issued and purchased before it was passed, it was for the defendant to plead and prove that he comes within the class of persons as to which the law is invalid, and that this ticket was one as to which the statute does not operate. A law may be entirely valid as to some persons and some acts, and invalid as to others, and its invalidity can be raised and taken advantage of only by those who show that they have a right to question the act. They must show that their rights are taken away by the law, and that as to them, in the particular case, there is a higher law in the constitution which supersedes the statute. In Indiana and Illinois the courts have upheld statutes similar to the one under consideration in all material respects, except that they provide that the acts shall not prohibit any person who has purchased a ticket from any agent authorized as by the act provided, with the bona fide intention of traveling upon the same, from selling it to any other person. Fry v. State, 63 Ind. 552, 80 Am. Rep. 238; Burdick v. People, 149 Ill. 600, ante, 152.

In these cases the courts lay some stress upon this provision. But we are unable to see how the absence of it affects the validity of the act, or how, at least as to tickets issued after its passage, it deprives a person of his property "without due process of law." The law may in that respect be more drastic; but if the legislature thought that such an exception would open the door to evasions of the law, and that the evil aimed at could be effectually remedied only by absolutely prohibiting any sale of tickets within the state except by the carrier himself, through his agents authorized in the manner provided, we think it was competent for them to so declare.

Neither is there anything in the objection that, while the act prohibits the sale of any tickets except in the manner prescribed, it only provides for the redemption of unused tickets of railroads or steamboats situated or operated, in whole or in part, within the state. This limitation of the provisions as to redemption may have been because of the supposed inability of the state to compel redemption by foreign or nonresident steamboats or railway companies; but, as the sale of all tickets might have been prohibited without any provision for their redemption, the act does not deprive the holder of a ticket of a nonresident carrier simply because it leaves him, in case he does not use it, to such remedies, if any, as may be given him by the law of the domicile of the carrier. It is hardly necessary to suggest that it is just as necessary, in order to prevent frauds on the public, to regulate the sale, within the state, of tickets of "nonresident" carriers as of "resident" ones. We may add, in passing, that section 5 of the Act makes it the duty of a carrier within the state to redeem tickets sold by it in "any manner," no matter whether sold within or without the state; also, that the word "owners" is evidently used in a comprehensive sense, so as to include all who are operating a railroad or steamboat, whether as owners of the property, or as leasees, receivers, or the like. What has been said fully covers the first three objections to the statute.

There is clearly nothing in the objection that the act unlawfully interferes with interstate commerce. In the first place, the question is not in this case, because the ticket is not for an interstate ride. But, even if it was, there would be nothing in the point. The law is not a revenue law, and is not designed to, and does not, regulate interstate commerce at all. It is a mere police regulation of the sale and transfer of tickets, designed to protect the public from frauds, and its interference, if any, with interstate commerce, is purely incidental and accidental. The grant of power to congress to regulate interstate commerce was never designed to, and does not, at all interfere with police power of the states to promote domestic order, to prevent crime, and to protect the lives and property of its citizens, although such regulations may indirectly operate upon and affect interstate commerce. Such regulations are valid in spite of their operation on commerce, and the right to pass them does not originate from any power in the state to regulate commerce. The books are so full of cases to this effect that the citation of authorities in support of the proposition is unnecessary.

Neither is there anything in the last objection. If defendant is correct in his construction of section 7,—that it only imposes a penalty, in favor of the state, upon incorporated carriers for a refusal to redeem unused tickets,—this is not an objection which he is in position to raise, as it does not affect him. If any owner of a railroad or steamboat situated or operated, in whole or in part, within the state, refuses to redeem his ticket, as provided in section 5, the purchaser has his civil remedy, wholly independently of section 7. Even if the latter section should be declared wholly invalid, on the objection of an incorporated carrier, it would not affect the validity of the balance of the act.

We have endeavored to give this case the consideration which its importance deserves, and are not able to see that any of the objections urged against the validity of the act are well founded. With the policy or wisdom of it we have nothing to do.

STATE of Minnesota, Resp't.,

M. L. GLADSON, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. Held, chapter 60, Laws 1893, requiring railroad companies to stop all regular passenger trains at county seats, is not unconstitutional or void, either as being an unreasonable regulation or as interfering with interstate commerce.

2. Held, further, said statute is not void as to a train carrying United States mail, which also carries passengers between points within this state.

(June 1, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Pine County convicting him of failure to stop a train on which he was engineer at a county seat, as required by the state statutes. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. J. D. Armstrong and Bunn & Hadley, for appellant:

The legislature cannot own and operate the railroads.

*Headnotes by CANTY, J.

NOTE.—See in connection with the above case the leading case of Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People cited therein and reported in 19 L. R. A. 119. 24 L. R. A.

Ripps v. Becker (Minn.) 23 L. R. A. 357.

This involves the conclusion that they cannot operate or run railroads without owning them.

The province of the legislature is restricted to regulation; and regulation must be reasonable. It must fall under one of the recognized heads of legislative power, as the police power, or the rate-making power, which latter is probably a branch of the police power. Unreasonable, arbitrary and unwarranted regulation ceases to be lawful and becomes a legislative taking of property without "due process of law."

There are fundamental rights, the rights of liberty and property, which the legislature cannot disregard.

State v. Billings (Minn.) Jan. 25, 1894.

The right of property includes the right of the owner to sell and to use it in customary and harmless ways.

Evison v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 484, 45 Minn. 378.

The legislative power to fix rates must be limited by the courts to the fixing of reasonable rates.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209.

This law if good involves the power to confiscate and destroy.

Every train must stop at every county seat. If at county seats, the legislature may add, "at every side track," or in the country, "at intervals of one mile." No reason or necessity underlies the duty to stop, for the law says all trains must, and whether there is a passenger or not. The regulation is purely arbitrary and unreasonable; invented by some statesman who wished to score a point against corporations.

This statute is a regulation of interstate commerce not within the power of the state.

The carriage of passengers and express by this train from St. Paul to West Superior was interstate commerce, though there was a transfer at West Duluth to another connecting train running to Superior.

Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 572, 30 L. ed. 249, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 81; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 894, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178; The "Daniel Ball", 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999.

Except as to necessary and reasonable police regulations resting on the rule in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, the states have no power to burden interstate commerce.

Non-action by congress is equivalent to a declaration that commerce between states shall be free.

The police power in its broadest sense is founded on the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas."

Therefore, every legitimate police law must be an enactment in the line of compelling the use of one's own rights so as not to injure others.

It is in the discretion of the postmaster general to determine at what hours the mail shall arrive at and depart from postoffices. Upon this point his decision is absolute and cannot be controlled by the states.

The road in question is a post-road, and the postal service thereon is committed to the United States by the constitution.

If the legislature can pass this law it can cripple and impede the United States mail service.

The Statute (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 8995) makes it unlawful to willfully hinder, delay, or obstruct the passage of the mail, or any person, or vehicle carrying the same.

This statute prevents the levy of a civil writ on a train or carriage so engaged.

Messrs. H. W. Childs and George B. Edgerton, for respondent:

The same question has been raised before in another action brought in Pine county against the same appellant, who is one of the engineers in the employ of the St. Paul & Duluth Railroad Company. The appellant was convicted and after his conviction applied to the United States Supreme Court for the District of Minnesota for a writ of habeas corpus.

The court remanded the prisoner.

The position taken by Judge Williams in that case has been fully sustained by a number of well considered cases.

No court has yet been bold enough to attempt to define with exactness the limits to the exercise of this power.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 85.

The courts, however, agree in giving it a wide scope, so as to include all regulations having relation to what is variously termed the "public welfare," "public prosperity," "common good," and "public well being."

Chambers*, 36 Minn. 69.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 657.

The argument that "if public necessities require trains the railroads may be compelled to run and stop them," might have some force if the act applied to ordinary way stations.

But see Pennsylvania Co. v. Wentz, 37 Ohio, St. 833; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 108 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; State v. New Haven & N. Co. supra.

It is not, however, the amount of business transacted at the county seats through the county officials, alone, that distinguishes these places from the ordinary railroad station, but its close relation to the general welfare, as well.

If the law has some relation to the public welfare, then the legislature had the power to pass it, and with the legislature was lodged the power to determine the necessity for the law.

Mugler v. Kansas and Munn v. Illinois, supra; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 718, 25 L. ed. 501; Powell v. Pennsylvania, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 220, 221.

For protection against abuses by legislatures, the people must resort to the polls, not to the courts.

Butler v. Chambers, supra; Wisconsin v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 484, 45 Minn. 373; Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 22 L. R. A. 857. See also *Metropolitan Board of Excise v. If every police regulation which incidentally affects commerce is for that reason obnoxious to the constitution, the term "police power" means nothing, and the state is denied the power which even counsel for appellant concedes belongs to it.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pine City is a village of 800 inhabitants, the county seat of Pine county, and a station on the St. Paul & Duluth Railroad. The defendant was an engineer on a passenger train on said railroad, and was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced in justice court for failing to stop his train at Pine City. He appealed to the district court, and was there again convicted and sentenced, and appeals to this court. The statute under which he was convicted is chapter 60, Laws of 1893, which reads as follows: "All regular passenger trains, run by any common carrier operating a railway in this state, or by any receiver, agent, lessee or trustee of said common carrier, shall stop a sufficient length of time at its stations at all county seats within this state to take on and discharge passengers from such trains with safety, and any engineer, conductor or other agent, servant or employé of, or any person acting for such common carrier or for any receiver, agent, lessee, or trustee of such common carrier, who violates any provision of this act is guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than one hundred dollars, or by an than ten days nor more than three months; provided, however, that this act shall not apply to through railroad trains entering this state from any other state, or to transcontinental trains of any railroad." This train was a fast express, running from St. Paul and Minneapolis to Duluth, stopping only at railroad crossings and junctions, but not at stations on the way. Besides this train, there were two other passenger trains and one accommodation train run each way every day, which stopped at Pine City.

1. It is contended by appellant that this law is so unreasonable and oppressive as against the railroad company that it is unconstitutional and void. We are not of that opinion. While it seems to us that it is rather drastic legislation to compel this train, which is designed only for through traffic, and stops at no other stations en route to stop at this one station while there are so many other trains to do the local business, still we cannot substitute our judgment for that of the legislature. There are reasons in support of the law on which the legislature had a right to come to the conclusion at which they arrived. Besides, this law does not apply alone to this train, this county seat, and this railroad, but to all railroads, all county seats, and, with a few exceptions, to all trains; and there are not the same reasons for assailing such a general law merely because it works hardship or inconvenience in exceptional cases as if it worked such hardship or inconvenience in all cases to mon carriers which the legislature has the power to impose, and it is certainly not so unjust and unreasonable that the courts should declare it void. See Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 657, and Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People, 143 Ill. 484, 19 L. R. A. 119, where a similar law is held valid.

2. The evidence showed that, while the train in question ran only to Duluth, one third of the passengers it carried were carried on through tickets to Superior, Wis., and were transferred at Duluth to another train, which connected with this one, and carried these passengers to Superior. The train being used to some extent in the business of interstate commerce, it is contended for this reason that the legislature had no right to impose this regulation on it. We do not agree with counsel for appellant. While it is not necessary to put it on so narrow a ground, we will say that this is not a regulation of interstate traffic, but most distinctively a regulation of local traffic, for the purposes of which the train was required to be stopped.

3. The evidence showed that the train in question carried the United States mail and it is contended that for this reason the regulation was void. The point is without merit.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

So ordered.

v.

Sallie L. CHOWNING.

(36 Tex. 354)

1. A statute making a life or health insurance company liable for damages and attorney's fees in case of failure to pay a loss within the time specified in the policy does not deny such companies the equal protection of the laws.
2. A constitutional guaranty of equal rights and privileges to all free men does not apply to corporations.
3. A constitutional provision against special laws regulating practice in the courts does not apply to a statute making insurance companies liable to damages and attorneys' fees in case of default in payment of policies.

5. A law constitutionally enacted, which affords a hearing before it condemns, and provides for judgment after trial, does not deprive of property, privileges, or immunities without due course of the law of the land.

6. A statute providing penalties for breach of contract cannot be held unconstitutional merely on the ground that it is against the genius, nature, and spirit of the government and general principles of law and reason.

7. An assignment of error embracing three distinct propositions without specifying the error complained of is insufficient.

8. The very question of law is not certified within the meaning of the Texas Act of May 2, 1893, by presenting a petition of plaintiff covering a number of pages with exceptions thereto.

QUESTIONS CERTIFIED by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for failure to promptly pay the amount due under an insurance policy in which a judgment has been entered in favor of plaintiff. Opinion in plaintiff's favor returned.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Bassett, Seay & Muse and Ramsey, Maxwell & Ramsey for appellant.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of civil appeals for the fifth supreme judicial district has certified to this court the following questions and statement: "In the above-entitled cause the following issues of law arise, which this court deems advisable to present to the supreme court of the state of Texas for adjudication, to wit: Question 1. Article 2953, Rev. Stat. provides as follows: 'Penalty for Failure to Pay Loss. In all cases where a loss occurs and the life or health insurance company liable therefor shall fail to pay the same within the time specified in the policy, after demand made therefor, such company shall be liable to pay the holder of such policy, in addition to the amount of the loss, twelve per cent damages on the amount of such loss, together with all reasonable attorney's fees for the prosecution and collection of such loss.' Is this statute, in providing for recovery of damages or attorney's fees, violative of the constitution of this state or the Constitution of the United States, or is it valid and legitimate legislation? Question 2. The first, second, and third assignments of error in this case are as follows: 'First assignment of error: The court erred in its several rulings upon the issue of alleged waiver by the defendant of the forfeiture of the policy sued on: (1) in overruling the defendant's exceptions to the plaintiff's first supplemental petition, alleging such waiver, and setting up defendant's alleged custom of dealing with its policy holders; (2) in refusing the several special charges requested by the defendant numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, and 10, relating to that issue, and in submitting the same to the jury, as was done in the general charge, and in the second special charge given at the plaintiff's request; (8) in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial, based on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict in that respect. Second assignment of error: The court erred in its several rulings touching the alleged agreement between the defendant and Reeves & Chowning and A. O. Reeves, by which they were to act as agents of the defendant in making loans and soliciting insurance, and the alleged services rendered by them under said agreement, (1) in overruling the defendant's exceptions to the plaintiff's supplemental petition alleging said agreement and services; and (2) in admitting evidence, over defendant's objections, relating thereto, as shown by defendant's bill of exceptions in that behalf. Third assignment of error: The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant in its fourteenth special charge, relating to the effect of Chowning's alleged agreement to surrender the policy, and his alleged determination not to pay the premium notes, and its fifteenth and sixteenth special charges, relating to the alleged tender of the premium by the witness Williams, and instructing the jury as was done in the court's charge in chief and in the special charges given at plaintiff's request in relation to said several matters."

For appellant it is claimed that article 2953, Rev. Stat., denies to the class of corporations embraced in its provisions the equal protection of the law, contrary to the prohibition contained in section 1 of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore void. The reason assigned in support of this contention is that all corporations engaged in the business of insurance are not embraced in the terms of the law; but is not claimed that all corporations embraced in the classes named are not affected alike by its provisions. In 1891 the legislature of this state enacted a law defining who are and who are not fellow servants, which related only to employees of railroad companies. In Campbell v. Cook (decided by this court at its present term), 86 Tex. 686, that law was under consideration with the same objection made to it, and based upon the same reasons, as are here urged against the article of the statute now in question; and this court held that the act was not liable to the objection, quoting from Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 209, 32 L. ed. 108, as follows: "When legislation applies to particular bodies or associations, imposing upon them additional liabilities, it is not open to the objection that it denies to them equal protection of the laws, if all persons brought under its influence are treated alike under the same conditions." Pembina Canal, Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 189, 81 L. ed. 652, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 853, 85 L. ed. 1040, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 810; Charlotte, O. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 391, 85 L. ed. 1053; New York v. Squire, 145 U. S. 175, 86 L. ed. 666.

This rule is equally applicable to the defendant in this case and to the law under consideration. All persons of its class are treated alike under like conditions. The article of the statutes is not liable to the objection that it denies to appellant the equal protection of the law.

Appellant's counsel assert that the article in question is in conflict with article 1, § 3, of the Constitution of the state of Texas, which is in these words: "All free men when they form a social compact are entitled to equal rights, and no man, nor set of men, is entitled to exclusive, separate public emoluments or privileges but in consideration of public services." It is not shown just how the law violates this section, and, indeed, it would be difficult to imagine how a corporation which has no natural rights could be said to be entitled to such rights and privileges as grow out of the formation of a social compact. It is the creature of law, and entitled to just such rights as the law grants to it. When granted, such rights are protected from invasion the same as the rights of any natural person.

Section 18 reads as follows: "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishment inflicted. All courts shall be open, and every person for an injury done him in his lands, justice, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law." The contention is that the exacting of an attorney's fee in case judgment shall be recovered against the insurance company prevents the free resort to the courts. We are referred to Dillingham v. Putnam (Tex.) 14 S. W. Rep. 803, as authority for this position, but that case was decided upon a different principle. That statute required receivers in all cases upon appeal to give bond for double the amount of the debt or judgment recovered. It was held that, as the receiver was but a fiduciary, this provision would in many cases prevent appeals altogether, and for that reason was void. In this case the party is not required to pay the fee or the damages as a condition precedent to making a defense, but only in case the defense is not maintained. The 12 per cent is given as damages for a failure to comply with the contract by payment, and the attorney's fees are allowed as compensation for the costs of collecting the debt.

Section 19 is as follows: "No citizen of this state shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, privileges, or immunities, or in any manner disfranchised except by the due course of law of the land." Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, adopts, as the best definition, that given by Mr. Webster in the Dartmouth College Case, of the term "due course of the law of the land," which is: "By the 'law of the land' is most clearly intended the general law; a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial." A law which is enacted by the legislature in the exercise of its constitutional powers, and which affords a hearing before it condemns, and renders judgment after trial, is not in violation of this provision of the constitution. The law in question gives to the persons coming within its provisions all of these safeguards, and is valid in that respect. Finally it is said that this act is in violation of article 8, § 56, subdiv. 16, as being a special law regulating practice in the courts. In the first place, it does not regulate the practice except in so far as the awarding of costs may be so considered. It is not a special law, because it applies to all cases that come under the provisions of the statute, and to all persons embraced in its terms. Dillingham v. Putnam, supra.

Appellant claims that the 12 per cent which the statute gives as damages for a failure to pay when due, and the attorney's fees, are penalties for the breach of the contract, and that the legislature has no authority to inflict penalties for the breach of private contracts. The attorney's fees are not given for the breach of the contract. They cannot be recovered except upon a failure to maintain the defense. No right to an attorney's fee attaches upon the failure to pay; it is cost given to reimburse the plaintiff for expenses incurred in enforcing the contract. If it be conceded that the 12 per cent is a penalty for a failure to pay when due, then the question arises, By what provision of our constitution is such legislation forbidden, and who will determine as to when the public is so interested in the enforcement of contracts as to justify the legislature in enforcing their performance by penalties? There is no clause of our state constitution which expressly or by implication prohibits the act. But it is said that "the genius, the nature, and the spirit of our state government amount to a prohibition of such acts, and the general principles of law and reason forbid them." Durkee v. Janesville, 23 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Rep. 500; Wilder v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 70 Mich. 885; State v. Goodwill, 23 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. A. 621. We are also referred to San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Wilson (Tex.) 19 S. W. Rep. 910, as sustaining this proposition. That case rests upon a construction of article 10, § 2, of our Constitution, the correctness of which we are not called upon to determine, which was held to prohibit that character of legislation as to contracts between a railroad company and their employes. We do not understand the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in that case to assert the doctrine contended for. It is sufficient to say that the case is not in point as authority upon this question. The powers of our state government are divided into three distinct departments, each of which is confined to a separate body of magistracy; the legislative functions to one, the executive to another, and the judicial to a third. Each of these departments is expressly prohibited from exercising a power conferred upon either of the others. State Const. art. 2. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (pages 154, 155), after treating of various limitations on the legislative power, says: "Besides the limitations on legislative authority to which we have referred, others exist which do not call for special remark. Some of these are prescribed by the constitution, but others spring from the very nature of free government. The latter must depend for their enforcement upon legislative wisdom, discretion, and conscience. The legislature is to make laws for the public good, and not for the benefit of individuals. . . . But what is for the public good, and what are public purposes, and what does properly constitute a public burden, are questions which the legislature must decide upon its own judgment, and in respect to which it is vested with large discretion, which cannot be controlled by courts, except perhaps where its action is clearly evasive, and when, under the pretense of lawful authority, it has assumed to exercise one that is unlawful. Where the power which is exercised is legislative in its character, the courts can enforce only those limitations which the constitution imposes, not those implied restrictions which, resting in theory only, the people have been satisfied to leave to the judgment, patriotism, and sense of justice of their representatives." State v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198; Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 22 L. R. A. 483. The justice or injustice, good or bad policy, of the law was for the legislature. The article is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or of the state of Texas, and is valid.

The first assignment is subdivided into three propositions, each pointing out a particular ground of error, and, if separated, would each be sufficient as a distinct assignment of error. The second subdivision specifies seven distinct charges that were refused, of which five appear in the brief of appellant. These are but statements in different forms of one proposition of law, and may be considered together; but as to the other two we cannot tell, as they are not submitted to this court. The second assignment is likewise subdivided as the first, and presents in different forms alleged error of the court upon one proposition,—the alleged agreement between the parties. These assignments are irregular in the manner of presenting the points, but should not be considered as void, the different errors being pointed out by the assignments. The third assignment embraces at least three distinct propositions, and does not separately specify to the court the particular error complained of. It should not be considered. The third and fourth questions do not submit to this court questions of law to be answered, but present to this court the supplemental petition of plaintiff, covering a number of pages, and the defendant's exceptions thereto, and call upon the court to deduce therefrom the questions of law arising thereon, and to answer the questions thus deduced therefrom. Section 35 of the Act organizing the court of civil appeals, as amended by an act approved May 2, 1893, requires the court of civil appeals to certify the very question of law to be decided. For reasons more fully expressed in the case of Waco Water & Light Co. v. Waco (86 Tex. 661), this court declines to answer questions 3 and 4.

Minerals reserved upon the dedication for street purposes of the soil covering them will pass by the owner's conveyance by number and reference to the plat of the lots bordering on the street, if the conveyance makes no mention of them.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vernon County in favor of defendants in an ejectment proceeding to recover the minerals under a certain street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

It is competent for the owner to convey his mines by a separate and distinct grant so as to create one freehold in the soil and another in the mines.

Wardell v. Watson, 93 Mo. 107; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. § 81, p. 416, *625.

No one but the owner of the land in fee can dedicate it or the use of it to the public, and it is moreover essential to a dedication that the owner should intend what he does as a dedication.

Cummings v. St. Louis, 90 Mo. 259.

The difference between statutory and common law dedications is that one vests the legal title of the ground set apart for public purposes in the municipal corporation in trust for the public while the other leaves the legal title in the original owner charged with the right and interests in the public which it would have if the fee were in the corporation.

Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 118 Ill. 61; Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. La Salle, 117 Ill. 411.

At common law a dedication to public uses in cases where there is no express grant to a grantee upon condition, operates by way of an estoppel in pais of the owner rather than by grant or the transfer of an interest in land.

If the grantor wishes to except anything out of what he may in general terms have granted, it is proper that such exception should follow the description of the thing granted, and it comes therefore under the head of premises in a deed, as an exception in the taking of something out of the thing granted which would otherwise pass by the deed.

Black, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment to recover "all the lead and zinc mines" in that part of Allen street which lies east of lot 16, in Hough & Furnas' addition to Webb City. Lot 16 fronts 50 feet on the west line of the street, and the street is 62 feet wide, so that the surface of the ground in question is 50 by 62 feet. The essential facts are these: A. W. Hough and Isaac Furnas, being the owners of 16 acres of land, laid the same off into lots, streets, and alleys. At the same time they executed the following deed: "We, A. W. Hough and Isaac Furnas, owners of the land described in the annexed plat of Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City, do hereby release and convey to Jasper county, in the state of Missouri, for public purposes, all the streets and alleys as designated on said plat, except the right to all valuable minerals in said land, which we hereby reserve, together with the right to mine the same." This deed bears date the 28d May, 1877. It and the plat were recorded on the 16th June, 1877. On the last-mentioned date, Hough conveyed his half interest in lots 1 to 36, both inclusive, to Furnas, "together with all valuable minerals in the streets and alleys of said additions east of the middle of Webb street, as reserved on the recorded plat thereof." Webb street is the first north and south street west of Allen street, and lots 1 to 36 include all the lots east of Webb street. Allen street runs north and south, and is wholly on the 16 acres. The east line of that street is the east line of the addition. Hough & Furnas owned no land adjoining the street on the east. On the 16th June, 1877, Furnas conveyed the 36 lots, describing them by their numbers, and making no mention of the minerals in the streets or alleys, to O'Keef, as trustee, to secure a debt of $612. He made default in the payment of the debt, and the lots were sold under the terms of the deed of trust; and Pinney became the purchaser, and received a trustee's deed, dated the 8th August, 1887. The defendants hold under Pinney by various mesne conveyances. The plaintiff put in evidence two deeds executed in June, 1889,—one from Furnas to Bell, and the other from Bell to the plaintiff,—conveying the right to all valuable minerals in the streets and alleys in Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City, east of the center of Webb street, with the right to mine the same. The defendants entered, and removed a large quantity of lead and zinc from beneath the surface of that part of the street in question. They were still in possession when this suit was commenced.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that Furnas became the sole proprietor of all the lots east of Webb street, and of all the minerals in the streets and alleys east of the center of that street, so that he was the owner of the minerals in Allen street. The question in the case is whether his deed to O'Keef, conveying the lots by their numbers and reference to the recorded plat, but making no mention of the minerals in the streets, conveyed the minerals in the streets and alleys. If it did, then the judgment, which was for the defendants, must be affirmed; but, if it did not, the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

The rule of law is well settled in this country, and in England, that a conveyance of land bounded upon a public street carries the fee to the center of the street, unless the contrary intent is clearly expressed. The authorities asserting this rule are so numerous that it is deemed sufficient to cite the text-books where the cases are collected. 8 Kent, Com. 18th ed. 433; Dogan v. Sekright, 4 Am. Lead. Cas. Real Prop. 378; 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 1024; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 549; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 451; Ang. & D. Highways, 3d ed. § 814; Devoston v. Payne, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 178. And, where a plat represents the lots to be bounded by a street, a deed referring to the plat, and describing the lots conveyed by their numbers, will pass to the grantee, as against the grantor and his assigns, the fee to the center of the street. Jarstad v. Morgan, 48 Wis. 245; Gould v. Eastern R. Co. 142 Mass. 85; Clark v. Parker, 106 Mass. 554; Banks v. Ogden, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 57; Weissbrod v. Chi- cago & N. W. R. Co. 18 Wis. 35, 86 Am. Dec. 743; Cox v. Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. 48 Ind. 178.

It is held in two or three states that the center-line rule does not apply where the plat is made out and recorded in conformity with the statutes of such states upon that subject; but this is because the courts of those states hold that the statutes vest the entire title, beneficial and otherwise, in the corporation, so that the dedicatory has no interest left in him, which is the subject of grant. As to the cases asserting this rule, more will be said hereafter. In some cases the rule that the center of the street is to be taken as the boundary will be extended so as to include the whole street, as where one lays out a street entirely on his own land, and on one side thereof, so that the boundary of the land and the boundary of the street coincide. Herley v. Babbitt, 14 R. I. 533; Re Robbins, 34 Minn. 99, 57 Am. Rep. 40; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 102. Such is the case now in hand.

But it is earnestly insisted that the general rule before stated has no proper or just application to this case, because Hough & Furnas had, by the deed of dedication, separated the materials in the streets so as to make them a separate estate in fee. It may be well enough, here, to determine the exact character of the estate retained by Hough & Furnas. An exception in a deed is always a part of a thing in being, and a part of the thing granted, while a reservation is of a thing not in being, and is newly created, as rents and the like. Co. Litt. 476, 147. An exception withdraws from the operation of the conveyance some part of the thing granted, which, but for the exception, would have passed to the grantee under the general description, while a reservation is the creation, in behalf of the grantor, of some new right issuing out of the thing granted; that is to say, something which did not exist as an independent right. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 455, and cases cited. The terms are often used without noting the distinction, and this, no doubt, for the reason that that which is called a "reservation" in a deed will be construed to mean an exception, where it is necessary to do so to carry out the object which the parties to the deed had in view. Winthrop v. Fairbanks, 41 Me. 307. The language used in the deed must be considered with reference to the subject-matter and the circumstances of the particular case. Barnes v. Hurt, 38 Conn. 541; Stockwell v. Couillard, 129 Mass. 232; Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197. There can be no doubt but the qualifying words used in the deed from Hough & Furnas to the county amount to an exception, the thing excepted from the grant being the "valuable minerals" in the streets and alleys. The minerals thus excepted remained in the grantors in the same right as before the grant, and passed to Furnas by the deed to him from Hough. Coal, mineral, and stone under the surface of the earth are subjects of grant and exception, and, when excepted in a deed, become a separate and distinct inheritance. They may be conveyed separately from the surface. Wardell v. Watson, 93 Mo. 108; 17 L. ed. 82; Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Lullibridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co. 143 Pa. 293, 13

L. R. A. 627; Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon, 153 Pa. 286, 18 L. R. A. 702. Furnas, therefore, had an estate in fee in the mineral in place beneath the surface of the streets reserved by the exception in the deed dedicating the streets to public use. Does this circumstance take the grant made by him to O'Keef out of the general rule before mentioned,—that a conveyance of land bounded on a street carries the entire fee to the center of the street? In answering this question, it is deemed proper to see upon what ground the rule is founded, the reason upon which it is based. Says Kent: "The established inference of law is that a conveyance of land bounded on a public highway carries with it the fee to the center of the road, as part and parcel of the grant. The idea of an intention in the grantor to withhold his interest in a road, to the middle of it, after parting with all his right and title to the adjoining land, is never to be presumed. It would be contrary to universal practice. . . . It would require an express declaration, or something equivalent thereto, to sustain such an inference; and it may be considered as the general rule that a grant of land bounded upon a highway or river carries the fee in the highway or river to the center of it, provided the grantor at the time owned to the center, and there be no words of specific description to show a contrary intent." 8 Kent, Com. 18th ed. 483. He uses almost the exact language used in the very early—and now leading—case of Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 108, 6 Am. Dec. 216. Redfield, J., when speaking of the views expressed by Kent, said: "But, if anything whatever is attempted to be made out of the rule, beyond a mere show, the reasoning of the chancellor is the only ground upon which it can stand; that is, to treat it as a rule of policy, merely, and not one of intent, chiefly, to be applied in all cases where there is not a clearly defined intention to the contrary." In Baker v. St. Louis, 7 Mo. App. 429, approved by this court in 75 Mo. 671, two persons owning in common a block of ground upon a street conveyed a strip next to the street to the city for the purpose of widening the street so as to give space for a market house, with a clause of reverter in the event the property should not be used for such purposes. Before breach of the condition subsequent, these two persons executed deeds of partition, describing the parcel conveyed to each as bounded on the street. In a controversy commenced after the breach of the condition, it was held that the partition deeds carried the fee to the center of the street, subject to the public easement, as there was no express reservation to the contrary.

Enough has been said to show that the rule stands on the ground of policy, and a presumption raised by the law to carry out the policy. The presumption is that the grantor did not intend to withhold any interest in the street or highway. The presumption may be overcome, but it must be overcome by something stated in the deed, which shows clearly and distinctly an intention to withhold an interest in the street. The rule is of the utmost importance, and is necessary to prevent afterthought strifes and litigation, like the one now in hand, over detached strips and gores of land, generally of no value to any one save the lot owner. In 24 L. R. A.

the vast majority of cases the rule works out the real intention of the parties at the date of the deed. The rule being based upon these grounds, we cannot see how its application can be made to depend upon the extent of the interest which the grantor may have in the street, there being some interest in him. In a common-law dedication, whether by parol or in writing, and where property has been condemned for street purposes alone, the fee from the surface to the center of the earth remains in the owner. In all such cases a conveyance of a lot bounded by a street will pass the fee to the center of the street. Here, Hough & Furnas conveyed the streets to the county for public use,—that is to say, for street purposes,—and then excepted the minerals. If the center of the street rule applies where the grantor owns the fee from the surface to the center of the earth, how can it be said it does not apply because he simply owns the fee to the minerals, or to a stratum of rock or coal? The reason for applying the rule is as strong in the one case as it is in the other. As the deed of trust from Furnas to O'Keef contains no exception or reservation, the minerals in the streets and alleys passed by that deed as a part and parcel of the land granted.

This conclusion, it is believed, finds support in Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Withers, 83 Ala. 198. It is there said: "In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a conveyance of land bounded by a public highway, or of lots in a city, bounded by a public street, carries with it the fee to the center of such road or street, as a part and parcel of the grant; and the grantee has the exclusive right to the soil, subject to the right of way implied from the original dedication, whatever that right may be held to embrace, which varies with the decisions of the different courts;" thus showing, in the opinion of that court, that the application of the rule does not depend on the extent of the right vested in the public. In Tousley v. Galena Min. & Smelting Co., 24 Kan. 828, the mining company filed a plat, and thereby laid off a tract of land into lots; dedicating the streets and alleys to public use, but setting forth in such dedication that it reserved to itself all the mineral under the surface of the streets and alleys. The company then sold two lots to Tousley and Neal without any reservation or condition. The latter mined from these lots under the half of the street next to them, and the mining company brought an action for damages. The court waived the question whether the reservation was void under the statute of that state concerning town plats, but said: "Conceding that the reservation was valid,—that the fee did not pass to the public,—then it seems to us that the warranty deed of the lots conveyed all the grantor's interest in the street up to the center. That such was the rule at common law will not be questioned." There is, in point of principle, no difference between that case and the one now in hand. Indeed, it is directly in point, and the conclusion there expressed is in entire accord with what we have before said in this case.

Counsel for the plaintiff place much reliance upon Matthiesen & H. Zinc Co. v. La Salle, 117 Ill. 411. That case, and the prior one of Illinois & M. Canal Trustees v. Haven, 11 Ill.

354; and the subsequent case of Union Coal Co. v. La Salle, 136 Ill. 119, 12 L. R. A. 326, hold that, where a plat has been executed and filed pursuant to the statute of that state, the lot owners have no right to remove coal from beneath the surface of the streets, and that a conveyance of a lot bounded by a street carries no interest whatever in the street. A like construction is given to a statute in Iowa relating to town plats. Des Moines v. Hall, 24 Iowa, 286. See also Hawesville Trustees v. Hawes, 6 Bush, 232.

These cases are all based upon the construction given by those courts to the statute of their respective states, and that construction is this: That upon executing and filing a plat, pursuant to the statute, the entire fee in the streets passes to the corporation. The dedicatory and his grantees, it is held, have no interests in the streets, legal or otherwise, except that in common with the public, namely, the right of passage over them. We are at a loss to see how these cases aid or assist the plaintiff. If the principle at the bottom of them be applied to this case, it must follow that Furnas had nothing which he could convey, either to O'Keef or to the plaintiff's grantor, and the plaintiff acquired nothing by the deed to her. But these cases have no application to this one, for it is conceded on all hands that Furnas had an interest which he could convey. It may be observed that an entirely different construction has been given to the statutes of Wisconsin and Minnesota concerning town plats, which statutes are said to be the same as that of Illinois. Kimball v. Kenosha, 4 Wis. 321; Milwaukee v. Milwaukee & B. R. Co. 7 Wis. 98; Schurmeier v. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 10 Minn. 82, 88 Am. Dec. 59. Our statute in force when Hough & Furnas executed the deed of the county provides that such maps and plats, made, acknowledged, certified, and recorded as provided, "shall be a sufficient conveyance to vest the fee of such parcels of land as are therein named, described, or intended for public use in such city, town, or village, when incorporated, in trust and for the uses therein named, expressed, or intended, and for no other use or purpose. If such city, town, or village shall not be incorporated, then the fee of such lands conveyed as aforesaid, shall be vested in the proper county in like trust, and for the uses and purposes aforesaid, and no other." While this statute vests the fee in the streets in the city, town, village, or county, still it is held in trust for street purposes, and for no other use or purpose. Every other beneficial use is in the lot owners, and this interest of the lot owners will pass by a conveyance of the lot. No other deduction can be made from the cases heretofore decided by this court. Hannibal Bridge Co. v. Schaubacher, 57 Mo. 584; Price v. Thompson, 48 Mo. 361; Ferrenbach v. Turner, 86 Mo. 416, 56 Am. Rep. 437, and cases cited. But it is unnecessary to pursue the inquiry, because the dedication in question was not a statutory one, and because it is conceded on both sides of this contest that Furnas owned the minerals in the streets and alleys; and we have before seen that his title to the minerals in the streets and alleys passed as part and parcel of the grant to O'Keef.

24 T. R. A.

Counsel for plaintiff place much reliance upon Kincaid v. McGowan, 88 Ky. 91, 13 L. R. A. 289. We have before said that mineral in place may be made the subject of an exception, or of a separate grant, and therefore agree to all that is said in that case. No question as to the effect to be given to a deed conveying lots bounded by a street or highway was considered or involved in that case. It is therefore not in point on the real issue here.

An effort is made in the briefs filed on behalf of the plaintiff on the reargument of this cause in this court to show that Hough & Furnas, in platting the sixteen acres retained a strip of land along the east side of Allen street. If they did retain such a strip, then it is very clear that the deed of trust from Furnas to O'Keef passed the title in that street only to the center thereof, so that the plaintiff would be the owner of the minerals in the east half of it. But no such question was made, or even intimated, in the trial court, and hence there is no such question before us on this appeal. The monuments placed on the ground when locating the streets and lots must control, and there is nothing in the record to show that the east line of Allen street was not located on the east line of the sixteen acres. As the record stands, there can be no other conclusion than this: That the east line of the sixteen acres and the east line of Allen street are one and the same line. It follows from what has been said that the judgment should be and is affirmed.

Brace, J., dissenting:

This is an action in ejectment to recover possession of "all the lead and zinc mineral and mines in and under the ground of a certain described portion of Allen street in Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City, Missouri." The answer is a general denial. The case was tried by the court without a jury; the defendants admitted possession; the finding and judgment was for the defendants; and the plaintiff appeals.

It was admitted that A. W. Hough and wife and Isaac Furnas are the common source of title. Hough and wife, by warranty deed of date April 18, 1877, conveyed an undivided half of the tract upon which said addition is located to Isaac Furnas. By deed and plat dated May 23, 1877, duly acknowledged and recorded June 16, 1877, Hough and wife and Furnas laid out and dedicated their addition to Webb City. The deed is as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that we, Augustus W. Hough and Martha W. Hough, his wife, and Isaac Furnas, owners of the land described in the annexed plat of Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City, do hereby release and convey to Jasper county in the state of Missouri, for public purposes, all the streets and alleys as designated on said plat, except the right to all valuable minerals in said land, which we hereby reserve, together with the right to mine the same. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 23d day of May, A. D. 1877. A. W. Hough. [Seal]. Martha W.

Hough. [Seal.] Isaac Furnas. [Seal.]" Afterwards, the said Hough and wife, by warranty deed dated June 18, 1877, acknowledged and recorded on the same day, conveyed to the said Isaac Furnas the undivided half of lots numbered 1 to 36, inclusive, "together with all valuable minerals in the streets and alleys of said addition to Webb City east of the middle of Webb street, as reserved on the recorded plat thereof." By deed bearing the same date, but acknowledged and recorded on the 18th of June, 1877, the said Isaac Furnas conveyed the same lots by the same numbers to E. O'Keef, party of the second part, "to have and to hold the same, with the appurtenances, to the party of the second part, and to his successor or successors in this trust, and to him and his grantees and assigns, forever." "In trust, however," to secure the payment of a certain promissory note therein set out to "D. S. Thomas, cashier of the First National Bank of Carthage," party of the third part. Allen street is east of Webb street, and, of the lots conveyed, those numbered from 1 to 18, inclusive, front on the west side of Allen street, the east line of which forms the eastern boundary of the addition, and are all the lots in the addition fronting on that street, and those numbered from 19 to 36, inclusive, front on the east side of Webb street. There was a sale under this deed of trust, and a deed executed to the purchaser, and the defendants claim title under this deed of trust. On the 8d of June, 1889, the said Isaac Furnas et ux., by warranty deed of that date duly executed and acknowledged, and recorded on the 5th day of June, 1889, conveyed to Oliver D. Bell "all of the streets and alleys east of the middle of Webb street in Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City, Missouri, or the right of all valuable minerals therein, together with the right to mine the same, as reserved when said streets and alleys were dedicated, more particularly described as follows," etc. Afterwards, Bell and wife conveyed the same in like manner to plaintiff, and she claims title under this deed from Furnas, so that Furnas is in fact the common grantor under whom both claim, and from whom the plaintiff derains a perfect legal chain of title to the premises claimed, unless those premises were included in the deed of trust previously made by him to O'Keefe, under which the defendants claim. As the answer was simply a general denial, all we have to deal with here is the legal title, and, as the action is ejectment, the plaintiff cannot recover unless she hold the legal title. She has the legal title unless it passed to O'Keef by the deed of trust. If it did so pass, she has not the legal title, and, so far as this inquiry is concerned, it makes no difference whether that title is in the defendants or outstanding, she cannot recover. The only question in the case is solved when it is satisfactorily determined what the deed of trust did actually convey.

It is important to inquire, first, what Furnas owned in respect of these premises when he executed the deed of trust. He certainly owned, in fee simple absolute, all that part of the tract east of the middle of Webb street to the east boundary of the addition, which included the whole of Allen street except so much thereof as was granted to the county for public purposes in the deed of dedication, just as he and Hough owned it before the execution of that deed. While in this instance a plat was filed with the deed, and as a part thereof, it was not purely a statutory dedication (Gen. Stat. 1865, chap. 44), but a dedication by deed, and its extent must be measured by the terms of the instrument. While the grant to the public was not of a mere easement or right of way over the soil of the streets and alleys as laid down on the plat, neither was it a grant of the whole corpus of the material defined by and contained between the lines of those thoroughfares; but, within those lines, all was granted usque ad inferos except the "valuable mineral" therein contained. That was expressly reserved to the grantor, "with the right to mine the same." There can be no question that the grantees had the right to thus divide their property, and to dispose of one part and retain the other. "A man entitled to land may grant leases, may grant exclusive herbage, as right of depasturing, a right of way, or a right of game. He may grant the mines underneath, or the right to get the minerals, and other rights in and over the property, or enjoyment of it." "So, the grantees of mines may regrant, and in all these cases the grantee may maintain action in respect of the rights granted." 8 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. p. 361. As was said in Wardell v. Watson, 93 Mo. 107, 111: "Coal and minerals in place are land, and may be conveyed as such, and, when thus conveyed, constitute a separate and distinct inheritance. Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760. . . . A reservation of minerals and of mining rights is construed as an actual grant thereof. Martin v. Brewster Iron Min. Co. 55 N. Y. 538, 14 Am. Rep. 822." The dedicators, after the grant, retained the same right and title to all the "valuable mineral" beneath Allen and the other streets and alleys of the addition that they held before the grant, and Furnas held by grant all their title to that mineral at the time the deed of trust was executed. Did it pass to O'Keef by that deed? The land conveyed by that deed is described by defined boundaries, the metes and bounds being the lines of each lot as they appear on the plat. There are no reservations in the deed; within those boundaries everything was conveyed, to the center of the earth; and, more than this, every appurtenance thereto was conveyed; besides this, nothing was in terms conveyed. The property in controversy is without those boundaries, and, unless appurtenant thereto, were not conveyed by the terms of the deed. "Appurtenance" is defined to be "a thing used with, and related to or dependent upon, another thing more worthy, and agreeing in its nature and quality with the thing whereunto it is appendant or appurtenant. The term, as used in conveyances, passes nothing but the land and such things as belong thereto and are part of the realty. Therefore, when a conveyance is of a piece of land defined by boundaries, 'with appurtenances,' other land not included in the boundaries will not pass as appurtenant to the grant. All that can be claimed as embraced in the word 'appurtenances' are easements and servitudes necessary to the enjoyment of the land conveyed." 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 641, and notes. It is obvious from these definitions that Furnas' title to the "valuable mineral" under Allen street could not, and did not, pass as appurtenant to the lots conveyed in the deed of trust. See also Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447, 8 Am. Dec. 268; Harris v. Elliott, 85 U. S. 10 Pet. 54, 9 L. ed. 844; Buck v. Squiers, 23 Vt. 484. In fact, counsel for defendants do not so contend. Their contention is based upon two propositions: First, that "by the filing of the plat of Hough and Furnas' addition to Webb City the public acquires only an easement in the streets and alleys, the owners retaining their right in the soil for all purposes not inconsistent with such easement;" second, that "the conveyance of a city lot bounded on a street always carries the fee, subject to the public easement, unless there be an express reservation to the contrary; and the reservation, to be effectual, must be made in the deed itself."

The first of these propositions totally ignores the deed, and treats the dedication as a purely statutory one; and, even if it could be so treated, this proposition cannot be maintained, for the statute provides that plats of additions such as this was, "when made, acknowledged, certified, and filed with the recorder, shall be a sufficient conveyance to vest the fee of such parcels of land as are therein named, described or intended for public uses, in such town, city or village," etc. So that, if this was purely a statutory dedication by plat, the city acquired more than a mere easement or right of way for a highway; it acquired the fee in trust for public uses. But, as before stated, this was not such a dedication. The deed cannot be ignored, and the extent of the dedication must be measured by it. "Although the effect of a statutory dedication may be to grant the fee of the streets to the corporation in trust for the public uses, yet, unless prohibited by statute, the proprietor, in laying out a town or addition, may grant the easement simply, and reserve the minerals therein." Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. p. 740, § 629. Here the grant in the deed, though not going to the extent of a statutory dedication without reservation, was, as we have seen, the grant of more than an easement. It was a grant of the fee; of an estate of inheritance; of the whole soil of the streets, and everything thereunto belonging, except "the valuable mineral therein contained," and the right to mine the same. So that in either case the first proposition must fall, and with it the second, which is predicated upon it, if there were no other faults to be found in it. But the second is faulty in many respects. The real proposition which the learned counsel undertake to cover by these two propositions, and which the authorities cited tend to sustain, is that where an owner in fee of a tract of land lays off thereon an addition to a city into lots and blocks, divided by streets and alleys, and grants to the public by deed or plat a simple easement or right of way therein, and afterwards conveys one of the lots by its number as designated on such plat, the conveyance, in the absence of any reservation contained in the deed, will vest the fee in the grantee to the middle of the street or alley on which it abuts, and he may enter upon the street, and appropriate the soil thereof to his own use, for all purposes not inconsistent with such easement. It is obvious that the case in hand is not within the terms of this proposition when thus properly stated. In order to bring it within these terms, it is necessary that, at the time the deed of trust was executed, the public should have had only a simple easement or right of way, and that Furnas should have been the owner in fee of the land over which the public had such right. But, as we have seen, he was not the owner in fee of the land over which the public had such easement or right of way, having theretofore conveyed it by his deed to the county, and, instead of the public having a mere easement over it, the fee thereof was held by the county or city in trust for the public use. That the fee thus conveyed was only a conditional fee, liable to be defeated by a discontinuance of the use of the soil for the public purpose for which it was granted, in which event there might be a reverter of the fee, does not change the fact that by the deed of dedication and plat the fee passed; and in such case, under a statute of Iowa of similar import to ours, it was held that "neither the original proprietor nor his grantees have the right to the subterraneous deposits of coal within the limits of such streets, and the corporation may maintain an action against him for coal mined and taken by him from beneath the same." Des Moines v. Hall, 24 Iowa, 285; distinguished from Dubuque v. Benson, 23 Iowa, 248, in the opinion in the latter case. Of like purport is the case of Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. La Salle, 117 Ill. 411, in which Schofield, J., disposes of the possible distinction suggested between the rights of the lot owner in cases where a fee simple absolute is vested in the municipality and those where a base or determinable fee is so vested, in the following language: "The title vested in the town by the statutory dedication is absolute for the purpose of the statutory trust, until the street shall be subsequently vacated, when it will revert to the dedicator, or, it may be, in cases like the present, to the adjacent lot owner. Possibly at some time in the future there may be a reverter, but this is no reversion. 4 Kent, Com. 8th ed. 872.

"It is too palpable for argument that, until there is a reverter, the lot owner can have no greater right to enter upon and appropriate the soil and minerals of the street to his personal use than a stranger, because his right can only commence in the event, and at the time, the right of the town has ended." Of course, there is not, and never can be, a reverter of the subject-matter of this suit, since there can be a reversion only of that which has been granted, and it was never granted. There may be hereafter a reversion of the soil in which a fee was granted to the city, but such reversion cannot include the "valuable mineral," which was excepted from the grant. This matter is alluded to simply because of the assumption in defendants' contention, that under the deed in this case, or even under a purely statutory dedication, nothing more passes to the municipality or the public than a mere easement, which seems to have nothing more to rest upon than another assumption that a determinable fee, such as the statute vests, is no more than a mere easement. The fact is, the lot owner's rights under the rule, whatever they may be, grow wholly out of the thing granted by the dedicatory, and the relation which he and the dedicatory sustain to that thing, and not to anything reserved. And the arbitrary common-law rule of construction by which the deed of a grantee of a lot to be extended beyond the limits of the grant to the middle of the street is and ought to be strictly limited, so far as the grantor and those claiming under him are concerned, to the subject-matter of the grant, which in this case was the soil of the street, and not the valuable mineral therein contained; and whatever principle he relied upon to sustain the propriety of the rule, whether presumed intent of the parties or grounds of public policy, there is no difficulty in maintaining the propriety of such limitation. Ancient common-law rules of construction should be applied, in the light of the age in which we live. As was happily remarked by the chief justice of Pennsylvania, in the recent case of Charliers Coal Co. v. Mellon, 153 Pa. 286, 18 L. R. A. 702 (decided January 9, 1893), in regard to another rule of the common law: "It is the crowning merit of the common law that it is not composed of ironclad rules, but may be modified, to a reasonable extent, to meet new questions as they arise. This may be called the expansive property of the common law. Mining rights are peculiar, and exist from necessity, and the necessity must be recognized, and the rights of mine and land owners adjusted and protected accordingly. The mining of coal and other minerals is constantly developing new principles. Formerly, a man who owned the surface owned it to the center of the earth; now, the surface of the land may be separated from the different strata underneath it, and there may be as many different owners as there are strata. Lillisbridge v. Lackawanna Coal Co., 148 Pa. 293, 18 L. R. A. 627. . . . In the earlier days of the common law the attention of buyers and sellers, and therefore the attention of the courts, was fixed upon the surface. He who owned the surface owned all that grew upon it, and all that was buried beneath it. His title extended upward to the clouds, and downward to the the earth's center. The value of his estate lay, however, in the arable qualities of the surface, and 24 L. R. A.

with rare exceptions the income derived from it was the result of agriculture." It was upon the surface that the judicial mind, as well as the minds of the owners of real estate, were fixed in early times, when the rule under consideration was adopted and applied to estates, in order that the symmetry of those estates might be maintained, and that strips in use as highways at the time of the grant, and long regarded as the actual boundaries between those estates, might not become, in case of abandonment, the unprofitable heritage of a stranger to those estates, who could subject the owners thereof to insufferable inconvenience by reason of his ownership in case of reverter. The estate which Isaac Furnas held in all the valuable mineral beneath Allen street at the time he executed the deed of trust to O'Keef was exactly the same estate that he and Hough held when they dedicated the streets and alleys of Webb City to the public. By their deed, placed upon the public records, they separated that estate from the streets and alleys, and from all the soil beneath them. By the subsequent deed of Hough to Furnas, in which Hough relinquished to Furnas his undivided half interest in the mineral, the separation of that estate from the soil of the street was again asserted and published upon the public records. In the face of these acts of Furnas, it would be folly to say that he actually intended, when conveying a lot abutting on the street, to convey also a property so carefully reserved and separated from such lot, or that the grantee of the lot could have supposed that was his intention by the terms of the grant, with this distinct and notable separation staring him in the face upon the public records of the title he was about to purchase. The fact is, this property so separated, and afterwards conveyed to the plaintiff's grantor, is neither within the letter nor spirit of the common-law rule by which it is sought to be included within the boundaries of the lots conveyed in the deed of trust. That rule is satisfied when the grantee gets the lots conveyed to him, with all the rights and privileges in the streets that belong to an abutting proprietor who does not own the soil of the streets and alleys, but who, in case of an abandonment, may have a reversionary interest in fee in all of the soil that was actually granted to the public, to the middle line of the street on which his lot abuts, but who merely, as lot owner, can never have any reversionary interest in the valuable mineral therein contained, which was never granted for the purposes of such streets and alleys, but was expressly reserved therefrom. The judgment ought to have been for the plaintiff and is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

1. The Missouri doctrine that a city may authorize a railroad track in a street does not extend to the allowance of a practical monopoly of the street by the railroad.
2. A city cannot authorize a steam railroad in a narrow highway devoted to wholesale business, when the operation of the railroad virtually destroys the use of the street for street purposes at least three and one half hours every day between 7 A. M. and 6 P. M., and the city charter declares that no railroad shall be so constructed as to prevent the public from using any street, while the general law prohibits railroads from impairing the usefulness of a street.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court enjoining it from operating a railway in the street in front of complainant's premises. Affirmed.

Statement by Gantt, P. J.:

This is a proceeding for an injunction, by plaintiffs, who are abutting property owners on Collins street, in the city of St. Louis, between Franklin avenue and Carr street, to prevent the defendant, a steam railway company, from constructing, maintaining, and operating its railway along Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue, with a prayer for general relief. The petition alleges: That the plaintiffs are the owners of certain described property on Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue. That this property is valuable,—is worth more than $30,000; and that its access to Collins street is an important element in its value, and that it is covered with permanent buildings. That the defendant, by ordinance of the city of St. Louis, No. 15,816, approved September 3, 1890, was granted permission to construct, maintain, and operate a branch of its road, with a single track, along Collins street, in front of the plaintiff's property, and elsewhere, as specified in the ordinance. The ordinance itself is set out in hac verba. That Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue, and in front of the plaintiffs' property, is a narrow street, having a width from building line to building line of 40 feet, and a sidewalk on each side of the street 8 feet in width, leaving a roadway of 24 feet. That the defendant has constructed and laid down on the east half of the roadway of Collins street, in front of plaintiffs' property, a single railway track, under the alleged authority of the ordinance aforesaid, but has not, up to the time of the filing of the petition, commenced operating locomotives, cars, and trains thereon, and that it now threatens and purposes so to do, unless restrained by the process of the court. That the defendant is engaged in laying and constructing a second railway track on the west half of the roadway of Collins street, in front of plaintiffs' property, by virtue of a permit given by the mayor of the city of St. Louis, under date May 21, 1891. This permit is set out in hac verba. That this permit has no legal force or effect, and is void. That this construction, maintenance, and operation of said railway tracks, or either of them, along Collins street, in front of plaintiffs' property, will hinder and prevent the public from using the street; will exclude travel, passage, and business therefrom; will exclude all vehicles, and will destroy the use of the street as a public thoroughfare. And plaintiffs charge that the character of Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue, is such that the railway tracks thereon, or either of them, cannot be operated without preventing the public from using the street, and that, under the laws, the city of St. Louis cannot, nor can its mayor or municipal assembly, authorize such use of a street as will destroy its use as a public thoroughfare; and that Ordinance 15,816, so far as it attempts to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a steam railway track in Collins street, is absolutely null and void. Plaintiffs state that by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of said railway tracks, or either of them, at the points named, their property will be greatly depreciated and damaged in its selling and rental value, and the damages which will accrue to them will differ in degree and kind from those which will accrue to other members of the community, or to the public at large, from the same causes. They pray, therefore, that the defendant may be forever enjoined from constructing, maintaining, and operating the said railway tracks, or either of them, along Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue, and for such other relief as they may be entitled to. To this petition the defendant filed an answer, in which it admits that it is a corporate existence as a railroad company, under the laws of the state of Missouri, and that it is engaged in maintaining and operating a steam railway, as alleged in the petition. Every other matter contained and set forth in the petition is denied. By way of further answer defendant states that the North Missouri Railroad Company was a railway corporation duly organized by special act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri entitled "An act to incorporate the North Missouri Railroad Company," and approved March 8, 1851, and "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the North Missouri Railroad Company,'" which amendatory act was approved January 7, 1853. That under and by virtue of section 11 of said Act of March 8, 1851, the North Missouri Railroad Company was duly empowered to build its railroad along and upon any street or any road or wharf of any town or city, and over a stream or highway, in the state of Missouri; and that under and by virtue of section 9 of the Act of January 7, 1853, said company was authorized to locate, construct, and operate a railroad from the city of St. Charles to the northern boundary line of the state of Missouri, and from the city of St. Charles to any point in the city of St. Louis, and also to construct and operate lateral or branch railroads to any point. The answer alleges that the Wabash Railroad Company is the successor to the North Missouri Railroad Company, and is entitled to all its rights, privileges, and franchises, and the various links in chain of title from the North Missouri Railroad Company to the Wabash Railroad Company are set forth in answer, but, as no question is made in the case with respect to these, they need not be repeated here. The answer also pleads and sets out ordinance of the city of St. Louis No. 15,816, and the permit of the mayor, dated 21st day of May, 1891. It is further set out that, in pursuance of the authority conferred by the special act of the legislature of the state of Missouri, hereinbefore referred to, and by virtue of the general laws of the state and the ordinance of the city of St. Louis, the defendant did construct and now operates a branch of its railroad in the state of Missouri along and upon Collins street in the city of St. Louis. The plaintiffs filed a reply, denying all the allegations and answer, and affirmatively setting up that the special acts of the legislature pleaded in the answer constitute no defense to the plaintiffs' cause of action, because the defendant had so constructed its railroad along Collins street, from Carr street to Franklin avenue, that the public are prevented from using the street, and that it was forbidden to do this by the special acts of the legislature referred to. Further, the reply sets up that the defendant is not entitled to construct railroad tracks on the streets of St. Louis without the consent of the city of St. Louis given by ordinance, and that with such consent it cannot construct such tracks in any such streets, if they will prevent the public from using them; and the ordinance and the mayor's permit referred to are invalid, because the railway of Collins street, between Carr street and Franklin avenue, to which wagons and vehicles are restricted and confined to their passage along the street, has a width of only 24 feet, and the effect of the railroad tracks thereon is to prevent the public from using the street, and to destroy the same as a thoroughfare. Judgment is prayed for as in the petition. This action was commenced in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis on June 1, 1891. No preliminary injunction was asked or obtained. The cause was heard in December, 1891, and on March 8, 1892, a decree was rendered, perpetually enjoining the defendant from operating with cars and locomotives the said railway tracks on Collins street in the city of St. Louis, between Carr street and Franklin avenue. From that decree this appeal is taken.

Gantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The uncontroverted facts are that the plaintiffs own property in St. Louis on the east side of Collins street, between Franklin avenue and Carr street, extending eastwardly to Second street, of the value of about $30,000, covered by permanent structures, and rented for business purposes. Collins street, between Franklin avenue and Carr street, has a width of 40 feet between the building lines, with sidewalk 8 feet wide on each side, with a roadway only 24 feet in width. The Wash Railway Company is a railroad corporation organized under the general railroad law of this state in 1889, and is the grantee of the North Missouri Railroad Company, which was chartered by special act of the general assembly March 3, 1851. Between the institution of this action and the trial in the circuit court, the defendant laid its railroad tracks in Collins street, and employed the street to receive and discharge passengers from its passenger trains. It claimed the right to do this under the charter of the North Missouri Railroad, its predecessor, and under an ordinance of the municipal as-ssembly of St. Louis (No. 15,816), approved September 3, 1890, and under the permit of the mayor of St. Louis, of date May 21, 1891. In front of the plaintiffs' property the defendant laid a double track for its railway along Collins street. The distance between the east rail and the curbstone in front of respondents' property is three feet and six inches as to one lot of ground and three feet eight inches as to the other. The tracks are seven feet apart, and on the west side of the street the western rail is three feet and four inches from the curb line. From Carr street southwardly 125 feet the track is a single track in the center of the street to a switch, and thence southwardly with a double track 484 feet to a switch, and thence 265 feet southwardly with a single track to Franklin avenue, the southern terminus of the road. There are seven trains a day, operated over this line, namely, at 7 o'clock, 8, 8:45, and 10:45 in the forenoon, and at 4, 5:45 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Each train occupies the street for twenty or thirty minutes, and is switched as it comes in, making use of the two tracks for the purpose. There is a night train at 11 o'clock on two evenings of the week, on which occasions the train stands in the street from 8 to 11 o'clock. The testimony is uncontradicted and convincing to the effect that traffic is excluded from the street during the occupation of the same by the cars, and that the business of the railroad company and of the public cannot be carried on there at the same time. When the railroad company makes use of the street, the public traffic by all others is excluded, and this covers a period of three and one half hours every day between 7 A. M. and 6 P. M. The two cannot exist and be carried on at the same time. Where the single track exists, the space between it and the sidewalk is nine feet and a fraction, and freight wagons cannot pass a train on this single track with safety. It also appears that respondents' property is damaged in its rental and salable value by the presence of the cars on the street. The tracks are laid to the grade of the street, and constitute no material obstruction, save when occupied by trains. There is nothing in the ordinance limiting the company's right to run trains at any and all times of day or night. The ordinance No. 15,816 authorizes the company to construct, maintain, and operate a branch of its railroad with single track and necessary sidings and turnouts over the following route: "Along Second street, crossing North Market, Monroe, Exchange, Madison, Chambers, Tyler, La Beaume, Bogy, Mound, Howard, and Mullanphy streets, across city block 264, across Florida street, thence down Collins street, across Cass avenue, Bates, O'Fallon, Ashley, Biddle, Car and Cherry streets, through the alley in block 68, across Morgan, through the alley in block 67, across Christy avenue, and across block 66, and all intervening alleys, to a proper connection with the tracks of the St. Louis Bridge & Tunnel Railway Company. The construction of the aforesaid tracks shall be subject to the approval of the street commissioner, and said tracks shall be laid to conform to nopoly in defendant in the use of this street. No restriction is placed upon the number of trains or the time within which they may be operated. The roadway is only 24 feet. In this narrow space defendant has been permitted, under this ordinance, to lay two tracks, each 4 feet 8 inches wide. The distance between the east rail and the curbstone in front of plaintiff's property, is 3 feet and 6 inches as to one lot, and 3 feet 8 inches as to the other. The tracks are 7 feet apart, and on the west side of the street the western rail is 3 feet and 4 inches from the curb line. These double tracks extend a distance of 484 feet, with switches at either end. The company has stopped at Franklin avenue, and receives and discharges its passengers in the street at this point. At the time of the trial it was operating four trains in the forenoon, to wit, at 7 o'clock, 8 o'clock, 8:45, and 10:45 o'clock respectively. That the defendant regards its right in that street as paramount to the plaintiffs' and the public is very evident from the testimony of Mr. Blake, the president of the Sligo Iron Stone Company, which occupies Nos. 945 and 953 Second street, extending back to Collins street. He testifies that the operation of the road had caused a serious damage to his company; that on one occasion they had a load of angle iron which was so long that they were compelled to use an extra set of wheels to keep it from dragging. The team had driven up to their doors on Collins street, and they were unloading it. A train of defendant came in, and the train men directed the iron company to move its wagon, and were told they could not do it, and the railroad company's agents procured a policeman, who compelled them to move the wagon. They could not turn around. The street was too narrow, and were compelled to pull the load around the block. In many cases it has been said that the railroad company occupied the street along with the public, but it is perfectly plain that in this case no wagon of ordinary width can pass on this street with safety when the trains of defendant are on it, even where it had only a single track. On one occasion it seems that the steps of the cars were torn off in attempting to pass a wagon. The business on Collins street is wholesale from Carr to Franklin avenue. The wagons used are 7 feet 8½ inches from "point of hub to point of hub."

Now, while it is true that the public must submit to all reasonable inconveniences in the highways, the highways are created for the public and abutting owners, and they have an unquestionable right to require a reasonable use by all who are entitled to use them. As was said by this court in Schopp v. St. Louis, 117 Mo. 181, 20 L. R. A. 783. "The public highways belong 'from side to side and end to end' to the public, and the 'public are entitled, not only to a free passage along the highway, but to a free passage along any portion of it not in the actual use of some other traveler,' and the abutting property owner has the right to the free and unobstructed passage to and from his property." Said Lord Ellenborough in 24 L. R.

a route wait an unreasonable time in the public street, and obstruct the transit of his majesty's subjects who might wish to pass, it in carriages or on foot, the persons who cause or permit such coaches to so wait are guilty of a nuisance?" Every time the defendant uses this street with its trains it absolutely deprives all teamsters of ordinary freight wagons access to this street, and, as the ordinance gives defendant the privilege of using it with its trains as often as it pleases, such use is utterly incompatible with the purposes for which this street was created, and is unreasonable. The municipal assembly had no right to appropriate this street to defendant's use in this way. The learned counsel made the distinction that the mere unlawful use by it of its franchise would not justify this action. We agree with him that we do not think the assembly anticipated that the company would, under this ordinance, use the streets as a depot ground for the reception and discharge of passengers, and we are clear that the ordinance is no justification for such a use. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 81 Mo. 183. And this use of itself was good ground for an injunction by an abutting owner. But we are satisfied that the maintenance of this steam railroad in this narrow highway, devoted, as it has been, to wholesale business requiring heavy, broad trucks and wagons, must necessarily result in denying the public and the abutting owners the right to use this street as they are entitled to under the laws of this state, and that the ordinance virtually destroys it for street purposes, and therefore the assembly had no power to enact it. It was an attempt to convert it to a use different from that for which the city acquired it, and is in contravention of its charter, which declares that "no railroad shall be so constructed as to prevent the public from using any road, street, or highway along or across which it may pass," and the general law of the state that prohibits a railroad from impairing the usefulness of any street.

The learned counsel urges with great force and plausibility that this railroad is a public use of the street, but it seems to us he ignores the fact that, while the railroad is a public carrier, it has no right to the exclusive use of a public street, and such, for all practical purposes, is the effect of this ordinance and its use of this street. No case in this state is authority for such exclusive use of a highway, and, if it was, we should not follow it. The company is a common carrier, and entitled as such to collect tolls, but not the exclusive right to monopolize a public street, and shut out the public and other carriers. Holding, as we do, that this ordinance, in view of the facts developed, amounts to a practical condemnation of this portion of Collins street to the private, and almost exclusive, use of defendant, we think the injunction was properly granted by the circuit court, and plaintiffs had such an interest as would enable them to maintain the action. Schopp v. St. Louis, supra.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Elizabeth S. WEBSTER, Admr., etc., of William Webster, Deceased,
v.

FITCHBURG R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

A person does not become a passenger because he has previously obtained a ticket and is on the premises of a railroad company designated for the use of passengers and is about to take a train, where he is running from the direction of a public street across the premises outside the station to catch a train about to start, and is struck while crossing a track by an incoming train.

NOTE.—When person who has started for a train becomes a passenger.

A very interesting as well as important question is presented in the above case as to the time when a person, who has started to take passage on a train, becomes a passenger. Many cases in which the question might not improperly have been considered have without considering it or discussing the relation of carrier and passenger been decided on the single question of negligence, or contributory negligence.

For numerous cases of this kind, involving injuries received in getting on or off railroad trains, see note to Carr v. Bel River & Eureka R. Co. (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 384.

Other cases of this kind are in respect to the safety of platforms and approaches. As to the duty to maintain these beyond the carrier's own premises, see note to Skottowe v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Or.) 16 L. R. A. 593.

And as to the measure of care which a carrier must exercise to keep platforms and approaches safe, see note to Johns v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) 20 L. R. A. 520.

As to the persons to whom railroads owe the duty of keeping platforms safe, see note to Dowd v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Wis.) 20 L. R. A. 537.

But while the cases presented in the notes above mentioned are many of them concerned with injuries to persons about to take trains, only those of them which are presented in this note discuss or turn upon the question of the existence of the relation of carrier and passenger.

The doctrine that a person may become a passenger before he has actually entered the carrier's vehicle or bought a ticket, or otherwise paid for transportation was first presented, so far as we have been able to find, in Brien v. Bennett, 3 Car. & P. 724.

This was a case in which a person, who had signaled to an omnibus driver by holding up his finger, attempted, when the omnibus had stopped, to get on but was thrown down by the starting of the vehicle, and he was held to be at that time a passenger. Lord Abinger, in pronouncing the opinion, said that he thought the stopping of the omnibus implied consent to take the person as a passenger, and it was held to be evidence of that fact for the jury.

This doctrine is quite generally established, but the exact statement of the rule for determining the commencement of the relation has not been attempted in many cases. The present case, WEBSTER V. FITCHBURG R. CO., is perhaps the clearest and fullest in its statement of the rule and its limitations.

One who hailed a street car was held to be a passenger. 24 L. R. A.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing by defendant of plaintiff's intestate, which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant. Exceptions overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Meurs. George W. Morse, Samuel J. Elder and Stephen H. Tyng, for plaintiff: Deceased was a "passenger" within the meaning of Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 212.

See McKimble v. Boston & M. Railroad, 139 Mass. 542.

When one has made a contract for passage upon a vehicle of a common carrier, and has presented himself at the proper place to be senger while attempting carefully to get upon the car after it had stopped. Smith v. St. Paul City R. Co. 32 Minn. 1, 50 Am. Rep. 550.

See also cases intra as to getting onto car in motion.

One who, in good faith, goes to a depot at a reasonable hour to take a train is a passenger entitled to protection against unsafe platforms, as in case of the absence of a light, although he has not yet purchased a ticket. Grimes v. Pennsylvania Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 72.

A person intending to take a train if he found a friend on board was also held entitled to have the premises safe while going along the platform to see if his friend was on board. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Best, 66 Tex. 116.

So a person who has gone to the station and purchased a ticket is held to have a right to remain there a reasonable time to await the train (and the court declares that this is true even if he has not purchased a ticket), and that what is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances, such, among other things, as the distance of his residence from the station; and that the existence of this right depends upon his intent to go as a passenger. Harris v. Stevens, 31 Vt. 79, 73 Am. Dec. 387.

And in a case in which it is held to be a question for the jury as to the negligence of a person getting on a train in falling between cars which were not coupled, the court declared the doctrine that the relation of passenger and carrier commenced when the traveler went into the carrier's premises and purchased a ticket for the purpose of taking a train, and that the carrier assumed the duty of reasonable care for the protection of such person while proceeding to take the train. Lent v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 467.

One who fell between the cars after getting on and while the train was being made up, or an additional car being put on, was also held a passenger, in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Martin, 11 Ill. App. 386.

A person was also held a passenger of a railroad company while in a stage (sleigh) going to a depot to take a train, where the stage was run by employment of the railroad company, although he had not yet paid his fare nor purchased a ticket, nor formally announced his purpose to do so. Buffett v. Troy & B. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 168.

The same doctrine appears in a case respecting baggage, which holds that if the railroad company receives a trunk as baggage before the owner has purchased a ticket, it is liable for the trunk both before and after the train arrives or the ticket is bought. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 293, 54 Am. Rep. 319.

So where baggage was accepted from a prospect-transferred, his right to care and protection begins.

Dodge v. Boston & B. S. & Co. 2 L. R. A. 83, 148 Mass. 207.

So long as railroad companies so arrange their depot and train accommodations as to invite and receive belated or negligent passengers, they cannot escape the liability imposed by this section.

The only objection which the road could have urged to the reception of this intestate as a passenger was that he was running "apparently as fast as a man could run," but this they did not urge until the time of the trial of this action, about four years after they had killed him; nor would it affect his status as a "passenger."

Sullivan v. Old Colony R. Co. 1 L. R. A. 513, 148 Mass. 119.

Mr. George A. Torrey, for defendant:

Literally speaking, it will not be claimed that the plaintiff's intestate was such a passenger of the defendant; but it will be claimed by the other side that a person who enters upon the premises of a railroad company at the time when a train is about to leave, intending to take such train, thereupon becomes a passenger within the meaning of the statute in question. Such is not the law of this Commonwealth. The cases which pass upon this question furnish a test to be applied to this case. By such test, it is clear that the plaintiff's intestate was not a passenger at the time of his death.

Am. Dec. 700; Com. v. Boston & M. Railroad, 129 Mass. 500, 87 Am. Rep. 382.

ive passenger before any ticket was purchased and put in the baggage room for the night. Green v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 410.

And the same doctrine seems to be implied in the decision that a railroad company is responsible for the safety of the regulation, where it has allowed a custom to receive passengers on both sides of the track, where there is no station platform. Phillips v. Besselaer & S. R. Co. 57 Barb. 844.

The same implication appears in the decision that declarations of a person on leaving home as to his intention to go to a certain place on the line of a railroad are admissible to show his intent to take the train as affecting his character as a passenger, where he was struck by a train at the station before entering the cars. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25.

One of the leading cases on the subject is that of Allender v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 37 Iowa, 264, holding that a person who has not purchased any ticket because told by the ticket agent to pay on the train is nevertheless a passenger while going across the track, as directed by the agent, to get on a caboose, and struck while passing between some cars.

An earlier Iowa decision had also held that the liability as common carrier existed where a person in good faith and with reasonable care was seeking to find and enter a car for passage and was injured by unsafe conditions of the platform or approach, where a person might naturally or ordinarily be likely to go. McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 124, 95 Am. Dec. 114.

The relation of passenger and carrier commences at least as soon as a ticket is purchased with the immediate purpose of taking the cars as soon as they are ready. Johns v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 20 L. R. A. 520, 39 S. C. 632.

The court said in this case in respect to the requirement as to the purchase of tickets, and the claim that the persons were passengers, "I think this extraordinary care would be required of the railroad authorities as to any person who was going in the proper way by any proper approach to take the cars or to purchase a ticket, or to get his baggage checked." Ibid.

So one who offers to buy a ticket of the agent at a depot is entitled to the courtesy and protection which is due to a passenger from the moment of entering the premises, and the railroad company is liable for an assault upon and false imprisonment of such person by the company's employees, after refusal to sell the ticket. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Galliher, 89 Va. 630.

548, a person is held to be a passenger while waiting for the cars in a waiting room and going thence to a train.

And while a person in a waiting room was invited by a ticket agent to sit in an empty car while the room was being cleaned and was injured by the moving of the car, the relation of the passenger and carrier was held to exist. Shannon v. Boston & A. R. Co. 78 Me. 52.

Again, the ordinary doctrine was shown in Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700, where a person who had bought a ticket and had been waiting in the station for a train was struck while following the station agent at his suggestion across the track, was held a passenger.

So a boy five or six years old standing by a caboose while the family were getting on, who was injured by the sudden backing of the train, was held to be a passenger, although no ticket had been purchased for him. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Gross-clos, 88 Va. 267.

One who safely enters a passenger car at a place which has not a station, and where no invitation is held out to take the train, but where people are permitted to get on, becomes a passenger when safely on the train. Dewire v. Boston & M. Railroad, 3 L. R. A. 166, 148 Mass. 343.

The fact that a person is getting on a train in motion has not been sufficient in several cases to defeat his claim to be regarded as a passenger. Thus in Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Perry, 58 Ga. 461, a person having a ticket, who ran after a train which he had neglected to enter while it was standing because as he claimed the signals were not given, and while chasing it was struck by another train was held to be a passenger; but it was also held that the extraordinary precautions for the safety of passengers required of a carrier did not extend to precautions against leaving them, if they were unnecessarily late in getting on, and the question of the railroad company's liability was left to the jury.

And a boy attempting to get on a train which was running very slowly, after he had signaled it to stop at a flag station, and was told by the conductor to hurry up and get on, was held to be a passenger. Murphy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 43 Mo. App. 342.

And one who had bought a ticket was held to be a passenger while trying to get on a train in motion from a station platform. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Rector, 104 Ill. 296.

The fact that a person is violating the rules of the carrier in getting on a street-car in motion will not prevent his being considered a passenger, if he

Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700; Com. v. Boston & M. Railroad, 129 Mass. 500; Merrill v. Eastern R. Co. 189 Mass. 238, 52 Am. Rep. 705; Dodge v. Boston & B. S. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 83, 148 Mass. 207; June v. Boston & A. R. Co. 158 Mass. 79.

In order to entitle a person to the rights of a passenger, or, in other words, in order to entitle him to become a passenger, he must enter upon the station premises in a reasonable and proper manner, and present himself for transportation in such a way and in such a condition that he must be held to be there upon an implied invitation of the carrier, and consequently that the carrier is obliged to receive him as such passenger. Such is not the case at bar.

The deceased at the time of his death was upon our road contrary to the rules and regulations of the defendant; not an express printed rule, but an implied rule which the defendant must have known, that no person can present himself for transportation except in a proper and reasonable manner, in proper possession of his faculties, and under proper self-control. Boyd v. Wabash Western R. Co. 105 Mo. 371; Allender v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 264.

In regard to persons who present themselves for passage in the way in which the plaintiff's intestate did in the case at bar, there is no invitation held out on the part of the carrier, and no legal duty imposed upon it to receive them.

Baltimore Traction Co. v. State (Md.) Jan. 12, 1894.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the trial the plaintiff relied solely on her count under Pub. Stat., chap. 73, § 6, in which she alleged that her intestate was a passenger on the defendant's railroad, and the only question in the case is whether there was evidence to warrant the jury in finding that he was a passenger. He had in his pocket a ten-trip ticket, which entitled him to ride over the defendant's railroad between Boston and the

is in fact invited by the conductor to get on,—especially if the car is going slowly; or at least such violation will not prevent his being regarded as a passenger after he gets on. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 40 Ill. App. 560.

So in respect to a person attempting to get on a street-car in motion, the court said: "It does not seem reasonable to assume as a matter of law that a person who, in an orderly way, attempts to enter a street-car as a passenger is to be regarded as a trespasser until a special contract has been made by the conductor, based upon the payment of the required fare." Butler v. Glens Falls, S. H. & Ft. R. Street R. Co. 121 N. Y. 112.

Quite out of harmony with the general doctrine was the decision in Indiana Cent. R. Co. v. Hudson, 13 Ind. 225, 74 Am. Dec. 254, to the effect that a person who went to the ticket office but was unable to get a ticket in time for the train because the office was not lighted, and who started for the main track to get the train, going across an intervening side track, was not a passenger, because no contract had been entered into between him and the carrier, although the court did not regard him as either a trespasser or a wrongdoer. This case stands practically alone.

Other cases which have denied that a person was a passenger while attempting to get on a train have based the decision, like the main case, on the improper manner in which the approach to the train was made, or on some circumstance other than the mere fact that a ticket had not been procured. §

Thus in Spannagle v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 31 Ill. App. 460, a person having a round-trip ticket, who, instead of going into the waiting room while waiting for his train, went to a saloon from 200 to 300 feet away from the depot platform, was held not to be a passenger while running to get onto the train, which had stopped long enough for a passenger in the waiting room to get on.

So in Merrill v. Eastern R. Co., 189 Mass. 238, 52 Am. Rep. 705, where a person first gets on the engine, and then at another place ran to get on the front platform of a car while in motion and fell off the platform, he was held not to be a passenger.

It has been held also that merely walking towards a railroad station with the intention of buying a ticket does not make one a passenger before he reaches the station. June v. Boston & A. R. Co. 158 Mass. 79.

But this was a case in which a person was on the 24 L. R. A railroad premises at a place not intended for the public, and was on his way to the station from car shops where he had been without invitation on his own business.

Similar to these cases is that of Baltimore Traction Co. v. State (Md.) Jan. 12, 1894, which holds that one attempting to board a street-car going six miles an hour, although he had signalled it to stop, is not a passenger. This case lays down the rule substantially like that of the main case which seems to be reasonable, and which will harmonize most of the cases on the subject, to the effect that one who intends to take passage cannot be regarded as a passenger while in the act of getting on, unless he does so with a proper degree of care and prudence.

One waiting on a crosswalk to take a street-car, although lawfully there, was held not to be a passenger when struck by another car; but the street railway company was held liable for negligence in causing the injury. Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 4 Misc. 575.

In Denver, South Park & P. R. Co. v. Pickard, 8 Colo. 163, the decision was placed on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to exercise ordinary prudence in attempting to get on a swiftly moving train without any ticket, at a place where there was only a platform, without any station-house, ticket office, or waiting room. He attempted to show a custom to slack up for passengers, but the proof was held insufficient; and while the question as to the relation of passenger and carrier was raised, it does not seem to have been directly decided, but the plaintiff was defeated by his own negligence.

Considering all the decisions on the subject which establish quite clearly that a person may sometimes be a passenger when attempting to take a train although he has not yet got upon the cars or even procured a ticket, there seems to be no other limitation of the rule so satisfactory as that he must in order to be regarded as a passenger present himself in a proper place and in a proper manner because he cannot be presumed to have an invitation to present himself in any other way. Nevertheless this rule would not prevent liability in many cases to persons presenting themselves otherwise and therefore not to be regarded as passengers. But to such persons liability would evidently depend on the rule as to negligence toward mere licensees or trespassers. B. A. R.

station in Somerville where the accident happened; and, immediately before he was struck and killed he was running very rapidly, from the direction of the public street, across the defendant's premises, outside of the passenger station, to a track on which was an incoming train, apparently with a view to take another train, which was about to start for Boston, on the track beyond. It is contended in behalf of the plaintiff that, inasmuch as he had previously obtained a ticket, and was on the defendant's premises, in a place designed for the use of passengers, outside of the station, and was about to take a train he had become a passenger.

One becomes a passenger on a railroad when he puts himself into the care of the railroad company, to be transported under a contract, and is received and accepted as a passenger by the company. There is hardly ever any formal act of delivery of one's person into the care of the carrier, or of acceptance by the carrier of one who presents himself for transportation, and so the existence of the relation of passenger and carrier is commonly to be implied from circumstances. These circumstances must be such as to warrant an implication that the one has offered himself to be carried on a trip about to be made, and that the other has accepted his offer, and has received him to be properly cared for until the trip is begun, and then to be carried over the railroad. A railroad company holds itself out as ready to receive as passengers all persons who present themselves in a proper condition, and in a proper manner, at a proper place, to be carried. It invites everybody to come who is willing to be governed by its rules and regulations. In a case like this the question is whether the person has presented himself, in readiness to be carried, under such circumstances, in reference to time, place, manner, and condition, that the railroad company must be deemed to have accepted him as a passenger. Was his conduct such as to bring him within the invitation of the railroad company? In Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co., 148 Mass. 209, 2 L. R. A. 88, it was said that "when one has made a contract for passage upon the vehicle of a common carrier, and has presented himself at a proper place, to be transported, his right to care and protection begins." In this statement it was assumed that he would be in a proper condition, and present himself in a proper manner. If his condition should render him unfit to be in the presence of passengers on the train, or if he should present himself while doing something which would expose himself or others to great danger from the cars or engines of the carrier, he would not be within the invitation of the railroad company, and it would not be expected to accept him as a passenger. In the present case, after the arrival of the plaintiff's intestate on the defendant's premises, there was no time when he presented himself in a proper manner to be carried. He was all the time running rapidly, without precautions for his safety, towards a point directly in front of an incoming train. He did not put himself in readiness to be taken as a passenger, and present himself in a proper way. If we treat his approach as a request for passage, and if we conceive of the railroad company as being present, and speaking by a representative who saw him, there was no instant when the answer to his request would not have been: "We will not accept you as a passenger while you are exposing yourself to such peril. We do not invite persons to become passengers while they are rushing into danger in such a way." The law will not imply a contract by a railroad company to assume responsibilities for one as a passenger from such facts as appear in this case. Dodge v. Boston & B. S. Co. supra; Merrill v. Eastern R. Co. 189 Mass. 238, 52 Am. Rep. 705; Com. v. Boston & M. Railroad, 129 Mass. 500; Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700; *Baltimore Traction Co. v. NOTE.—The question whether a preferential transfer to particular creditors constitutes an assignment for creditors regulated by statute is one of so much practical importance that the above case rejecting the earlier doctrine of the same jurisdiction is of much interest. See on this subject the note to Akers v. Rowan (S. C.) 10 L. R. A. 705; also Farwell v. Cohen (Ill.) 18 L. R. A. 231; Pendery v. Allen (Ohio) 19 L. R. A. 387.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bonhomie County in favor of defendants in an action brought to have a deed and bill of sale declared to be an assignment for benefit of creditors. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Elliott, D. C. Shull, and F. D. Wicks, for appellants:

Section 4660 of the Compiled Laws says: "Such assignment shall not be valid if it be upon, or contain, any trust or condition by which any creditor is to receive a preference or priority over any other creditor."

The transfer of the property with intent to abandon their business while insolvent, to some of their creditors to the exclusion of the others, created a trust under the above statute for the benefit of the plaintiffs and all other creditors of the firm of Max & Balsch.

The plaintiffs were beneficiaries of that trust, and as such can enforce the same in equity, although only simple contract creditors, without first exhausting their remedy at law or reducing their claims to judgment.

Day v. Washburn, 65 U. S. 24 How. 853, 16 L. ed. 713; Clapp v. Dittman, 21 Fed. Rep. 15; Cass v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688, 25 L. ed. 1004; Brisay v. Hogan, 58 Mo. 554; Goncelier v. Foret, 4 Minn. 18; Miller v. Davidson, 8 Ill. 518, 40 Am. Dec. 715.

As soon as a debtor attempts to create a trust with a preference for any of his creditors, by surrendering all of his property the statute steps in and declares it a trust for all; and when he puts his property beyond his power for such purpose, the law deprives him of all ability to direct or control its distribution.

Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414; Field v. Geoghegan, 125 Ill. 70.

The instrument or instruments whether in form assignments, chattel mortgages, deeds of trust, or confessions of judgments, by which such transfer is made, constitute an assignment under the South Dakota statute, the benefits of which may be claimed by any creditors unpreferred who will take the necessary steps in a court of equity to enforce the equality contemplated by the statute.

Wyman v. Mathews, 58 Fed. Rep. 678; White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 829, 32 L. ed. 477; Clapp v. Dittman, 21 Fed. Rep. 15; Perry v. Corby, 21 Fed. Rep. 787; Kerbs v. Ewing, 22 Fed. Rep. 693.

by Max & Balsch, created a trust for the benefit of all the creditors.

This is a direct transfer of all the property to the creditors preferred.

Burrill, Assignm. § 162; Van Patten v. Burr, 53 Iowa, 518; Riggs v. Murray, 2 Johns. Ch. 565. 1 L. ed. 493.

Whenever a man becomes insolvent the law regards his property as of right belonging to his creditors.

Gare v. Murray, 6 Minn. 305; Albert v. Winn, 7 Gill, 446; Bump, Fraud. Conv. p. 892.

Messrs. French & Orvis, for respondents: Section 4654, Compiled Laws, expressly gives a debtor the right to prefer one creditor to another and in the absence of fraud the payment of a bona fide debt to one creditor is not a fraud against other creditors.

First Nat. Bank v. North (S. Dak.) Feb. 8, 1892; Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208; Farwell v. Nilsson, 133 Ill. 45.

Voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors are transfers without compulsion of law, by debtors of some or all of their property to an assignee or assignees in trust, to apply the same or the proceeds thereof to the payment of some or all their debts, and to return the surplus if any, to the debtor.

Burrill, Assignm. § 2; Wiener v. Davis, 18 Pa. 338.

There must be a trust, a trustee, creditors, and cestui que trust, who can compel an enforcement of the trust, in order to constitute an assignment for the benefit of or in trust for creditors.

Bishop, Insolvent Debtors, § 180; Dickson v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 323.

Where the assignment is to a single creditor or to a few selected creditors, and is made absolutely and by way of full payment or satisfaction, it is, of course, wholly divested of the character of a trust, and is in the nature of an ordinary conveyance or sale for a valuable consideration.

Burrill, Assignm. § 3; Ingram v. Osborn, 70 Wis. 184.

The test is this: Can other creditors call the grantee or person stipulated for by the grantor to account for the proceeds of the property?

If they can it is an assignment, otherwise not. Fecheimer v. Robertson, 53 Ark. 101.

Since Winner v. Hoyt, 66 Wis. 227, 57 Am. Rep. 257, the supreme court of Wisconsin has clearly recognized the right of insolvent debtors to prefer creditors by sales and by mortgages of their property in payment of, or in securing bona fide debts to the exclusion of other creditors.

Oribb v. Hibbard, 77 Wis. 199; Hoyt v. Pierron, 67 Wis. 262; Ingram v. Osborn, supra; Greene v. Remington, 72 Wis. 648; Landauer v. Victor, 69 Wis. 434; Meneeshimer v. Kennedy, 75 Wis. 411; Stevens v. Breen, 75 Wis. 595; Michelstetter v. Weiner, 83 Wis. 298.

The true rule seems to be that courts will declare any instrument or two or more instruments, whatever their form, an assignment whenever their legal effect is to transfer all or substantially all of the debtor's property to one or more trustees, in trust for the benefit of some one or more of the creditors of the debtor, other than the trustee.

As long as no assignment for the benefit of creditors is made or the transaction does not amount in law to such an assignment, the debtor is at liberty to pay or secure any of his creditors at the expense of the others.

White v. Cotalhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 32 L. ed. 677, depended upon the construction of an Illinois statute.

The court intended to follow Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208, but a careful reading of the opinion in that case and the opinion in Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403, proves conclusively that Justice Harlan was misled as to what was decided by the Illinois court in Preston v. Spaulding.

Section 4660 is intended to provide for the voluntary assignment of insolvent creditors, and is in no respect intended to compel insolvent creditors to make an assignment.

Kellam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the following statement at the head of appellants' brief is a fair presentation of the facts in this case, and we adopt it as the basis of this opinion: "On or about April 15, A. D. 1892, defendants Max & Baisch were a copartnership engaged in the retail hardware business and the selling of farm machinery at Scotland, this state. Their stock of goods, book accounts, and all their other property in which they had a valuable interest or any substantial equity as a partnership or individuals were of the nominal value of ten ($10,000) thousand dollars, the cash value of which was $7,000 to $8,000. Their indebtedness exceeded fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars. Among their creditors were the respondents Solomon and J. C. Wenzlaff, of Yankton, this state, to whom they owed seven thousand ($7,000) dollars. The said Wenzlaffs knew that Max & Baisch were hopelessly insolvent on or about said last named date. The said Max & Baisch, knowing that they could not continue their business longer, and that they must abandon the same, executed a bill of sale and deed of their said stock and book accounts, and all their other property in which they had any substantial interest or equity, either as a partnership or individuals, to the respondents Wenzlaff, in payment of their indebtedness of seven thousand ($7,000) dollars. Immediately on the delivery of said bill of sale and deed the said Wenzlaffs took possession of all of said property so transferred, and have continued to operate the store and run the same in their own names since. Said transfer of Max & Baisch left them without any property or means with which to satisfy or pay their indebtedness to any of their other creditors. This action was instituted by the plaintiffs, for themselves and all other creditors of Max & Baisch, for the purpose of having said deed and bill of sale and transfer declared an assignment with intent to give said Wenzlaffs preference in the collection of their debts over the other creditors of Max & Baisch, and that it created a trust for the benefit of all the creditors of said Max & Baisch, under the provisions of section 4660 of the Compiled Laws of the state of South Dakota. No appearance was entered for Max & Baisch, but their codefendants, vendees of said property, filed a general demurrer to the complaint herein, setting up that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them. The demurrer was submitted to the court, and the same sustained." The plaintiffs appealed.

From this statement we draw the following facts: Max & Baisch were justly indebted to the Wenzlaffs in the sum of $7,000. In payment of such indebtedness they conveyed to them property whose cash value was $7,000 to $8,000. The property so conveyed constituted substantially their entire means, and resulted, as they knew it would, in the dissolution and discontinuance of their business. The Wenzlaffs knew that such conveyance and payment to them took and absorbed substantially all the property of Max & Baisch, and that it would necessitate the abandonment of their business. Max & Baisch were at the time largely indebted to other creditors, including the plaintiffs in this action, who were left, by such conveyance and payment to Wenzlaffs, entirely unprotected for. The question to be determined is directly this: Is it the legal effect of these facts to make such conveyance to the Wenzlaffs an assignment by Max & Baisch for the benefit of their creditors? At common law, a debtor in failing circumstances may use any or all of his property to pay one or more creditors in preference to others. 2 Kent, Com. 532; Burrill, Assignm. § 160. In this state this right of the debtor is expressly declared by statute. "A debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." Comp. Laws, § 4654. This provision simply codifies the common law, and, unless qualified by other statutory provisions, the right of a debtor to select and prefer one creditor to another remains as at common law. And it is very clear that Max & Baisch, in making such payment to the Wenzlaffs, were exercising a right recognized and assured to them both by the common and statutory laws, unless such right has been limited or restrained by other provisions of the statute; and this is what is claimed by appellants is done by the statute regulating assignments in trust by insolvent debtors for the benefit of their creditors. Section 4660, Comp. Laws, is as follows: "An insolvent debtor may, in good faith, execute an assignment of property to one or more assignees, in trust towards the satisfaction of his creditors, in conformity to the provisions of this title; subject, however, to the provisions of this code relative to trusts and to fraudulent transfers, and the restrictions imposed by law upon an assignment by special partnerships, by corporations or by other specified classes of persons; provided, moreover, that such assignment shall not be valid if it be upon, or contain any trust or condition by which any creditor is to receive a preference or priority over any other creditor; but in such case the property of the insolvent shall become a trust fund to be administered in equity, in the district court, and shall inure to the benefit of all the creditors in proportion to their respective claims or demands." Unenlightened and uninfluenced by several judicial decisions, some of which it will be necessary to notice hereafter, I think I should understand these provisions—the one declaring the right of a debtor to prefer particular creditors, and the other regulating the making and declaring the effect of a general assignment in trust for the benefit of all creditors—to be distinct and independent provisions, either of which was available to a debtor. That two different courses were open to every debtor: he might, as provided in said section 4654, use any or all his property to pay or secure any creditor in preference to others, or he might, as provided in said section 4660, turn over all his property to a trustee for the benefit of all his creditors ratably. If he chooses to adopt the former course of paying or securing a preferred creditor, he must keep himself and the transaction within the rules of honesty and good faith, as defined by the law; if he adopts the latter course of making a general assignment, he must follow the requirements of the statute authorizing and regulating such assignment and, if in or by such assignment he undertakes to prefer one creditor to another, the consequence prescribed by such statute will follow. That the question is not one of morals, to be measured by the conscience of the court, but of law, to be tested by the enactments of the legislature.

These views, thus generally expressed, are plainly opposed by the opinion of the territorial supreme court, in Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414. It is quite probable that the opinion of the learned judge, which was elaborate and instructive, laid down some propositions not necessary to a decision of that case upon the facts presented, and that the law which might perhaps have properly decided that case does not necessarily decide this. In that case the mortgagors made several chattel mortgages, at practically the same time, to as many different creditors. They were all immediately placed in the hands of an agent or trustee for enforcement. These acts were all so nearly simultaneous, and so closely related to each other, as to suggest the deliberate intention of the mortgagor to thus create a trust in such agent or trustee for the benefit of such preferred creditors. In the case before us there can be no such element of trust, unless the law itself directly creates it, and that, too, against the express intention of the parties. But the opinion without doubt plainly teaches the doctrine upon which the appellants base their present contention in this case. It is thus stated in the opinion: "Under this statute [4660], whenever an insolvent debtor makes a general disposition of all his property and effects, whether to all or only a part of his creditors, thereby abandoning his business, or putting himself in such situation that it is impossible for him to continue in it, he has made a voluntary assignment." And again: "So long as the instrument employed by the debtor, whatever it may be called, works an absolute transfer of substantially all the property and effects of the insolvent from him to another or others, with a design on his part that it shall do so, and that his connection with the business shall cease, it is a voluntary assignment on his part under the statute in question." It is reasonably plain that if these propositions are adopted and followed as the law by this court, the decision of the circuit court must be reversed; for all the conditions exist which, ruled by such law, would make this conveyance an assignment with preferences. The opinion finds the efficient factor, which turns what would otherwise be a simple transfer of property to one creditor in payment of his debt into an assignment for the benefit of all creditors, in the circumstance that such transfer embraces substantially all the debtor's property,—that is, that a debtor may convey nearly all his property to pay his debt to one of his creditors; and it is a proper exercise of his right to prefer such creditor. But if he convey a little more, so as to make substantially all his property, it becomes, instead of a payment as designed, a general assignment for the benefit of all creditors; thus making the character and effect of the transaction to depend—not on the intention of the parties to it, nor the perversion from such intent—upon the injustice of allowing one creditor to obtain more than his just proportion of the debtor's property; for the apparent injustice of paying a preferred creditor in full with three quarters of the debtor's property is not relieved by the fact that the remaining one quarter will pay other creditors an insignificant portion of their claims. I say, the "apparent" injustice of so preferring one creditor to others, for the law recognizes the fact that in the forum of conscience all debts do not stand upon the same level. A man may properly and honestly prefer and pay a friend, who, from pure friendship and a desire to assist, has indorsed for him, rather than one who, for profit, has assumed the business risk of dealing with him. Or he may rightly prefer and pay a poor creditor, who would be distressed by the loss of his debt, to a rich one, to whom the loss would be insignificant. In the exercise of the right to prefer creditors, the law has left it with the debtor to determine for himself which he ought to and will prefer. The right so to do being secured by a broad and positive statute, I am unable to see the authority of the court to say that, beyond the use of such a proportion of his property as the court approves, he cannot exercise such right. But for the assignment already noticed (sec. 4660 et seq.), it would not be claimed but that the debtor might use all his property to satisfy one creditor to the exclusion of all others. It is not necessary to go to the books for this learning. In Clarke v. White, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 200, 9 L. ed. 1055, the court says: "The debtor may prefer one creditor, pay him fully, and exhaust his whole property, leaving nothing for others equally meritorious." See also Wickman v. Grover, 4 Paige, 23, 3 L. ed. 325; Cowanhoven v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 60 Am. Dec. 57; Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61, 29 L. ed. 329; Giddings v. Sears, 115 Mass. 505; Cason v. Murray, 15 Mo. 878.

I am equally unable to perceive what seems to me any sufficient reason for allowing the circumstance that such payment necessitated the discontinuance of the debtor's business to determine or assist in determining that what was intended to be an absolute conveyance in payment of a particular debt is instead a voluntary assignment in trust to secure the payment, as far as possible, of all debts. There is nothing in the opinion in Straw v. Jenks which would prevent a merchant from turning over a considerable portion of his property to pay a bona fide preferred debt, but this would very often, perhaps generally, compel an abandonment of his business. How little of his property he could retain without such consequences would nearly always depend upon circumstances, such as the disposition of his creditors, the reputation, and often the nerve, of the debtor. The result would be that, under conditions and circumstances favorable to the debtor, his conveyance would stand in law as a payment, while, under unfavorable conditions, neither growing out of nor having any connection with the transaction itself nor its necessary effect upon creditors, the same conveyance precisely would stand in law as a general assignment. But how would the same rule—or principle, if it should be so called—apply to the multitude of cases when the debtor is in no business. A debtor has $1,000 in money, or a single piece of property of that value. He owes the same amount to A., $500 to B., and $500 to C. He gives A. all he has in payment of his debt, and continues to work by the day, or on a salary, just as he did before the transaction. Is the transaction a payment to A., or an assignment for the benefit of A., B., and C.? It seems to me, as I have already said, that the two rights of the debtor to use any or all his property to pay preferred creditors, or to turn it all over to a trustee for ratable distribution among all his creditors, are distinct and independent, and that the statute regulating voluntary assignments for the benefit of all creditors did not profess, nor was it intended, to break in upon the long-established doctrine of the common law, made statutory in this state, that a debtor may prefer one creditor to another; but was only intended to direct the manner in which an insolvent debtor might, if he so desired to treat all alike, convey all his property to a trustee for a ratable payment to all. The supreme court of Missouri, recognizing that the right of a debtor to prefer creditors might be legally used to avoid the ratable distribution among all creditors contemplated by the general assignment law, used this significant language: "If the legislature wish to strike at the root of the evil, they must go back to an old principle of the common law, which permits a debtor to prefer one creditor to another." Shapleigh v. Baird, 26 Mo. 326. I find nothing in our assignment law which I think was intended to repeal, affect, or qualify section 4654, giving a debtor the absolute right to prefer creditors, and nothing which restricts the exercise of such right to a portion of his property; nor can I find anything in the law which seems to me to authorize or justify a court in holding that a payment so made is not a payment, but a voluntary assignment of the debtor's property for the benefit, not of the creditor whom he has attempted to pay, but of all his creditors. The very definition of an assignment by our statute is a conveyance "of property to one or more assignees in trust." It is then provided "that such an assignment shall not be valid" if it contain any preference among the creditors. Where a conveyance of property is made directly to a creditor in absolute executed payment of a debt, the transaction lacks the essential character of a trust. Burrill, Assignm. § 3; Ingram v. Osborn, 70 Wis. 184, 304; Dias v. Bouchaud, 10 Paige, 445, 4 L. ed. 1044.

It is undeniable that cases may be found which support the opinion in Straw v. Jenks, some of which, and those principally relied upon by appellants, will be noticed. The one nearest home is that of Wyman v. Mathews, in the circuit court, and reported in 53 Fed. Rep. 678. The case was from this state, and Judge Sanborn, who decided it, was bound to follow the decision of the highest court of the jurisdiction from which it came. The question of the construction and effect of a statute of a state regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors is a question upon which the decisions of the highest court of the state establishing a rule of property are of controlling authority in the courts of the United States. Brashear v. West, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 615, 8 L. ed. 804; Allen v. Massey, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 851, 21 L. ed. 542; Lloyd v. Fulton, 91 U. S. 485, 23 L. ed. 365; Union Bank of Chicago v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 235, 34 L. ed. 845. Judge Sanborn followed Straw v. Jenks. If that case had been decided otherwise, it is fair to suppose he would have felt bound by it. It may be observed, however, that the Wyman Case was not one where the property involved had been transferred as payment, but, as in the Straw-Jenks Case, it was mortgaged to the bank, not only to secure its own indebtedness, but as a trustee for other creditors. The mortgage thus expressly created a trust, with the bank as trustee. In the Straw-Jenks Case the court cites and quotes from Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208, as though supporting its decision. In that case there was a formal assignment for the benefit of creditors, and the whole argument of the opinion rests upon that fact. The preferences were made under them as a part of the transaction of assignment, "the same as though incorporated in the deed of assignment itself." In respect to the insolvent debtor, the opinion says: "He may now, as heretofore, in good faith sell his property, mortgage or pledge it to secure a bona fide debt. . . . But when he reaches the point where he is ready and determined to yield the dominion of his property, and makes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors under the statute, this act declares that the effect of such assignment shall be the surrender and conveyance of all his estate not exempt by law to his assignee, rendering void all preferences, and bringing about the distribution of his whole estate equally among his bona fide creditors." And again, the opinion, referring to the voluntary assignment law, says: "No insolvent debtor having in view the disposition of his estate can be permitted to defeat its operation by effecting unequal distribution of his estate by means of an assignment and any other shift or artifice under the forms of law." Concerning this opinion, the late case of Farwell v. Nilsson, 133 Ill. 45, says: "Aside from the rule that the language of an opinion is to be confined by the facts of the case which the court is considering, it will be found that the learned and discriminating judge who wrote in that case carefully avoided the implication that preferential transfers by an insolvent debtor, not connected in act and intent with an assignment, were forbidden by the law." And further on the opinion says the judge "had clearly in mind the distinction between an assignment and a transfer of some other form, and clearly recognized the difficulty of treating judgments and conveyances as an assignment, or part of an assignment, and void if preferential, when no assignment was even executed or contemplated by the debtor who gave such preferences." Entirely consistent with these expressions, but not, as it seems to me, with those in the Straw-Jenks Case, is the opinion in Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403. Referring to the statute relating to assignments by debtors for the benefit of their creditors, and prohibiting preferences in such assignments, the court says: "Notwithstanding that statute, a debtor may pay one creditor in full, either in money or by the sale of his property. That act applies only to conveyances of property to an assignee or trustee in trust, to convert the same into money for the benefit of creditors of the assignor, which can now only be made under that law." The effect of the decision as to the question of preferences is thus stated in the headnote: "In the absence of any bankrupt law or statute to the contrary, the law is well settled that a debtor in failing circumstances, not seeking the benefit of the general assignment law, may prefer one creditor to another equally meritorious, if done in good faith. The statute regulating assignments by insolvents has no application to such a case." Again, in Weber v. Mick, another Illinois case, reported in 131 Ill. 520, in which an attempt was made to have certain chattel mortgages securing preferred creditors declared an assignment for the ben-

J., said in reference to an instruction refused by the trial court: "This instruction was doubtless drafted upon the theory that giving a preference to a creditor by means of a chattel mortgage, when the mortgage covers the debtor's entire property, contravenes the provisions of the thirteenth section of the statute in relation to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors. To this view we are unable to assent. . . . It must be held that every attempt to apply the act or any of its provisions, by construction, to any subject other than voluntary assignments, must be wholly unavailing." He then proceeds to show that neither chattel mortgages nor transfer of property in payment of debts can be considered as such assignments. Referring to the mortgages, he says: "It is clear, upon the principles established by the authorities above cited, that they were mere chattel mortgages, executed for the sole benefit of the mortgagees, and creating no trust in favor of any of the creditors of the mortgagor. It is clear, then, that they did not constitute voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors within the meaning of the statute."

We have thus referred to these Illinois decisions later than Preston v. Spaulding, in order to more safely and intelligently determine what force should be given to White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 829, 32 L. ed. 677, strongly relied upon both by Judge Spencer in his opinion in the Straw-Jenks Case and by the appellants in this case. In White v. Cotzhausen, which went up from Illinois, it was the evident intention of the United States Supreme Court to follow the decision in Preston v. Spaulding, as an authoritative construction of the Illinois statute and its effect by the highest court of that state. That the opinion of the federal court does not correctly reflect that of the Illinois court is evident. In Union Bank of Chicago v. Kansas City Bank, supra, Judge Gray, who wrote the opinion, says they followed the Illinois court as they understood it. In Farnell v. Nilsson, supra, the supreme court of Illinois expressly repudiates the opinion in White v. Cotzhausen, as a correct statement of the law in that state. In Clapp v. Dittman, 21 Fed. Rep. 15, and Perry v. Corby, 31 Fed. Rep. 737,—cases cited by appellants,—Judge Brewer did hold that a transfer of all a debtor's property to a single creditor was an assignment for the benefit of the debtor's creditors, under the statutes of Missouri. He did this, he says in the opinion, against his individual judgment, and in deference to prior decisions of the federal circuit courts assuming to follow the state decisions. Substantially the same rulings will be found in Dahlman v. Jacobs, 16 Fed. Rep. 614; Kellog v. Richardson, 19 Fed. Rep. 70; Kerbs v. Ewing, 22 Fed. Rep. 693; Ffreund v. Yaegerman, 26 Fed. Rep. 812, rehearing refused in 27 Fed. Rep. 248; State v. Morse, 27 Fed. Rep. 261. Later the question went up from that state to the United States Supreme Court, and that court, in Union Bank of Chicago v. Kansas City Bank, supra, reversed and disapproved these cases, and held that the law of that state as declared by the highest court was quite different from that announced by the federal circuit courts; and quoted with approval, as the established law of that state, the following from the opinion in Hargadins v. Henderson, 97 Mo. 875. "The assignment law of Missouri is not, in letter or spirit, a bankrupt or insolvent debtor's act. A debtor, whether solvent or insolvent, may in good faith sell, deliver in payment, mortgage, or pledge the whole or any part of his property for the benefit of one or more of his creditors, to the exclusion of others, even though such transfer may have the effect of delaying them in the collection of their debts. Its terms in no way qualify the rule by which the character of the instrument is to be determined." The court accordingly held that the deed of trust should be considered as a mortgage to secure the creditors named, and not as an assignment for the benefit of creditors generally. The same cases were again referred to and disapproved in the later case of May v. Tenney (decided in March, 1898), 148 U. S. 60, 37 L. ed. 188. This case when up from Colorado. The circuit court had held, upon the theory contended for by appellants in this case, that an instrument in the form of a chattel mortgage should be construed to be a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. The decision of the circuit court was reversed, Judge Brewer writing: "This statute [referring to the Colorado assignment law], so far as we are advised, has not been before the supreme court of Colorado for construction; at least not for any question involved in this case. The first section, it will be perceived, gives permission to make a general assignment. There is no compulsion. There is neither in terms nor by implication any duty cast upon an insolvent to dispose of his property by a general assignment, or anything that prevents him from paying or securing one creditor in preference to others;" and he concluded that a "statute which simply permits a debtor to make a certain disposition of his property works no destruction of his otherwise unrestrained dominion over it."

Similar views were expressed in Manning v. Beck, 129 N. Y. 1, 14 L. R. A. 198. This was an action to set aside a bill of sale made by an insolvent debtor as payment to a preferred creditor, and a general assignment executed the next day, on the general ground that they were parts of the same transaction, and, as such, violated the statute by giving such preference. The court held that such a result could not follow, unless the creditor so receiving payment knew at the time that the debtor was about to make a general assignment; and that the bill of sale to him was a part of such transaction, and one of the instrumentalities for the accomplishment of this general surrender of his property; in other words, that such preference is forbidden only when it is made as a part and parcel of an assignment under the statute. The court says: "If the preference were contained in the general assignment itself, we would have no trouble in concluding that it would be unlawful; . . . but it is an entirely different matter where a preference is given by reason of an instrument which the debtor has ordinarily full power to execute and deliver for the very purpose of thereby giving a preference, and which a creditor has like full power to receive for the purpose of thereby receiving such preference." Following this case is the very recent one of Thompkins v. Hunter, 24 N. Y. Supp. 8, in which the facts are hardly distinguishable from those in the case now before us for decision. We quote from the opinion in that case: "But it is urged on the part of the plaintiffs that no purpose to make a general assignment, or its accomplishment, is essential to bring the case within the operation of the statute, where the insolvent debtor has by a single transaction disposed of all his property to one or a portion only of his creditors, in payment of his debt or debts owing to him or them, to whom the sale or transfer is so made. The support of that proposition would require the conclusion that such a transfer of his property for that purpose is, in legal effect, a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, within the statute. There is apparently no warrant for such construction of the statute in the language employed to express the legislative intent. Nor is it seen how its purpose, so manifested, can be extended to defeat the right of such debtor to make, and one, or some only, of his creditors to take, transfer of his entire property as payment of valid debt or debts owing by him to such creditor or creditors to whom it is made, and to hold it for that purpose, as against other creditors of the debtor." In both of these New York cases White v. Cotehausen is referred to, but not followed. Oross v. Carstens, decided by the supreme court of Ohio on June 28, 1892, and reported in 49 Ohio St. 548, contains a very vigorous discussion of this question by Spear, Ch. J., and holds that the assignment law cannot be so construed as to deprive a debtor of the independent right to prefer some creditors to others. Referring to such law, he says: "The language does not include all transfers nor all conveyances made in contemplation of insolvency, but assignments; and it is assignments by the failing debtor in trust to a trustee which the legislature had declared must inure to the benefit of all creditors. . . . Upon no accepted theory of construction, therefore, are we authorized, in view of the acknowledged rule of the common law, to enlarge the class, and say that it must, by judicial construction, be held to include other instruments not described, instruments which, since our earliest adjudications, have been held to be valid, and entitled to enforcement in accordance with their terms." The length of this opinion forbids further notice of authorities. The following late cases, however, may be cited as entirely consistent with, and generally affirmatively supporting the doctrine of, this opinion: Costello v. Chamberlain, 36 Neb. 45; Clement v. Johnson, 85 Iowa, 566; First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. North Wisconsin Lumber Co. 41 Ill. App. 888; Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 829; Bank of Montreal v. J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. 90 Mich. 345; Gilbert v. McCorkle, 110 Ind. 215, followed in Carnahan v. Schwab, 127 Ind. 507. I believe these later cases, and others that might be cited, as well as many older ones, such as Sampson v.

Arnold, 19 Iowa, 479; National Bank of the Metropolis v. Sprague, 20 N. J. Eq. 18; Farwell v. Howard, 26 Iowa, 881; Bates v. Coe, 10 Conn. 295; Doremus v. O'Harra, 1 Ohio St. 45; Atkinson v. Tomlinson, Id. 287; Lord v. Fisher, 19 Ind. 7,—teach the only doctrine logically consistent with the several rights and privileges expressly guaranteed by statute to a debtor; and that the vital error in the opinion in Straw v. Jenks was in the assumed premise that the design of the statute regulating voluntary assignments was “to prevent preferences among creditors.” If such were the design of the legislature, it is inexplicable that they should have left standing upon the statute book the affirmative declaration of the absolute right of any debtor to make such preferences. The assignment law was not intended to affect or touch the general right of a debtor to prefer creditors, but was designed for cases where the debtor professedly did not desire or intend to make preferences, and offers to every debtor who does not wish to handle or distribute his property himself and make preferences, but desires to convey it all to a trustee for a ratable payment to all, a simple and convenient means to effectuate such purpose; and then provides that a debtor so professing to turn over all his property for the benefit, proportionately, of all his creditors cannot use such assignment to accomplish an inconsistent purpose. He cannot professedly use the law and the assignment for one purpose, but actually use it for another; not because he has no right to prefer particular creditors, but because to do so under such circumstances would be a fraud on the law. He may make a general assignment or not, as he chooses; but if he uses the law at all he must do it in good faith, and conform to its terms and requirements. He must “use as not abusing” it. Of course, it is not indispensable that in making such assignment the debtor use the very terms of the statute, but it is indispensable that his acts be such as to indicate his intention to take advantage of, and put himself and his property under the protection of, the statute permitting and regulating a general assignment by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors; and, in my opinion, any judicial construction which, against the debtor's will and design, forces his property within the range of the general assignment law, and compels its disposition thereunder, would reverse the policy of the law, and make the assignment an involuntary, instead of a voluntary, one. It would be an attempt upon the part of the court to repeal a statute giving a definite right to a debtor, and to make a new law in the place of that duly enacted by the legislature.

Notwithstanding our great respect for the learning of the late territorial court, and of the able judge who wrote the opinion in Straw v. Jenks, we believe the doctrines of that opinion are wrong, consistent neither with a fair interpretation of the statutes of the state nor with the later and best-considered decisions of the courts generally; and, as an attempted rule of property, unsubstantial, and difficult, if not practicably impossible, of execution. We therefore decline to follow it. Applying the principles of this opinion to the facts in this case, we have no doubt that the Wenzlaffs took a good title to the property conveyed to them.

(.....N. J. ....)

- *1. When the facts are undisputed, the character of a way used by the public, whether it be a way by dedication, prescription, or one which the public has been expressly or impliedly invited or allured to use, is a matter of law, and can be determined as such by the court, upon the trial of the question whether the owner of the premises on which the way exists is bound to abstain from any fact or act which will make entry thereon, or the use thereof, dangerous.
2. Whoever does a wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that may ensue, in the ordinary and natural course of events, though such consequences be immediately and directly brought about by intervening causes if such intervening causes were set in motion by the original wrongdoer.

3. Where a railroad company permits a well-defined footway to be established by such use as the public desires or chooses to make of it, as a convenient footway over their property, and alongside a railroad bridge of such company, to and from a passenger station, and had separated such way by a fence from the tracks, so that it was not subject to the risks and incidental dangers of the railroad,—Held, that the railroad company, by such conduct, had exhibited an intention that the footway should be used by the public, and, by such manifestation, had induced and allured the public to its use, and that any one using the way within the purpose manifested was entitled to be protected from dangers to the way resulting from want of ordinary care by the railroad company.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, Jr., for plaintiff:

The right of the public accrues by such acquiescence as carries with it the intention of the owner to subject his fee to the public use; and mere acquiescence for twenty years unaccompanied by any act which repels the presumption of such intention (to dedicate) is conclusive evidence of abandonment to the public.

Hammill was "invited" to be at the place when he was injured.

The fencing of the pathway both in Newark and East Newark the maintenance of a convenient footpath across the bridge, the acquiescence of the company for forty years in thousands of people crossing them daily, amount to invitation.

A railroad company impliedly invites all persons to come to their station. Thus a person meeting a friend is so invited.

There was in this case no invitation, no inducement or allurement on the part of the defendant.

Lippincott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages for injuries occasioned by the alleged negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff contended that the proximate cause of the accident and consequent injuries to him was the neglect of the defendant, the railroad company, to give the statutory signal of the approach of its train towards the crossing over the railroad tracks at First street, in the town of Harrison, in the county of Hudson. The plaintiff, at the time of the accident to him, was standing on a much-used path on the property of the defendant, close to, and running parallel with, the railroad track of the defendant, extending from the railroad crossing of First street, in the town of Harrison, connecting with a footwalk at the railroad bridge over the Passaic river into Newark, then again by a path alongside, and about parallel with, the railroad tracks, into Centre street, to the Centre Street station of the defendant's railway. It was alleged in the evidence—and this was a subject of some considerable dispute—that no signal, either by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell, was given by the defendant of the approach of the train to the crossing at First street, and that another man, by the name of Barry, carrying a box of tools on his shoulder, negligently and carelessly went upon the crossing at First street, and was struck by the locomotive, and killed, and some of the tools, by the force of the collision, were thrown with much violence against the plaintiff, injuring him severely. These, with other undisputed facts, show that First street, in the town of Harrison, running in a northerly and southerly direction, crosses the railroad of the defendant at grade. From First street the grade of the natural surface of the land descends to the Passaic river, and over this space the railroad, which is a single track, is laid upon an embankment. Along the north side of this embankment there is a paved street but this street connects with no bridge over the river. On the south side of the railroad bridge across the river, the defendant had constructed a footway leading from Newark over the river, and into the town of Harrison, and separated by railings, etc., from the other portions of the bridge. This footway had been for over twenty years used, with the knowledge of the defendant company, openly and notoriously, by all persons desirous of crossing over the Passaic river, either way, at that point. From the Harrison end of this footway on the bridge to First street, on the railway embankment, on the south side thereof, either the defendant had constructed a well-marked path leading to First street, or else the public using the same had trodden a footpath there. Between this path and the other portion of the railroad embankment the defendant had erected a picket fence extending from the bridge to First street, thus completely separating this path from the railroad track. At the Newark end of the footway of the bridge there existed another path, either constructed by the defendant, or made from use by the public, leading from the footway of the bridge to Centre street, in the city of Newark, and from thence, along the sidewalk of Centre street, to the Centre Street station,—a regular passenger station of the defendant railway. The evidence is undisputed that this way, throughout its entire extent, from First street, in the town of Harrison, to the Centre Street station, in Newark, has been in constant public use for over twenty years. In fact, it is shown that it has been in constant public use ever since the railroad bridge was erected, over forty years ago, and that such use has been with the full knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of the railroad company. The evidence shows that thousands pass along it, and over the footway, every day, on their way between the town of Harrison and the city of Newark, and on their way to and from the Centre Street station of the defendant railroad. In fact, there appears to be no dispute that these footpaths, and a footpath over the bridge, connect the town of Harrison with the Centre Street depot of defendant company, and that this way is used to reach this depot from the town of Harrison, as well as a regular way connecting the town of Harrison with the city of Newark. The accident which caused the injuries complained of to the plaintiff was occasioned by a train of the defendant approaching from an easterly direction towards the crossing at First street. As it approached the crossing the plaintiff was with a companion, passing along the path from First street to the footway on the bridge, to cross over into Newark. He stopped a moment, and was, with his friend, watching the approaching train. As the train approached First street, Barry, who had a box of tools on his shoulder, went hurriedly upon the crossing at First street, in front of the train, and was killed. The box of tools was struck by the engine. Some of the tools were propelled over the picket fence along this path, and struck the plaintiff, and thus he received his injuries. These facts all appeared in the evidence of the plaintiff, and appear to be the undisputed facts in the case. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff was that neither the bell on the engine was rung, nor was the whistle sounded, on the approach of the train to this crossing. A motion to nonsuit was refused, and the evidence upon the part of the defendant was directed entirely to prove that the proper statutory signals were given, and to the question of damages; and at the close of the evidence a motion to direct a verdict was made upon the same grounds that nonsuit was requested, and refused.

From the conceded facts in the case, the character of this way became a conclusion of law; and both upon the motion to nonsuit, and to direct a verdict for the defendant, the learned trial judge held that the defendant had separated this footway across the bridge, and the path approaching it from First street, from the other portions of its roadway, by the erection of the rails and fence, so as to render it impracticable for the defendant to use it in connection with its general business, and that, under all the facts, the defendant had notified such of the public as used this way that it was not subject to the risks and incidental dangers of the traffic of the railroad, and had made a designation of these portions of the bridge and path to the use of the public, and that there was exhibited an intention and purpose on the part of the defendant that it should or could be used by the public either as an access to its station, or over its property, and that by that manifestation it induced the public to its use, and that, within the scope of the purposes so manifested, the use of it was to be protected from dangers arising by reason of the want of ordinary care on the part of the railway company. The trial judge, so holding, refused to nonsuit, or to direct a verdict for the defendant, leaving the question of negligence to the jury. The conclusion reached as to the character of this way, as presented by this case, renders unnecessary the consideration whether it was subject to public use by dedication or prescription,—two questions much discussed in briefs of counsel.

It is clear that the defendant maintained this way as a convenient and accessible footpath across the bridge and along its embankment, for the purpose of communication between its station at Centre street, in the city of Newark, and the town of Harrison. There is no denial of this conclusion anywhere in the evidence. There is no evidence that this footway was devoted exclusively to the use of its workmen. It may be that in the beginning the public, at either end of the footway across the bridge, took such path as they chose, in order to reach First street, in the town of Harrison, or to reach Centre Street station or the streets in the city of Newark; but in a very little time the footpath at either end became well defined by public use, and became so well recognized that the defendant separated it from its tracks, as shown in the evidence, devoting it to such use as the public desired to make of it, to such of the public as chose to use it, in going to and from this station in Centre street, or to such of the public as chose to use it as a convenient footway to cross the river. It is in proof, undisputed, that on the Newark side of the river, at this point, there is a dense population, and that at the other end of this path, in the town of Harrison, there is quite a settlement, with the principal part of the town but a short distance away, and that this was by far the most convenient method reaching the town of Harrison from this station. This way was a distinct advantage to the defendant, and it is apparent that the public were distinctly invited to use it, and that such invitation was general in its character. Therefore, there existed no necessity, in order to fix liability for want of ordinary care, to conclude that this was a public way, either by dedication or by prescription. The trial judge concluded that, although there may not have existed a public way by prescription or dedication, yet the defendant, as the owner of the premises over which the way passed, had exhibited an intention that it should be used by the public, and by that manifestation had invited, induced, or allured the public to its use, and that the plaintiff, using it within the scope of the purpose manifested was entitled to be protected from dangers of the way resulting from want of ordinary care. This principle is now firmly established in this state. It was indicated in New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. West, 32 N. J. L. 91, and distinctly held in Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 84 N. J. L. 467; and the liability is based "on a purpose manifested on the part of the owner that a way shall be used by the public, and the same is held out as a means of access to a house, store, or other passage through lands, and the public, or such as have occasion, are expressly or impliedly invited to use it according to the purpose intended." 1 Thomp. Neg. 307-309. This whole subject has recently undergone extensive treatment in the court of errors and appeals of this state in Phillips v. Burlington Library Co. 55 N. J. L. 307. In that case the leading authorities are reviewed; and the doctrine stated by Mr. Justice Depue is that mere permission to pass over dangerous lands, or acquiescence in such passage, for the benefit and convenience of the licensee, creates no duty on the part of the owner, except to refrain from acts willfully injurious. But the owner or occupier of lands, who, by intention, express or implied, induces persons to come upon the premises, is under a duty to exercise ordinary care to render the premises reasonably safe for such purposes, or at least to abstain from any act that will make the entry upon or the use of the premises dangerous. The gist of the liability, in such cases, consists in the fact that the person injured did not act merely on motion of his own, to which no sign of the owner or occupier contributed, but that he entered the premises because he was led by the acts or conduct of the owner to believe that the premises were intended to be used in the manner in which he used them, and that such use was not only acquiesced in, but was in accordance with the intention or design for which the way or place was adapted, and prepared or allowed to be used. The conclusion reached is that the trial judge committed no error at all in withholding from the jury the determination of the character of the way on which the plaintiff was at the time of the accident, and instructing the jury, upon the undisputed facts, that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence because of his presence there, nor because of his standing in the way, at the time of the accident.

The question whether the defendant company neglected the statutory signals upon approaching the crossing at First street, where

Barry was struck, was a disputed one, as a matter of evidence. Some of the witnesses affirmed that no signal whatever was given, others said they did not hear it, while the engineer and fireman testify that the bell was rung the required legal distance from the crossing, and kept ringing until the crossing was passed. This question was properly submitted to the jury, and the jury instructed that, if they found the bell was rung as required by the statute, then no negligence on the part of the defendant company was proven, and no recovery could be had. Upon the evidence, as presented in this case, it is not competent here to determine that the finding of the jury on this subject was not fully justified. This being a pure question of fact, especially within the province of the jury to determine, a mere difference of conclusion on the part of the court would not be sufficient to nullify the verdict of the jury.

But it is contended that this negligent conduct of the defendant, conceding it to exist, was not the proximate cause of the injury. The contention is that the negligence of Barry, in placing himself carelessly in front of the locomotive, with the box of tools on his shoulder, was the independent and proximate cause of the injury. It is true that Barry's negligence contributed to his own death, and the trial judge instructed the jury that his negligence tended to the production of the injury received by the plaintiff, and that if Barry's negligence stood alone, as an independent cause of the injury, there could exist no right of recovery on the part of the plaintiff; but it was submitted to the jury whether the statutory signal was given or not, and, if not given, that was negligence on the part of the defendant, and, if it co-operated with the negligence of Barry in producing the injury of the plaintiff, a right of recovery existed, but, if it did not co-operate with the negligence of Barry in producing the injury to the plaintiff, then no right of recovery in the plaintiff existed. If the injury was the result of the joint negligence of the defendant and Barry, a liability on the part of the defendant ensued. It is premised that this was a proper submission to the jury, upon the evidence in the cause, and that the law, as applicable, was properly stated to the jury. It was not within the province of the court to assume that statutory signals were given, nor, upon the assumption that they were not given, to say that this negligence did not co-operate with the negligence of Barry, and thus produce the injury to the plaintiff. The result might have been, if the signal had been given, that the accident might not have happened to the plaintiff. It would perhaps be unprofitable, to any very great extent, to enter upon any examination as to the almost infinite number of cases upon this subject of causal connection, proximate cause, combined and concurrent causes, or intervening efficient causes. If there could be deduced from them the very best possible expression of the rule, it would remain, after all, to decide each case largely upon the special facts belonging to it, and often upon very nice discriminations. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of forty-two shares of stock of the Housatonic Railroad Company. Affirmed in part; reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Henry Work and Adolph L. Pincoffs, with Mr. Donald T. Warner, for appellant;

The twenty additional shares of four per cent stock, for the conversion of which Mr. Britton, the defendant, is sought to be held liable in this action, were issued by the Housatonic Railroad Company in payment of claims based on the non-payment of dividends on the old stock, which claims belonged to Mrs. Almira L. Perry, and the title in this stock therefore vested in Mrs. Perry individually.

In considering the rights between life tenant and remainderman, the intention of the corporation in making the settlement is to be controlling in the absence of fraud or collusion.

Gibbons v. Mahon, 186 U. S. 568, 84 L. ed. 580; Daland v. Williams, 101 Mass. 571; Rand v. Hubbell, 115 Mass. 464, 15 Am. Rep. 121; Ellis v. Barfield, 54 L. T. 625.

The issue of the additional preferred stock to any but Mrs. Perry would have been invalid and in violation of the law.

Even if the company could not, against the objection of the remainderman, have issued the stock to Mrs. Perry, the plaintiff cannot succeed in the recovery of the twenty shares of stock.

The defendant cannot be affected by any equities existing between Mrs. Perry and the plaintiff.

NOTE.—As to the division as dividends between life tenant and remainderman, see Spooner v. Phillips (Conn.) 16 L. R. A. 461, and note; and Hite v. Hite (Ky.) 19 L. R. A. 173.

The new shares of 4 per cent preferred new stock were all part of the principal of the fund, and belong to the remainderman and not to the tenant for life.

It is a general and practically uniform rule that cash dividends go to the life tenant, and stock dividends to the capital of the fund.

A cash dividend is a distribution by the corporation of so much money with which the corporation parts, and which becomes the property of the stockholder.

A stock dividend is different. The corporation parts with nothing, but rather confirms its policy of capitalizing its earnings. It gives nothing to the stockholder except that it changes the form of his investment by increasing his number of shares, thereby diminishing his value of each share, leaving the aggregate of all his stock substantially the same. It is of no special importance whether that value be divided into few or many shares.

Terry v. Eagle Lock Co. 47 Conn. 141.

A stock dividend does not distribute property, but simply dilutes the shares as they existed before.

ember, 1870. No further action appears to have been taken by said company in regard to such resolution, or the matters contained therein, until September 6, 1887. On that day notice was given of a special meeting of the original and preferred stockholders, to be held October 5, 1887, "for the purpose of making a settlement and exchange with the stockholders as and in any manner authorized and contemplated by the act or resolution of the general assembly of the state of Connecticut passed at its May session, 1870;" also for the transaction of certain other specified business. From the minutes of said meeting, duly held, pursuant to such notice, October 5, 1887, it appears that: "The chairman stated generally the purposes of the meeting, explained the long pending claims of the preferred stockholders for back or unpaid dividends, which amounted, by a statement he exhibited, to $3,777,866.24, and enlarged on the advantage and desirability of adjusting the same, to remove the cloud over the company, avoid litigation, settle a just debt, and place the company's affairs in a definite shape." Thereupon a preamble and resolution were offered. The preamble stated, among other things, that it was necessary to make provision for the payment of a portion of the funded debt of the corporation, soon falling due; that the holders of the preferred or guaranteed stock had and were pressing claims against the company for back or unpaid dividends on such stock, which claims it was for the interest of the company to compromise and settle; that it was also to the interest of the corporation to secure a reduction of the preferred or guaranteed dividends on such stock henceforth from 8 per centum per annum to 4 per centum per annum, and a relinquishment of the cumulative provisions thereof; that the growth of the business of the company, and its enlarged connections, required an increase of the plant, equipments, and transportation facilities; and that it was also desirable for the company to raise funds for its general business and purposes, and to discharge other obligations. And the resolutions provided first for the borrowing of money, and the issuance of consolidated mortgage bonds therefor, to an amount not exceeding $3,000,000, to be used and sold for the purpose of funding or retiring existing obligations, "paying, settling, or compromising the aforesaid claims of preferred stockholders, as hereinafter agreed, and of carrying out such settlement or compromise," and also for other purposes specified. The resolutions then proceeded as follows: "Resolved, second, that for the purpose of effecting and consummating the settlement or compromise hereinafter agreed upon of the claims of the preferred or guaranteed stockholders for back or unpaid dividends, and of effecting or consummating the exchange hereinafter agreed upon with the common stockholders, and pursuant to powers conferred by the act or resolution aforesaid of July 6, 1870, the preferred capital stock of this company be, and the same hereby is, increased from 11,800 shares to such amount 30,000 shares, but that the rate of dividends preferred thereby shall be four dollars per share per annum, instead of eight dollars per share as heretofore, and such dividends shall not be cumulative, as heretofore; that the holders of said preferred stock shall be entitled to receive, as aforesaid, dividends of four dollars per share in each calendar year before any dividends for such year shall be paid to the holders of common stock, but, when the holders of such preferred stock shall receive four dollars per share of such stock during any one calendar year, then the holders of the common stock shall be entitled to receive four dollars per share before any further dividends shall be paid in said calendar year on such preferred stock; and when both classes shall each have received four dollars per share during any one calendar year any further dividends declared during such year shall be divided pro rata between both such classes of stockholders; and, as above declared, such dividends shall not be cumulative, and there shall be no accumulation of arrears of such dividends, and such preferred stock may be called 'four per cent noncumulative preferred stock.' Resolved, third, that any and all claims, demands, suits, accountings, and liabilities of every kind which the holders of the preferred or guaranteed stock of the Housatonic Railroad Company have or may have against the company to this date for or on account of back or unpaid dividends upon such preferred or guaranteed stock be, and the same are hereby, settled or compromised, adjusted, released, and canceled on the following terms and conditions: (1) The holders of the existing preferred stock shall surrender their certificates of such stock, and shall receive one share of such new four per cent noncumulative preferred stock in exchange for each share of such eight per cent cumulative stock so surrendered, and shall also receive—First, one hundred dollars par value of such bonds authorized by said act and by this meeting, with interest thereon from the date of such surrender; and, second, one additional share of such new four per cent noncumulative stock on the settlement herein made; and all of the same, namely, two shares of such new four per cent noncumulative preferred stock, and one hundred dollars par value of such bonds, with such interest, shall be in full release and settlement of each share of existing eight per cent cumulative preferred stock, and of all claims aforesaid for back or unpaid dividends thereon, and of the larger dividends and cumulative provisions of the existing preferred stock. (2) That the company, through its board of directors, shall have the right to pay one hundred dollars in cash on each share of such preferred stock so surrendered in lieu and instead of said bonds, as above stipulated and provided, if in the judgment of the board it shall be judicious so to do. (3) That all further rights to dividends on the existing preferred stock cease after this day, and the rights and interests of the holders thereof shall be thenceforth such as are conferred or created by such new four per cent noncumulative preferred stock, and no other; that the board of directors are hereby fully authorized and empowered to add (and at will to alter or annul the same) such penalties and conditions to the foregoing provisions as they may deem best in respect of all such stockholders as shall not make such actual surrender within ninety days after notice thereof shall be sent by the secretary by mail to their last post-office address known to him. (4) That the common stockholders of the company, in consideration of assenting to this settlement, shall have the right and privilege contained in resolution fourth upon the conditions therein expressed or referred to. (5) That it is hereby admitted and agreed that such claims are a valid, legal, and subsisting liability and indebtedness of the company to an amount equal at least to the par value of such bonds and additional preferred stock in these resolutions authorized to be issued in consummating any settlement or exchange therein authorized, and that the right of the holders of such preferred stock to vote as heretofore, equally with the holders of common stock, at all elections and meetings of stockholders, is hereby expressly recognized and agreed to. Resolved, fourth, that the holders of the original or common stock of this company shall have the right, and they are hereby declared to be entitled, to exchange and surrender their shares of common stock for the said new four per cent noncumulative preferred stock, upon the basis of one share of said new preferred stock for each three shares of such common or original stock so surrendered and exchanged, and to receive such one share of new four per cent noncumulative preferred stock for each three shares of common stock so surrendered and exchanged; provided, that such exchange and surrender be made within ninety days from this date; and provided, further, that after the expiration of said ninety days the board of directors shall take up and cancel any of such stock, either by purchase or by exchanging the same for bonds or stock authorized by said Act of 1870 and by these resolutions to be issued, only upon such terms and conditions as they may deem best, and as may be agreed to by the owner or owners of such common stock. Resolved, fifth, that the board of directors be, and they are hereby, fully authorized and empowered to issue such four per cent noncumulative preferred stock for the purpose aforesaid, and to make such exchange, and to cause the certificates of such stock to be prepared and executed in such form and manner as they may deem best, and generally to execute all instruments, and do all acts and things, and make all agreements, which, in their absolute judgment and discretion, may be necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes aforesaid, and to carry out the foregoing resolutions, agreements, and acts."

The foregoing resolutions were adopted by a practically unanimous vote of stockholders representing both preferred and common stock; and in accordance with the scheme therein provided Mrs. Perry received the forty-two shares of stock hereinbefore referred to, and in lieu of bonds to that amount in par value she also received $2,000 by check of said railroad company, to her order, as executrix, which she appropriated to her own use. No claim to recover this latter amount of the defendant was pressed in the court below, and no evidence was offered to show that it ever came into his possession. It also appears in the agreed statement of facts in the record that at the time of the above settlement and exchange with the Housatonic Railroad Company the market value of said preferred stock, together with all accumulated dividends claimed thereon, was $145 per share, and that in 1891 the new 4 per cent preferred stock had a market value of $56 per share.

Upon these facts it is the general claim of the defendant, as we have already seen, that it was the clear intention of the railroad company to issue the twenty shares of additional preferred stock, not as a dividend, but in the payment of an admitted debt; that such intention should govern; and that these shares should be held to belong to Mrs. Perry, the life tenant, as the person entitled to the claim which was intended to be paid by them. With the facts recited before us, let us examine the claim. In the exchange of the old stock it is apparent that no consideration was given by the railroad company to the respective rights and interests of life tenants and reversioners or remaindermen of such stock. Nor was any attempt to define the rights of either in the new stock made or thought of. It is unnecessary to determine whether such company, either by virtue of the resolution or otherwise, had any power or authority to make any such adjustment of such interests, since it is manifest that none was intended. All the new stock issued in lieu of or in addition to stock, both preferred and common, which had belonged to Nathaniel P. Perry was properly issued, and the money paid to his executrix, leaving the rights of respective claimants to be elsewhere determined. But, if it were to be conceded that such determination should be governed by the intention of the company, if it could be ascertained, that the additional stock, with the bonds or money, should be in payment, settlement, or compromise of the admitted debt of the company for unpaid dividends to its preferred stockholders, how can such intention be made to appear? That this was indeed one of the purposes of the increase is manifest from the preamble and resolutions recited; but that it was not the only one is also manifest from such preamble and resolutions. It was also "to the interest of this corporation to secure a reduction of the preferred or guaranteed dividends on such stock henceforth from eight per centum per annum to four per centum per annum, and a relinquishment of the cumulative provisions thereof;" and it was also for the interest of holders of common or original stock, which had never paid any dividends, to exchange it for preferred or guaranteed stock, which would pay dividends. Who shall declare—who can know—the extent to which each of these and other purposes, some of which are expressed in the preamble and resolutions, and some, though not expressed, it is impossible not to comprehend, might have been regarded as valuable, and considerations which actuated the exchange and increase of stock? The meeting had no occasion to specifically pass upon these matters, since it treated with the owners of stock only in bulk. But, if the only object had been what the defendant assumes, what occasion was there to retire the old stock? If we use, for illustration, the example of interest largely in arrears upon a note secured by mortgage upon real estate, the maker of which is irresponsible beyond the security, the surrender of the old note and the substitution of a new one, signed by the same maker, and secured upon the same property, for twice the amount of the old, but bearing half the former rate of interest, would seem a peculiar transaction, if regarded solely as a mode of payment of such accrued interest. It is equally hard to see how, in the case before us, increasing the old preferred stock of the corporation, while at the same time proportionately decreasing its guaranteed earning capacity, adding also to its shares in exchange for common stock, admitted on the same plane of earning capacity, could tend in any measure to the benefit of a life tenant of such stock having a claim for unpaid and undeclared dividends, beyond the extent to which the transaction detracted from the just interest of the remainderman in such corporate stock. The doubling of the shares under such circumstances, and then giving the additional shares to the life tenant, would, in effect, take from the remainderman half his proportionate interest in the capital of the company. If there had been only an increase, and such increase had been based upon earnings which ought to have been declared and paid during the term of the life tenant, it might seem legitimate to do this; but in the present case it nowhere appears that the corporation had any earnings to distribute. On the contrary, it does appear that at the time of this exchange the company was obliged to borrow the money required for the compromise by issuing bonds of the company therefor. There was no increase in capital, either by the paying in of money or from accumulated earnings, but only an increase of the number of shares by which the capital was represented. No new property was put in. No new stock was to be sold. The issue of new stock was a readjustment of the capitalized assets of the company, adding nothing thereto, and taking nothing therefrom, and was not a division of anything as profits or dividends, as interest or income. But suppose there had been profits or net earnings, for which cash dividends should have been declared to the owners of preferred stock in excess of those actually declared and paid, it follows, since even the cash given to the stockholders as part of the exchange had to be borrowed, that these earnings had already been invested. They had been added to the capital, and the effect of the action of the stockholders was to confirm the previous action of the directors, and to retain them as such.

But we return to the real argument of the defendant, and granting, for its sake, the first assumption,—that the railroad company admitted the claims of its preferred stockholders against it for undeclared dividends to the extent of 8 per centum per annum constituted a "valid, legal, and subsisting liability and indebtedness of the company to an amount equal at least to the par value of such bonds and additional preferred stock," and that it was the intention of the company that the additional stock, as well as bonds, should be issued only for the payment of such claims, and thus to distinguish between the rights of the holder of the original preferred stock as stockholder and as creditor,—it seems to us that, granting this, though for argument's sake merely, the conclusion is in no wise altered. Calling these claims debts, the fact remains that they are due to stockholders and not to outside parties, and are for undeclared as well as unpaid dividends. If calling them debts implies that the earnings of the company warranted their declaration and payment in cash, and that, not having been paid in cash, it was the purpose of the action taken to pay them partly in bonds, or their avails, and partly by the issue of stock, then, so far forth as such issue of stock is concerned, by whatever name the transaction may be christened, it is, in effect, the declaration of a stock dividend in place of a cash one. It takes nothing out of its corporation, as a cash dividend does, but leaves everything in it capitalized, as a stock dividend does. As between a corporation and its stockholders, it matters little what name may be given to such a transaction, or how it may be considered,—whether a payment of indebtedness or declaration of a dividend. As between the corporation and persons not stockholders, to whom it was indebted, and whose claims are thus to be liquidated, the issue of new stock is in no sense a dividend. It does more than dilute the shares as they existed before. By taking away indebtedness, the transaction adds proportionately to the assets of the corporation. Such an adjustment, if fair, detracts nothing from the value of the original shares, because it returns a just equivalent for the increase. But when a question with which the corporation, as such, is not concerned, arises between the owner of income and that of capital, the case is altered. If the corporation is indebted to the shareholder, plainly the remainderman is not indebted to the life tenant; and if the corporation may pay its debts to such shareholder, as plainly it may not take away from the principal of the fund, which belongs to one, in order that it may be added to the interest of the fund to which another is entitled. Whether it was the intention, therefore, of the railroad company that these additional shares should be issued to the original stockholders as payment for indebtedness or not, it was not, and could not legally have been, the intention that such issue should waste the principal, in order to increase, or even to preserve, the income. Such, however, as we have seen, would be the necessary effect if these new shares were held to be the property of the life tenant.

The defendant says in his brief: "It was for the interest of the stockholder to consent to a change which would give them, in place of an eight per cent cumulative stock, on which the interest had been paid only at very irregular intervals, a four per cent stock on which it was evidently expected that interest would be paid with regularity." But the defendant, in that connection, does not quite go to the extent of asserting that such speculative interest in an increase would have constituted a controlling consideration in inducing a remainderman to accept one share of 4 per cent which could only be paid provided the net earnings of the road were 8 per cent upon its previous stock, in place of one share of such 8 per cent, which must be paid, if all the earnings would permit, and, if not, would constitute, at least in the eyes of the stockholders passing in their meeting upon their own claims, an indebtedness. It appears to us, however this question may be looked at, the plain principles declared in repeated decisions in reference to the respective rights of remaindermen and life tenant in case of increase of capital shares of corporate stock underlie and control the decision which should be reached. Thus, referring to cases in our own jurisdiction, in Brinley v. Grou, supra, the words used in creating the life interest were "rents, dividends, increase, and income;" being somewhat broader terms than in Mr. Perry's will. But this court held that an increase of capital from three to four millions, with an apportionment of new shares pro rata among the stockholders of a corporation at $100 per share, bringing the new stock at once to such a large premium that the trustees, who had been entitled to subscribe for eighty-one shares, sold the right to subscribe for thirty-four shares for a sum which enabled them to subscribe and pay for forty-seven shares, gave nothing to the life tenants; but that the right to subscribe for the new shares, the profit on the sale of the right, and the new shares taken, all went to the trustees as a part of the principal of the fund. This court, in answering the questions asked by the trustees, said: "A shareholder has no proprietary interest in the accumulated profits properly retained by a corporation for the protection of its capital. He cannot acquire one by summoning it to make a rest in its business, and take an account of them. He first obtains one when it has either in fact, form, or intent set his proportion thereof to his individual credit. This, of course, is the measure of the right of a life tenant. There is, to him, only a possibility that the profits may be divided, or that the use of them by the corporation may increase its dividend during his term." So also in Hotchkiss v. Brainerd Quarry Co., supra, this court quotes with approval the language of Wood, V. O., in Re Barton's Trust, L. R. 5 Eq. 288: "The dividend to which a tenant for life is entitled is the dividend which the company chooses to declare. And when the company meet, and say they will not declare a dividend, but will carry over some portion of the half year's earnings to the capital account, and turn it into capital, it is competent for them, I apprehend, to do so; and when this is done everybody is bound by it, and the tenant for life of those shares cannot complain." Again, in the very recent case of Spooner v. Phillips, supra, the subject is exhaustively discussed, with abundant citation of authority, and it is declared as settled: First. That the word "dividends," if unqualified, signifies dividends payable in money; that the word "income:" has a broader meaning, but not broad enough to include anything not separated in some way from the principal; that accumulated surplus, so long as it is retained by the corporation, either as surplus or increased stock, can in no proper sense be called income. Second. That a corporation owns the undivided earnings of the business, rather than the stockholders, and the latter cannot become the separate owners of any part of the common property until set apart by the management for that purpose, by declaring a dividend or otherwise. Among the many cases cited in the opinion is that of Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, the original case being reported with extended note in 54 Am. Rep. 262, a most instructive and exceedingly pertinent case, in which the conclusion stated is this: "Reserved and accumulated earnings, so long as they are held and invested by the corporation, being part of its corporate property, it follows that the interest therein, represented by each share, is capital and not income, of that share, as between tenant for life and the remainderman, legal or equitable, thereof." And again was said: "A dividend is something with which a corporation parts but it parted with nothing in issuing this new stock." See also Minot v. Puina, 99 Mass. 101, 96 Am. Dec. 705, with note; Rand v. Hubbell, 115 Mass. 461, 15 Am. Rep. 121.

The defendant, however, further contends that the issue of the additional preferred stock to any one but the life tenant would have been invalid, and in violation of law. It is said that the resolution of 1870 is the sole authority for this issue; that by virtue of that enactment stock could only be issued for the purpose of payment of existing claims, and the conversion of the common stock into preferred stock; that, therefore, this action is an attempt to claim for the remainderman stock which was not intended to be issued to him by the company, and which, if issued to him by the company, would have been absolutely void in his hands. In answer to this it is unnecessary to consider whether the Act of 1870 was in existence at all in 1887, or whether, as contended by the plaintiff, it had been repealed by subsequent legislation in 1878. Nor is it necessary to determine whether, if such act was in existence when it provided for the issue of bonds or stock in settlement of claims, it was followed when both bonds and stock were issued in such settlement. It is unnecessary, we say, to decide these matters, since, if the defendant's contention as to both were conceded, the act in no wise authorized any interference with or change of the terms of the 8 per cent guaranteed stock. Nor have those who are entitled to the remainder in this stock in any way assented to its surrender. If, therefore, such issue of new stock is only valid because authorized by the Act of 1870, and only to the extent and for that the rights of the holders of the old preferred stock to their capital cannot be affected by such issue; and it is only upon the theory that two new shares, yielding 4 per cent each, represent one share of the old, yielding 8 per cent, that it can be held that such capital would not be affected thereby.

It is further said by the defendant that he stands in the position of a bona fide holder for value, and that he cannot be affected by any equities existing between Mrs. Perry and the plaintiff. The record, however, states that the defendant had seen a copy of the will of said Nathaniel P. Perry, and had read the provisions therein contained with respect to the interest of Mrs. Perry in the Housatonic Railroad stock. It also appears that the stock was transferred to him to be applied in part payment of a debt by Mrs. Perry, who was his grandmother, three days before her death. There is nothing whatever in the record to justify the assertion of the defendant that this debt was for the advances made Mrs. Perry upon the faith of her ownership of this stock. It is true that the stock had been transferred from Mrs. Perry's name, as executrix, to her individual name. But the record leaves no room to question the defendant's full knowledge of the source from which this stock was derived, and the trust under which it was held. The defendant therefore stands in the same position, in respect to these shares, as Mrs. Perry stood, and the right of the plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non, to maintain this suit against him, rests upon the same foundation as that which supported the recovery by the plaintiff in Mansfield v. Lynch, 59 Conn. 320, 12 L. R. A. 285. In each case the party exercising the original administration parted with assets of the estate in a manner which gave the party receiving them no right to retain them against such administrator. They therefore still remained assets of the estate, which it was the duty of the administrator de bonis non to administer. The act of Mrs. Perry in causing a transfer of these shares to her individual name, and the subsequent act of transfer to the defendant's firm, for whatever purpose and with whatever intent said acts were done, did not divest the estate of Nathaniel P. Perry of its interest in the stock. Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. §§ 1043, 1052. As against this defendant, who asserts his ownership of such stock although occupying no better position in regard to it than Mrs. Perry did, the plaintiff has the right to consider it unadministered property belonging to the estate which he represents; and, when demand was made by the plaintiff upon the defendant for it, and he refused to surrender it, claiming title, with the ability which the transfer of the certificates to his firm gave, to assert such title, and to use the stock as his own, such refusal constituted conversion. Hartford Ice Co. v. Greenwoods Co. 61 Conn. 166. For these reasons there is no error in the judgment of the court below in awarding damages to the plaintiff for the twenty shares of stock in question. But to the extent that such judgment also includes damages for the conversion of the remaining twenty-two

It appears from the record that at the time of her death Mrs. Perry was largely indebted to the defendant, and that her estate was insolvent. Commissioners were appointed upon her estate, to whom the defendant presented his claim. The plaintiff also presented to such commissioners the same claim set forth in this present action against the defendant for the conversion of the stock. This claim was allowed, but an appeal was taken from the doings of the commissioners, which is still pending, and no payment or dividend has yet been made upon said claim. At the time of the demand by the plaintiff upon the defendant, the defendant understood that his custody of the twenty-two shares of stock was for and in the behalf of the executor of Mrs. Perry, and he did not claim, and has not claimed, any interest therein, except as creditor of her estate. This stock stands in the name of Almira L. Perry, executrix. It does not appear that the certificates have ever been indorsed, so that the defendant could, if he so desired, make any use of the stock for his own benefit. He has never desired to do so, and there is no ground to hold that he has ever converted this stock to his own use, unless, under the circumstances, the demand for and the refusal to deliver the certificates constituted such conversion.

It is the further claim of the defendant that he was a party to the proceedings before the commissioners in which the claim was made against the estate of Mrs. Perry for the conversion of these shares, and that, as against him, the plaintiff elected to consider these shares as a part of her estate; that, this being so, it would be unjust to him to compel him to pay for their value, or to deliver them, in a proceeding in which the executor of Mrs. Perry is not a party. It is the claim of the plaintiff that he has not elected, and that this is not a case in which he is put to any election; that it is an action of tort, in which the liability for the conversion alleged is several as well as joint; that "a judgment against one of two joint trespassers, without satisfaction, is not a bar to an action against his co-trespasser for the same trespass, and does not pass the title of the property to the defendant" (Sheldon v. Kibbe, 8 Conn. 215, 8 Am. Dec. 176; Atwater v. Tupper, 45 Conn. 144, 29 Am. Rep. 674); and that the allowance of this claim by commissioners ought to have no higher effect than a judgment. It seems to us that this contention does not meet the precise point of the true issue. The question is not whether the defendant would be severally liable for conversion, but whether he has in fact converted this stock by his refusal to deliver it to the plaintiff on demand, as we have herein previously held that he might be considered to have done with the twenty shares of stock. As bearing upon the question, the further inquiry as to the reason or ground for such refusal is irrelevant. Hartford Ice Co. v. Greenwoods Co. supra. The plaintiff's claim for conversion, presented to the commissioners on Mrs. Perry's estate, was allowed, and, though an appeal was taken, he is still pursuing it.

If finally allowed, and a dividend paid upon it, the estate available for the payment of other claims—among them the large one of the defendant—will be thereby so much lessened; and certainly the executor on Mrs. Perry's estate would thereby acquire an interest in this stock for the benefit of the creditors. Upon these circumstances, the refusal of the defendant to deliver the certificates of stock to the plaintiff, while at the same time disclaiming title or interest in the stock himself, except to the extent of his interest as creditor, upon the contingency of such stock becoming assets of the estate of Mrs. Perry, was not such an absolute and unqualified refusal to deliver property to the owner or party entitled to the possession, on demand made, as constituted a conversion of the property. Hartford Ice Co. v. Greenwoods Co. supra.

There is error in the amount of the judgment rendered to the extent of the damage awarded for the value of the twenty-two shares, and to that extent it is reversed, and it is affirmed to the extent of the damages for the conversion of the twenty shares.

The other Judges concurred, except Carpenter, J., who dissented as to that part of the opinion holding there was error in the judgment below respecting the conversion of the twenty-two shares.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. T. FINCHER, Appt.,

v.

W. A. HANEGAN.

(.....Ark.....)

A mistake in the initial of the middle name of a mortgagor does not necessarily defeat the effect of record as notice, where there is nothing to show that there is more than one person of the name in question.

(May 19, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Nevada County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the proceeds of certain cotton which were claimed by the respective parties under rival chattel mortgages. Affirmed.

The appellant was a merchant doing business at Rosston in Nevada County. Appellee was a merchant doing business at Hope in Hempstead County. Henry McMahon Ward was a farmer, who lived in Nevada County. On February 6, 1891, Ward executed a mortgage to Hanegan on his entire crop of cotton for that year, and signed and acknowledged the same as Henry N. Ward. This mortgage was duly recorded. On August 31, 1891, Ward executed a mortgage to Fin-

NOTE—Form of Christian name required by recording acts.

Whether or not the recording acts will require a modification of the common-law rule in respect to what constitutes a name (see note to Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Steytler (Pa.) 14 L. R. A. 680) is a question which has been considered in comparatively few cases. The recording acts will certainly fall far short of fulfilling their purpose if the courts apply to records the old common-law rule which holds a middle name or initial to be no part of one's legal name. FINCHER v. HANEGAN is a good illustration of what may be expected from such holding. But there are cases which go much further in the direction of uncertainty in the records than FINCHER v. HANEGAN.

Thus in a California case it was held that the owner of land may convey it by the use of a different name than that appearing in his title deed and the record in his true name will prevail against one who subsequently takes a deed from him by the name found in such title deed, the latter being a nickname. Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am. Dec. 830.

The majority of the cases held, however, that correct Christian names are necessary in an index of judgments. Ridgway's App. 15 Pa. 177, 53 Am. Dec. 586; York Bank's App. 36 Pa. 458; Smith's App. 47 Pa. 123.

A judgment against Jacob B. is not notice if recorded against John B. Zimmerman v. Briggans, 5 Watts, 183.

And in a Pennsylvania case it was said that "it is certain that an initial standing with a name of baptism is no part of it in pleading. But it follows not that an omission of it is to be disregarded in an index of notice to purchasers. And if a judgment creditor permits the omission from his record" 34 L. R. A.

of the initial which distinguishes his debtor from others of the same name, he must bear the loss." Wood v. Reynolds, 7 Watts & S. 406.

And in that state the doctrine is now established that the omission of the middle letter from the index is fatal. Hutchinson's App. 23 Pa. 186.

A rule has found considerable favor which holds the record sufficient if it contains enough to lead the inquirer to the information designed to be imparted by it, and for this purpose the inquirer's extraneous knowledge is taken into consideration.

Thus in Work v. Darby, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 269, one who had received land as Jane T. sold it as Sarah Jane T. to one who knew that she was generally known as Jane T., and who executed to her a purchase money mortgage. Judgment had previously been entered against her as Jane T., and it was held that the record of the judgment was notice to the purchaser but not to a subsequent assignee of the mortgage who did not know that she was known as Jane T.

So the record of a deed from J. N. H. by the name of J. H., by which latter name he was as well known as by the former, is sufficient constructive notice to subsequent purchasers. Gillespie v. Rogers, 146 Mass. 612. That case is, however, founded in part on the Massachusetts doctrine that mistakes in the record fall on the purchaser, and that it makes no difference if the constructive notice provided by law proves insufficient.

Property was conveyed to Almira J. Stringham; she executed a deed of trust on the land by the name of J. S. Stringham, which was indexed as A. J. Stringham and the caption of the record read Almira J. Stringham. This was held sufficient to give constructive notice of the true grantor. Huston v. Seeley, 27 Iowa, 190.

The principle that the index may be against the corded. When Fincher took his mortgage, he wrote to the clerk of Nevada County to know if there was any mortgage on record, against Henry M. Ward, and received a response in the negative. Fincher then sold goods to Ward taking the mortgage, and in the fall received two bales of cotton which he applied on payment of his account. Subsequently he received notice from Hanegan that the cotton was covered by the latter's mortgage, and upon his refusal to surrender the proceeds this suit was brought.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Hamby & White, for appellant:

A mortgage to be valid against strangers must describe the property with sufficient definiteness and particularly to distinguish and identify it from all other property. It may be good between the parties, and void against strangers because of the uncertainty of the description of the property or the amount of the debt, either in the original or the record thereof.

Gilchrist v. Gough, 68 Ind. 576, 30 Am. Rep. 250; Gurley v. Davis, 39 Ark. 394; Dodds v. Neel, 41 Ark. 70; Krons v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 350; Dervey v. Sugg, 14 L. R. A. 393, 109 N. C. 323.

Is it not equally necessary and equally honest and just to strangers, that the mortgagor shall be described with sufficient definiteness and truthfulness to identify him from all other persons and especially from all others whose names are similar to his own?

The doctrine of the law "that knows of but one Christian name" is founded on the sound and just principle that no man shall be made to suffer loss or punishment on account of any unintentional error or omission in his name, or

"law of notice" and never was intended to have.

If one found the name Henry N. Ward on the index, he perhaps ought to be required as a precaution against being misled by a clerical error of the clerk, to look beyond that and examine the record itself. But if upon doing that he found the name in the body of the mortgage, and in the acknowledgment, and the signature, all written Henry N. Ward, as it was in this case, a decision which required him to inquire further could not be founded either on reason or justice.

Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 649, 654, 655, and cases there cited.

Upon what authority is it said that "the law knows of but one Christian name?" Is it a fact that the law does not, and will not, know of but one such name? Does any law prohibit a man from bearing more than one Christian name? And if he is not so prohibited, upon what authority can the courts ignore and refuse to recognize more than one of his Christian names especially when he employs them to describe and identify himself from all other persons of similar names, as this court has repeatedly held that chattels in a mortgage shall be described so as to identify and distinguish it from all other chattels of similar character? His name is his own. The middle Christian name is as much a part of it as any other part. Indeed it may be that it has been transmitted to him from a noble ancestor, and that he is prouder of it than any other part. And would not the decision that ignored and refused to recognize it be purely arbitrary, and entirely without reason or law to support it? We think so.

man by the name by which he is generally known was applied in the case where a judgment indexed against F. Z. was held to be a lien on land standing in the name of John Jacob Frederic Z. Jenny v. Zehnder, 101 Pa. 296.

So an index against J. W. H. is sufficient notice to one about to deal with John W. H. Pinney v. Russell, 52 Minn. 443.

And the record of a mortgage by S. M. J. is sufficient to impart notice of a mortgage of Samuel M. J. Miltonvale. State Bank v. Kuhnle, 50 Kan. 430.

But a judgment indexed against one by the first name of Ellen is not notice to one who purchases the land of a person using the first name of Helen. Thomas v. Desney, 57 Iowa, 68.

And land conveyed to Mary A. Allely is not, as against subsequent purchasers, bound by a judgment record as against May Alley. Phillips v. McKaig, 36 Neb. 353.

A rule much in harmony with the spirit of the recording acts and which would be simple and of uniform operation in all cases of real estate records has been adopted in Illinois.

In Grundies v. Reid, 107 Ill. 304, it was held that the law protected the purchaser of property by the title which appears of record, unless there is notice of something to the contrary. Therefore, one who made a loan in reliance on the record title was protected against a prior judgment against the owner by another name, although he was as well known by the latter as by the former.

The application of that rule would seem to be just and to work no hardship to any one and would 24 L. R. A.

reach by a much more direct method a result reached by other decisions in which there is an appearance of conflict.

Thus the case of Johnson v. Hess, 9 L. R. A. 471, 128 Ind. 298, which is well stated in the opinion in FINCHER v. HANEGAN, appears to be somewhat in conflict with the next cited case of Crouse v. Murphy, 12 L. R. A. 68, 140 Pa. 336, and it undoubtedly is so on the question of name, but the two cases are in harmony upon the question of the right to rely upon the title as it appears of record. In the former case the record title was H. W. Mankedick and the judgment was against William Mankedick. In the latter case the record title stood in the name of Daniel J. Murphy and the judgment was against D. Murphy. In the former case the middle name William was held to be no part of the name, in the latter case the J. was practically held to be a part of the name, but in both cases the record title prevailed as against names by which the owners were commonly known. In the latter case, however, the question of the proper form of the name is not considered, but the case is decided on the ground that the holder of the judgment neglected to avail himself of information which he might have acquired as to the name of his debtor, while the one who purchased the land was negligent in no respect, and therefore, the one not guilty of negligence was protected. If, however, the doctrine is to prevail that the middle letter is no part of the name, it is difficult to see how there is negligence in not taking notice of its possible existence.

Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Steytler, 14 L. R. A. 690, 146 Pa. 434.

It is a matter of public history, of which we presume the court will take cognizance, that one of its illustrious associate judges of the early days—Mr. Justice William Conway B—having but one Christian name, found it necessary when he became a man of affairs to adopt the letter “B” as a part of his name by which he could describe himself so as not to be mistaken for a relative of the same name.

Messrs. William M. Greene and James H. McCollum, for appellee:

The law recognizes but one Christian name, the middle Christian name or initial is held to be immaterial by at least the greater weight of authorities. The middle Christian name or initial has no more significance, and no greater importance is attached thereto, than the affixes “Jr.” and “Sen.” which are often used to distinguish persons of the same name.

Keene v. Meade, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 581; Games v. Stiles, 89 U. S. 14 Pet. 323, 10 L. ed. 476; State v. Smith, 12 Ark. 622, 56 Am. Then should the mortgage under consideration be declared to be no notice because simply the initial of the middle Christian name of the mortgagor was signed erroneously? No greater accuracy in the description of the mortgagor is required than that of the property conveyed, and the law does not require the description of the property to be such as to distinguish it from all other property.

Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 54; Harkey v. Jones, 54 Ark. 158; Alexander v. Graves, 25 Neb. 453.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Was the mortgage by Henry M. Ward to W. A. Hanegan, under the name of “Henry N. Ward,” after it was acknowledged and filed for record, notice of its existence and contents to W. T. Fincher, the second mortgagee? As between Hanegan and Ward, the mortgage was undoubtedly valid, for the reason that Ward was estopped from saying that “Henry N. Ward” was not his true name. But it could under no circumstances be valid against third persons, who acquired liens on, or purchased, the property thereby mortgaged, until it was filed for record. Mass. Dig. § 4743. If it had been executed and properly acknowledged by the mortgagor, under his true name, and filed for record, it would have been valid against all liens subsequently acquired by third persons from the mortgagor, and against all subsequent purchasers from Ward of the mortgaged property. Did the insertion in his name of the letter “N” instead of “M,”—the correct initial of his middle name,—render it invalid as to subsequent lienors and purchasers? Upon similar questions there is a contrariety of opinion.

In Gillespie v. Rogers, 146 Mass. 612, it is said: “When deeds or other instruments required to be recorded are given or received by persons or corporations known by different names, the records may fail to furnish exact and literal information; and yet, when the instrument itself is a genuine one, and has been executed in good faith, the record has been held sufficient to furnish constructive notice of the real transaction. A striking illustration of this is found in a former decision of this court. Stat. 1865, chap. 48, § 2, provided that no assignment of future earnings should be valid against a trustee process, unless recorded in the town or city clerk's office before the service of process. A man by the name of Germain Sirois, who was also sometimes called ‘John Keever,’ made an assignment of his future earnings under the name of ‘Joseph Cyr,’ which name he signed by his mark, being unable to read or write. This was duly recorded. There was no intention of misleading anybody by the wrong name affixed to the assignment. It was a mistake, the man being an ignorant foreigner, who could not speak English. Afterwards, a creditor brought a trustee process. It was held that the assignment was good as between the original parties to it, and, being recorded, was good as against attaching creditors. Ouimet v. Sirois, 124 Mass. 162. See also, Gifford v. Rockett, 121 Mass. 481; O'Connor v. Cavan, 126 Mass. 117.”

In Alexander v. Graves, 25 Neb. 453, the opinion of the court is succinctly and correctly stated in the syllabus of the case as follows: “A. purchased certain personal property on time, and, for the purpose of securing the purchase price, executed a chattel mortgage on the property purchased. The purchase was made and the chattel mortgage was executed under an assumed and fictitious name. The parties to the transaction being unacquainted, the vendor supposed the name given was the true name of the purchaser. The purchaser stated that his residence was in Webster county, which was correct, and the mortgage was duly filed in the proper office in that county. Subsequent to the filing of the mortgage, A. sold the property to C., under his true name, after C. had examined for chattel mortgages executed by A., and found none. In an action of replevin by B. against C. for the possession of the mortgaged property, it was held that B. should recover judgment.” This decision, it seems to us, was based upon the fact that the mortgage was executed and filed before the second purchase, the court holding that the purchaser from the mortgagor had constructive notice of the existence of the prior chattel mortgage from the record.

In Johnson v. Hess, 126 Ind. 298, 9 L. R. A. 471 (an Indiana case), it appears that a judgment was recovered against Henry William Mankedick, and was entered in the re-ord of the court and upon the judgment docket as recovered against "William Mankedick." He purchased a tract of land after the rendition of the judgment, and it was conveyed to him as "H. W. Mankedick." Thereafter, he sold and conveyed it to James G. La Forte, and described himself in the deed as "H. W. Mankedick." La Forte then sold and conveyed it to William Johnson. Afterwards, an action was instituted by Johnson to enjoin the sale of the land under an execution on the judgment against Mankedick. Upon this state of facts, this question arose: Was the judgment, as recorded, constructive notice to Johnson of its lien? The court held that Johnson was chargeable with notice of the existence of the judgment against William Mankedick, and of the amount and terms and conditions of it, but nothing more; that he was not chargeable with notice that his remote grantor, H. W. Mankedick, and William Mankedick, named in the judgment, were the same person; that "the judgment did not disclose the fact, nor did it suggest an inquiry which 'would have led up to' an ascertainment of the fact;" that, for all legal purposes, the full name of Johnson's grantor was "Henry Mankedick;" and that "the middle initial was unimportant, and suggested nothing."

In Crouse v. Murphy, 140 Pa. 335, 12 L. R. A. 58, one Daniel J. Murphy owned a lot in the city of Philadelphia. "His deed for the same was regularly recorded, as was a mortgage given by him for a part of the purchase money. He took and he incumbered the title in his proper name, as Daniel J. Murphy. Roggenmoser desired to buy the lot. He found the title properly recorded, and incumbered by a mortgage. Turning from the recorder's office to that of the prothonotary, he caused search to be made for liens on the judgment index against Daniel J. Murphy, and found none. He then completed his purchase, settled the purchase price, and received and recorded his deed. This was in 1888. In June of that year, Murphy went to Chicago to reside. In 1889 the plaintiff, John Crouse, who had a judgment against Daniel Murphy, issued his writ of sci. fa., and served Roggenmoser, as terretenant." The court said: "Was the judgment against Daniel Murphy a lien on the lot? It is admitted that Daniel Murphy and Daniel J. Murphy are the same person. It is clear, therefore, that real estate in the hands of that person would be bound. Having signed his name in the form in which it appears on the judgment index, he could not object to the enforcement of the judgment against his property. As between him and his creditor, it is a question of personal identity. But the defendant is not objecting. It is a purchaser who bought after a search of the records, and with no actual notice of the existence of this judgment, who claims protection. If he did all the law required of him, he is entitled to protection against the judgment of the plaintiff. If he did not, then he must suffer for his want of care in making the search." And, continuing, the court said: "Murphy's title was on record. Whoever dealt with him on the 24 L. R. A. credit of his real estate was bound to know what appeared in his recorded title. It was as much the duty of one who was about to trust him with money or goods because of his ownership of land to know how and by what name he held it, as it was the duty of one about to purchase the land to make the same inquiries. If the creditor neglected his duty, he must lose in consequence. If the purchaser neglected his, he must lose. Because the creditor in this case did neglect to examine the record, he has a note signed with only a part of the maker's name, on which judgment has been entered. With no notice of the habit of his vendor to sign notes in several different ways, and with no means of notice of liens but the record, the purchaser examined, exhausted the means of knowledge within his reach, and, finding no lien against Daniel J. Murphy, or D. J. Murphy, settled with his vendor, and took his deed. If one of these parties must lose, in good conscience, it should be he whose neglect to avail himself of the information which the record could have given him made the loss by the one or the other inevitable."

In Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426, the plaintiff claimed certain horses by virtue of a chattel mortgage given to him by one McPherson, who was the owner, but executed the mortgage on them in the name of John Doyle, who had no interest in them. The mortgage was given to secure a loan of $310, and was taken by an agent who had the money of the plaintiff to lend. When McPherson applied to him for the loan, he gave his name as "John Doyle." The agent, not knowing him, made inquiries about Doyle, but ascertained nothing. Believing McPherson to be the man he represented himself to be, he received the mortgage, filed it in the proper office, and advanced the $310 on the horses. About ten days after this, McPherson sold the horses to the defendant, who was a bona fide purchaser for value, with no notice of any lien on the property, other than would be implied from the filing of the mortgage. The court held that the filing of the mortgage for record was no notice to the defendant, because it was executed under a fictitious name.

This case is unlike that of Crouse v. Murphy, supra. The title of Ward to the mortgaged property did not appear of record to Hanegan. It does not appear that Hanegan was chargeable with neglect of duty in failing to examine the record to see in what name Ward held his property. It is unlike the case of Mackey v. Cole, supra, in which the mortgagor did not execute the mortgage by his surname. In this case, Ward executed the mortgage by his true Christian name and surname.

Was Fincher, the second mortgagee, chargeable with notice of Hanegan's mortgage? It is contended that he was not, because the initial of Ward's middle name does not appear in his signature to the Hanegan mortgage, he having executed it by the name of "Henry N. Ward," when his true name is "Henry M. Ward." But this was immaterial, unless there were more than one person of the same name, and the middle name, or the initial thereof, was necessary to identify the Henry Ward who had executed it. "The law knows but one Christian name. The entire omission of a middle letter is not a misnomer or a variance. The middle letter is immaterial, and a wrong letter may be stricken out or disregarded." State v. Smith, 12 Ark. 622, 56 Am. Dec. 287; Keene v. Meade, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 1, 7 L. ed. 581; Games v. Stiles, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 322, 10 L. ed. 476. To hold, unqualifiedly, that the wrong initial of Ward's middle name in Hanegan's mortgage affected its validity as to third persons would be ignoring this well-established rule of law. There can be no good reason for disregarding it in any case, unless it appear that there be more than one person of the name in question. There is nothing in the spirit or letter of our registration laws which can operate as a repeal of the entire rule. In registration, as in other departments of the law, the exception should prevail in cases where there are more than one person of the same name, and the middle name or initial thereof is necessary to distinguish or identify them. In this case there was no evidence to show that there was more than one Henry Ward in Nevada county, where the Hanegan mortgage was recorded. If there were, the courts cannot take judicial notice of that fact, and the burden was on the second mortgagee to show that there was. Witnesses living in Nevada county testified that they knew of only one "in the country," and the evidence shows that he executed both mortgages. Under the circumstances, sufficient appears to show that Fincher was put on inquiry to ascertain whether the Henry Ward who executed the mortgage to him was not the same person who executed the Hanegan mortgage. He did not make it. The presumption is, if he had, it would have led to the ascertainment of that fact. He was therefore chargeable with notice of the execution of the Hanegan mortgage by Henry M. Ward, and its contents.

Bunn, Ch. J., dissenting:

In dissenting from the opinion of the majority of the court in this case, I assume, on the one hand, that the appellant, the junior mortgagee, acted in perfect good faith, for it is only the question in its legal aspect that I wish to discuss at all. On the other hand, the appellant must be considered as having examined the record of appellee's mortgage, and known its purport.

In all cases where the question is one between the parties, and is, moreover, one of identity merely, such as all criminal cases, matters of pleadings, and identification of parties so as to show chain of title, the saying that the "law knows but one Christian name," or that the "middle name and its initial letter are immaterial," may go, at least, without comment. So, also, the importance of the middle name may, in many instances, not be apparent in cases of absolute conveyances, especially of real estate. Moreover, in a case where the grantor is known as well by one name as by the other, the middle name may not be so important.

But in the increasing commerce of the world, and the closer relation into which men are daily being brought, one to another, in their business, and the growing necessity for greater particularity and nicer observances of the strict rules regulating the absolute and relative rights of property, it is altogether a repetition of the language of a past age to say that middle names are immaterial and need not be taken notice of.

Again, while the name of the owner, in case of real estate, may not be of such great importance, yet that rule does not hold good in case of personal property, when the name of the owner is in fact and in truth always an essential element of the description of the property itself.

After all, there could be little excuse of intruding a discussion of this kind upon the public, were it not for the peculiarity of our registration laws. I need not remind any one of the fact that while no one can be an innocent purchaser of property included in an absolute conveyance, of which he has actual notice, whether it be recorded or not, or is in possession of such knowledge of facts as will put him on the inquiry to acquire all essential knowledge on the subject, no such rule applies to the case of mortgages. Actual knowledge of the existence of an unrecorded mortgage binds no one. Neither is any one in possession of any actual knowledge whatever on the subject bound to add thereto by pushing his inquiries.

The law imputes to every one a knowledge of the record of a mortgage on property about which he attempts to deal, it matters not whether the imputation, in itself, be in fact true or false. The condition thus imposed is in some respects a hard one, and is only justified in its imposition by an admitted necessity, and a principle of unyielding public policy. But there is a corresponding relief, in this: that the dealer is only bound to ascertain the language of the record, and to exercise himself to understand correctly its meaning and purport. He is bound to inquire no further than is plainly suggested in the language of the record; otherwise, he would be trespassing upon the domain of actual knowledge, which has no place in matters of this kind.

There is nothing in the description or location of the property in controversy, as contained in Hanegan's mortgage, to suggest any identity with the cotton in Fincher's mortgage, nor is there any identity between other articles of property mentioned in the two. There is nothing in the locality of ownership to suggest identity. Whatever suggestion is made is the suggestion that a recorded mortgage by Henry N. Ward is a mortgage in fact made by Henry M. Ward; a person known to the inquirer by that name, which is his true name. The same rule that would obliterate the distinction between these two initials would also do away with the distinction between the name "Henry Newport Ward" and the name "Henry Monroe Ward," for it is confidently said that middle names are immaterial, if it is that the initials of such names are to be disregarded. Where is the line of demarcation? Some rules, con-and even when violated only as to the job or title, though they themselves are so extensive in their application as to cover the affairs of the universe; and it is for the reason that it is the fact of the breach, and not its extent or apparent magnitude, that is to be considmajority has set a precedent that will run up to plague us hereafter.

I cite no authorities, being content to rest the case on the authorities cited by the majority.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Augustus H. VANDERPOEL, Substituted Assignee, etc., of the North River Lumber Co., Appt.,

John J. GORMAN, Sheriff, etc., Respnt.

(140 N. Y. 538.)

1. The question of the validity of the attempted transfer of title to an assignee for creditors by a corporation organized in one state and doing business in another, is for the state in which the property is situated.
2. Assignments of personal property valid by the law of the domicile of the assignor are generally recognized as valid by the law of the state where the property is situated, unless they violate its statutory law or its known and settled public policy.
3. At common law an insolvent corporation can make a general assignment in trust to an assignee for the benefit of creditors.
4. The court of one state cannot presume that the common law has been altered in another state in the absence of proof to that effect.
5. The provision of Laws 1890, chap. 584, sec. 48, that no corporation shall make any transfer or assignment to any person whatever in contemplation of its insolvency and declaring every such assignment void, refers solely to domestic corporations.
6. The prohibition of the New York statute against assignments by domestic corporations of property in contemplation of insolvency does not evince any public policy of the state forbidding the exercise by a foreign corporation having property in the state of its inherent common-law right to make such an assignment especially where the assignment is valid in the state of the creation of the corporation and provides for an equal distribution of the property among all of the creditors in conformity with the policy of New York regarding the distribution of the property of insolvent domestic corporations.
7. A foreign corporation carrying on business in New York may there make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors without preference in the absence of any statute of the state of its creation prohibiting such assignment, although the laws of New York prohibit such an act on the part of domestic corporations.
8. An assignment by a corporation for the benefit of creditors is a corporate act which may be performed by the president and secretary under the authority of the board of directors in the absence of any statute or by-law providing that it shall otherwise be done.

(January 16, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York overruling exceptions directed to be heard at General Term in the first instance, and from a judgment affirming a judgment of the trial term dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion by defendant of certain property claimed by plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Gibson Putzel, for appellant:

Unless prevented by statute, any corporation, whether foreign or domestic, has the right and power to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

De Ruyter v. St. Peter's Church Trustees, 3 N. Y. 242, 3 Barb. Ch. 119, 5 L. ed. 840; Wait, Insolvent Corp. p. 133.

Section 4, chapter 18, title 4, of part 1, of the Revised Statutes does not apply to assignments made in this state by foreign corporations.

See Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 168; Hill v. Knickerbocker Electric Light & P. Co. 45 N. Y. S. R. 761.

No proof was offered on the trial of this case showing that the North River Lumber Company was prohibited by its by-laws or by the laws of the state of New Jersey from making an assignment for the benefit of creditors. On the contrary the power of an insolvent New Jersey corporation to assign its property in trust for creditors is recognized in the case of Wilkinson v. Bauerle, 41 N. J. Eq. 651.

The words of the statute, "any incorporated company," must, in the absence of all definition, be presumed only to refer to domestic corporations.

It is not a legitimate presumption that the statute laws of other states are similar to our laws. On the contrary the presumption is that the common law prevails there.

Mr. S. F. Kneeland, with Mr. William E. Stillings, for respondent:

An insolvent corporation, either domestic or foreign, cannot, under the laws of this state, make a valid assignment.

The Act of 1850, which in terms prohibits any corporation from setting up the defense of usury, though general in its language, has always been held to apply to foreign as well as domestic corporations.

Leavitt v. Curtis, 15 N. Y. 9; Southern L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Packer, 17 N. Y. 52; Rosa v. Butterfield, 33 N. Y. 665; Union Nat. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Wheeler, 60 N. Y. 612.

The principle was also followed in the case of People v. Formosa, 131 N. Y. 478, in construing the Statute of 1889, chapter 282 of Laws of 1889, forbidding the rebate of premiums upon life insurance policies by any corporation in this state.

If the prohibition of the statute could be held not to include foreign corporations, then the law of the situs must govern, and the assignment herein, being in violation of a positive rule of such law, be held void.

Oliver v. Walter Heywood Chair Mfg. Co. 32 N. Y. S. R. 542.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The North River Lumber Company was a company incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, and transacting its business in the city of New York. On the 24th of February, 1891, the corporation made in this state a general assignment to the predecessor of the plaintiff of all its property for the benefit of its creditors, and without any preferences. Subsequent to the assignment, certain of its creditors commenced actions against it to recover the amounts of their debts, respectively, and in those actions attachments were issued and delivered to the defendant, who was the sheriff of New York county; and he subsequently levied, by virtue of such attachments, upon property which was alleged to belong to the corporation. The plaintiff, as its general assignee, has commenced this action to recover from the defendant the value of the property thus levied on by him. The question turns upon the validity of the general assignment of the corporation to the plaintiff. If it were a legal and valid act, it carried the title to the property in question to the plaintiff, and, if not, then the defendant was justified in his levy. The defendant, on the trial, objected to evidence of the assignment, and urged as grounds for his objection (1) that a foreign corporation cannot, under the laws of this state, while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, make a general assignment for the benefit of creditors; (2) that, if such corporation could make that kind of an assignment, it could not make it in the manner of this instrument, viz. by the signature of an alleged president and secretary; (3) there is no sufficient proof of any authority on the part of the persons executing this assignment to make a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. The trial court sustained the defendant's objections, and upon appeal the judgment entered in defendant's favor was affirmed by the general term of the New York common pleas. The plaintiff has appealed from such judgment of affirmance to this court.

The defendant's first ground of objection must mean that the courts of this state will not recognize as valid, so far as respects property within their jurisdiction, a general assignment of its property, made for the benefit of its creditors, by an insolvent foreign corporation. The law of the domicil of the foreign corporation may, of course, permit it, upon insolvency, to assign all its property to an assignee in trust for its creditors; and it also might permit it to make such an assignment through its agents, who were at the time domiciled in a foreign state. But the state which created the corporation could not exercise jurisdiction in another state, where the corporation might have property; and in such case the question would be one for the state in which the property was situated to determine, as to the validity of the attempted transfer of title to an assignee. Assignments of personal property, which are valid by the law of the domicil of the assignor, are generally recognized as valid by the law of the state where the property may be situated, unless they violate its statutory law, or its known and settled public policy. Cases cited in Barth v. Backus (decided by this court in November, 1893), 140 N. Y. 280, 23 L. R. A. 47. In the case just cited, we refused to recognize the validity of the assignment of a foreign corporation to a foreign assignee, as against those who took title to the property of the assignor in this state by virtue of proceedings under our attachment laws. The refusal was based upon our holding that the law under which the general assignee of the Wisconsin corporation claimed title was in effect a bankrupt law enacted by the legislature of Wisconsin, and laws of that nature are within one of the admitted exceptions to the general rule, which recognizes the validity of assignments of personal property, if valid by the law of the domicil of the party making them. Authorities in the case cited. There can be no doubt that an insolvent corporation could, at common law, make a general assignment in trust to an assignee for the benefit of its creditors. Hartun v. Bishop, 8 Wend. 18; DeRuyter v. St. Peter's Church Trustees, 3 Barb. Ch. 119, 124, 5 L. ed. 840, 842; on appeal 3 N. Y. 288; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 802, and note. Under the law of New Jersey, in which state the corporation was created, its right to make an assignment of this nature seems to be es-

Jersey prohibiting such an assignment was proved by defendant; and we cannot presume that the common law has been altered in New Jersey, upon this subject, without some proof to that effect. The assignment of property by an insolvent corporation for the purpose of paying its debts is a very different action from so disposing of its property while solvent as to make its continued exercise of its franchises impossible. People v. Ballard, 184 N. Y. 269, 294, 17 L. R. A. 737. The Ballard Case was subsequently brought to the attention of the court on a motion for a re-argument upon the question whether such a sale or transfer of property as appeared to have been made by the corporation was not valid upon the ground that the corporation could not operate the business except at a loss, and it was not bound to do that. The question was left open for the reason mentioned in the opinion given upon denying the motion. The case is no authority for the proposition that an insolvent corporation cannot make a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. As the common law permits such an assignment, and the state of New Jersey also permits it, and as it does not appear that the charter or by-laws of this particular corporation prohibit it, we are left to the question whether there is any statute or public policy in this state which would be violated if the courts should recognize the validity of an instrument good at common law, and good in the state which created the corporation. The power of the legislature to impose terms upon a foreign corporation as a condition for granting it leave to do business within another state is admitted. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Liverpool & L. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029.

The sole question now is as to what has been the legislative action of this state upon this subject. The defendant alleges that there is a statute of this state which prohibits such act on the part of a foreign corporation. The Statute referred to is chapter 564, § 48, Laws 1890 (Sess. Laws, p. 1075). It is, in substance, the same as section 4, title 4, art. 3, chap. 18, pt. 1, Rev. Stat. (1 Rev. Stat. p. 608, § 4), after its amendment by subdivision 4, § 1, chap. 245, Laws 1890. It provides, among other things, that no corporation shall make any transfer or assignment to any person whatever, in contemplation of its insolvency, and every such assignment is declared to be void. We have no doubt that this section refers solely to domestic corporations. The whole of the chapter from which the section is taken is, in substance, a revision of the law relating to certain classes of corporations, as contained in the revised statutes and their amendments, and it is plain that those statutes generally, if not in every provision, referred to domestic corporations only. This opinion is arrived at by a reference to the whole subject-matter treated of in this portion of the revised statutes, and it becomes apparent, from a perusal of those general provisions, that the statutes were designed for the government of a particular section is referred to, it becomes still more apparent that it is only applicable to domestic corporations. The legislature declares, as above stated, that certain transfers or assignments made by the corporation shall be void. What power had the legislature to enact any such provision as to a foreign corporation? There is nothing in the section limiting its scope and effect to such property as the foreign corporation might have within this state. It is a broad enactment, affecting every assignment made by a corporation under the circumstances mentioned. Can it be supposed that the legislature had in mind a foreign corporation, and intended to assume a jurisdiction to declare such an act, even when done outside this state, and in respect to property also outside of its boundaries, to be void and of no effect? This cannot be supposed, for we cannot impute to the legislature such ignorance upon the subject of its inability to give extraterritorial effect to its own laws. And if it had foreign corporations in mind, when proposing to legislate upon the subject, and knew it could not affect the validity of such transfers outside this state, and intended to provide that such transfers should not carry the title to property of the corporation held within this state, and subject to our jurisdiction, it must be clear that language somewhat appropriate to express such purpose would have been used. The language actually used was neither apt nor pertinent for this purpose. It is both appropriate and pertinent when applied to domestic corporations only. The language of the section clearly implies full and complete jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter. It implies the right to forbid absolutely. It also implies the right to declare the consequences of a violation of the prohibition, not in regard to some particular property, but generally and absolutely. The legislature has such jurisdiction in the case of domestic corporations, while in the case of foreign corporations it has not. To render the section applicable to foreign corporations would be to discard the plain meaning of the language used. The provisions of the Revised Statutes (1 Rev. Stat. p. 591, § 9) as to transfers by a corporation when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, prohibiting them when made with intent to give preferences, etc., were said to apply only to domestic corporations. Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 168. We have no doubt of the correctness of the statement. The same reasons are applicable in both cases, and, if section 9 does not apply to foreign corporations, nothing can be found in the language of section 48 of the Laws of 1890, cited supra, which would extend it to other than domestic corporations. As the prohibition is not contained in any statute of the state, we are unable to discover any public policy of the state which would stand in lieu of a positive statute, and prohibit our recognition of the validity of this transfer.

It is urged that such a policy is to be found in this same statute, even though it, in terms, applies only to domestic corporations. The argument is that, if the state refuses to its own corporations the privilege of making such an assignment, it surely cannot be consistent with its policy to permit the exercise of the same privilege by a foreign corporation. The statute, while only applicable to domestic corporations, is thus used as evidence of the public policy of the state with regard to foreign corporations. If it were a question of the simple grant of a privilege, it may well be that what this state denied to its own corporations it would not grant to those from a foreign state. It is not, however, the mere question of the exercise of a certain privilege, which is to be affirmatively granted in order to exist. The right to make such an assignment exists inherently in all corporations, unless specially forbidden. In regard to domestic corporations, it has been specially forbidden. Does that prohibition furnish any legitimate evidence of the existence of a public policy in this state, which forbids in the case of a foreign corporation the exercise of this inherent right? It seems to us that it does not. The two kinds of corporations, domestic and foreign, stand, with reference to this subject, in very different circumstances and positions towards the state. What might be proper or necessary in one case might be wholly inappropriate or impossible of complete execution in the other. As to domestic corporations, we assume certain responsibilities arising out of the very liberty given by the state for their creation or formation. We provide for their birth, for their regulation and government during life, and for their death. Upon their dissolution, which no other power than the state itself, acting through its legislature or its courts, can pronounce, the whole power of the corporation ceases, and the property which the corporation leaves passes under the dominion of the sovereignty which created it. Responsible for its creation, for its government, and for its death, the state has assumed, in such cases, complete and full jurisdiction over the corporation and its property; and accordingly the state has, in a series of statutory provisions, made certain that the corporate property shall be distributed in accordance with its own ideas of justice. On the other hand, in the case of a foreign corporation, the same kind of responsibility does not obtain. Our courts cannot dissolve it, nor can we, by virtue of our laws, in any way affect its property situated outside of the state, nor call it to any account therefor. Hence, while, as to a domestic corporation, we provide for the distribution of its property equally to all its creditors,—foreigners as well as residents,—we could, as to a foreign corporation, simply affect the property which it had in this state. It is true that, even with regard to a domestic corporation, we cannot give an extraterritorial effect to our laws. Property of a domestic corporation, situated outside of the state, would not be subject to our jurisdiction. In such case, however, the principle of comity operates, and we should expect recognition of the validity of a disposition of the personal property of a domestic corporation situated outside the state, provided it was valid by our law, unless it were subject to some of the well-known exceptions to such recognition. As to a foreign corporation with property here, if we refused to recognize as valid the disposition made of its property within this state, it would probably, in that case, remain subject to be seized by the vigilant creditor, resident or nonresident, and a preference be thus obtained which is at war with the policy of our state as to domestic corporations. It is thus seen that there are differences of a marked character between a domestic and a foreign corporation in relation to this subject. The differences are so marked that the statute regarding domestic corporations can furnish no proof as to the existence of a public policy, which, in the case of foreign corporations, should stand in the place of, and be equivalent to, that statute.

Again, this assignment is valid by the law of New Jersey, which is the domicile of the corporation. It provides for an equal distribution of all the property of the corporation among all of its creditors, being in this respect in entire conformity with our own policy regarding the distribution of the property of insolvent domestic corporations. Is not the argument quite strong, under such circumstances, which favors the application of the general rule that an assignment of personal property, valid by the law of the domicile of the owner, will be recognized as valid everywhere? Can it be said, in such a case, that the interests of our own citizens are in any manner neglected by their own state, when they are to share equally in the assets with all the other creditors of the corporation? If it were a domestic corporation, they would get no more than an equal rate of division. Can they be said to be legally harmed when they get the same rate of division under such an assignment? Are we not, in such case, only following the general doctrine which refers the validity of the transfer of personal property to the law of the domicile of its owner? It is true that the assignment in this case was made by the corporation through its officers in New York, where it was doing business, but nevertheless it was a New Jersey corporation, and the assignment was valid by the law of that state. Whether, if the law of New Jersey prohibited such an assignment, and it was then executed under the same circumstances in this state, it would be valid here, is a question not involved in this case, and, therefore neither discussed nor decided.

It is said that our own creditors—that is, I suppose, those who reside in this state—may in this manner be defeated of satisfaction of their debts by the participation of foreign creditors in the only accessible funds of the insolvent company. We have seen that our policy is just such a participation with regard to creditors of a domestic corporation. Why should we find fault with such a result in the other case? The general term of the supreme court in the first department has decided that the statute, in relation to a transfer of any part of its property by a corporation in contemplation of insolvency, and for the purpose of giving preferences, does not apply to a foreign corporation. Lane v. Wheelwright, 69 Hun, 180. The same question is touched upon, although perhaps not necessarily decided, in Coats v. Donnell, supra. In that case the agreement for the lien was made at the same time, and as part of the agreement to make the advances, and such agreement was held valid. It was added, however, that, if the act were regarded as the giving of a preference by a failing debtor, it was good, because the law against preferences by an insolvent corporation did not apply to a foreign one. Here there is no preference, and hence there is no occasion to examine the Coats Case to see if the question of a preference in contemplation of insolvency was involved and decided in it. It may be that there is no difference in principle between an assignment of part of the property of a corporation to a creditor, as a preferred payment of its debt to him, and a general assignment of all its property to an assignee for the benefit of creditors, and giving preferences, and that if the former be valid the latter must also be good. In regard to such a general assignment, it has been urged that it ought to be so held because of the fact that the property of a corporation is a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, and that any creditor ought to have the right to resort to chancery to compel the application of this trust fund pro rata for the benefit of all creditors, upon the principle that equality is equity. As the question does not arise in this case, it is unnecessary to further pursue the inquiry.

The counsel for the defendant cites the statute prohibiting a corporation from setting up the defense of usury, and he suggested that it has been held to include foreign corporations. Southern L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Packer, 17 N. Y. 52. There is no doubt that it was so intended, and the language is apt and appropriate to express the idea. The legislature had perfect and complete control, in such respect, over the foreign as well as over the domestic corporation; and there was no reason for denying to the statute its natural meaning, which would include a foreign corporation, when suing or being sued in the courts of this state. The case of Re Prime, 186 N. Y. 847, 18 L. R. A. 718, is an authority in favor of the view here taken. It is there stated that generally a statute giving powers and privileges to corporations must, in the absence of plain indications to the contrary, be held to apply only to domestic corporations. The remark was made in the case that a general law of the state prohibiting corporations from exercising particular powers would operate upon foreign corporations, not because the act, ex proprio vigore, would bind such a corporation, but for the reason that the exercise of such a power by the foreign corporation would violate the public policy of the state, indicated by the general restraint imposed upon our own corporations. Considering the question which was under discussion, and the facts which called forth the remark, it is entirely plain that the proposition, as really intended, is perfectly sound. If the exercise of certain powers by a foreign corporation in this state would violate our public policy, there is no doubt that the corporation could not here legally exercise such powers, and the fact that it did violate our public policy might in many cases be proved by our statute in regard to our corporations. But it was not intended to assert that, in all cases where a statute did prohibit corporations from doing certain things, it necessarily included foreign corporations, or that such corporations could not thereafter exercise any power prohibited to a domestic corporation, because in such case its exercise by a foreign corporation would be a violation of a public policy evidenced by the statute. I think I have shown, in the case at bar, that the difference between the two classes of corporations, with reference to the thing prohibited to the domestic corporation, precludes this kind of proof of a public policy in this state upon this subject with regard to a foreign corporation. We think there is no such public policy, and, so far as this ground is concerned, we have no doubt that the assignment is valid.

As to the other grounds of invalidity, we are of the opinion that there is nothing in them. The corporation had the power to make an assignment. It was a corporate act, and neither the statute nor any by-law, so far as the record shows, provided that it should be otherwise done than by the president and secretary or treasurer, under the authority of the board of directors. This sufficiently appears to have been so done, and that is enough. Beveridge v. New York Elev. R. Co. 112 N. Y. 1, 2 L. R. A. 648.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide the event.

(February 26, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant Coyle from a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Cumberland County convicting him of neglect of duty as a director of the poor. Affirmed.

In March, 1891, Joseph N. Diller, a poor boy seven years of age became a charge upon the county of Cumberland. On June 4, 1891, the defendants, who were the duly elected and acting directors of the poor for said county indentured him as an apprentice to John W. Lafferty, a farmer residing in the county of Adams. The boy had been placed with Lafferty in April and had remained with him until the time of the signing of the indenture and continued to remain with him until his death in November. The claim of prosecution, which there was evidence tending to support, was that the boy was compelled to do work far beyond his age and strength; that he was furnished with insufficient clothing and inadequate food, and was roughly handled and inhumanly punished; that shortly after he reached the Laffertys he began to lose flesh, and afterwards became emaciated, dispirited, sick, and finally died. The mother of the boy gave notice to the board on September 8, 1891, that the boy was not being properly treated, and on September 5, Mr. Coyle went to investigate the truth of the charges. He reported to the board that the family was a proper one, and the treatment of the boy was also proper.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. A. Kramer, J. W. Wetsel, M. C. Herman and John Hays, for appellant:

The second count charged personal maltreatment by the directors between June 4 and November 9, 1891, the period covered by the first count, which charged the binding out of the boy on June 4.

The Act of 1860 having affixed a penalty upon maltreatment of an infant its provisions were to be strictly pursued to the exclusion of any common-law remedy.

Neither count in the indictment charged any violation of duty on the part of defendants under the Act of 1838.

The act imposes imperative duties coupled with discretionary power. The terms "respectable family" and "needful inquiries" imply determination by the directors of the poor. They must in their own judgment and in the best way they can determine what is "respectable" and what is "needful." To this extent under the Act of 1838, their duty is not ministerial but discretionary and for an error in judgment they are not indictable.

That the commissioners have a discretion in this matter is too plain to need argument; that they have exercised this discretion is equally clear. If we concede it was not wisely exercised, they cannot be punished for error by indictment and conviction as criminals.

The office of director of the poor is a statutory office, and it is clear that when the law imposes on an individual a ministerial office, then not only is disobedience to the requirements of the law in neglect of such office indictable, but an indictment lies for such willful or negligent misconduct in such office as works injury to the public, or to an individual.

Any public officer is indictable for misbehavior in his office.

An overseer of the poor is indictable for misfeasance in the execution of his office; as if he misused the poor, as by exacting labor from them when they are unable to work, etc.

The court was right in admitting what was told Boyer when on his way to Lafferty's with the children. Whatever is done by an agent in reference to the business in which he is at the time employed, and within the scope of his authority, is said or done by the principal and may be proved as well in a criminal as in a civil case, in all respects as if the principal were the actor and the speaker.

McCollum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James Coyle, appellant, Michael Seavers, and John H. Rhoads were jointly indicted and tried for neglect of their duty as directors of the poor and of the house of employment for Cumberland county. A verdict of guilty was rendered by the jury. Sentence was suspended, as to Seavers and Rhoads, on their payment of one fourth of the costs, and Coyle was sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and three fourths of the costs. The pith of the complaint against them was that they neglected to discharge a duty which, in their official capacity, they owed to Joseph N. Diller, a poor and infirm child, aged seven years, who was a legal charge upon the county of Cumberland, and that in consequence of their neglect he died. In the first count of the indictment, they were charged with having knowingly permitted him to be grossly maltreated by the person to whom he was apprenticed by them, and in the second count thereof with having, while he was in their charge and under their care, willfully neglected to provide him with reasonable and necessary food and clothing, and otherwise abused and ill-treated him. The evidence produced on the trial was clearly sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the death of the child was hastened by, if it was not solely attributable to, the treatment he received while in the custody of Lafferty, to whom he was bound by them on the 4th of June, 1891, for a term of fourteen years. It was also sufficient to sustain a finding that, before they committed the child to the care of Lafferty, they knew or ought to have known, that the latter was not a proper person to have control of the former. Boyer, who was their representative in the arrangement under which the child was left at Lafferty's six weeks before he was indentured, was advised by persons in the neighborhood that it was an unsafe place for a boy of his years. The testimony of Underwood and Fink on this point showed that they gave him information in respect to the character of Lafferty and his family, and their harsh treatment of a child in their care, which would have prevented any prudent person from committing a boy of tender years to their custody. A parent so informed would not have surrendered his or her child to their possession and control without an investigation which demonstrated that the charges against them were groundless. The care which a parent ought to exercise under such circumstances devolved upon the directors, when young Diller became a charge on their district; and there is reason to believe that, if they had faithfully performed the duty thus cast upon them, he would not have been subjected to the cruel treatment which appears to have been responsible, in some degree at least, for his untimely death. But it is manifest from the testimony that they did not exercise the care enjoined by the law, and that they were negligent in binding him to Lafferty, and in their failure to institute proceedings to cancel the indenture. We need not repeat or discuss the testimony descriptive of the neglect and cruelty to which the child was subjected. It is sufficient to say of it that in our opinion it fully sustained the charges made in the first and second counts of the indictment.

It is contended that the indictment does not charge an offense known to the criminal law; that the directors are not indictable under section 42 of the Act of June 13, 1886, because the office of overseer of the poor is abolished in Cumberland county; and that they cannot be prosecuted under section 90 of the Act of March 31, 1860, because it appears from the indictment and the testimony that the maltreatment complained of was after they left the child with Lafferty, and was inflicted by him and his family. The counsel for the commonwealth agree with the counsel for the defendants that this case is not governed by the statutes referred to; but the former maintain, and the latter deny, that the matters charged in the indictment constitute a common-law misdemeanor. We think the contention of the defendants that the common law does not hold them criminally liable for a willful neglect or refusal to discharge their duties as directors is unsound. In 19 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, p. 504, the rule on this subject is stated thus: "The neglect or failure of a public officer to perform any duty which by law he is required to perform is an indictable offense, even though no damage was caused by the default, and a mistake as to his powers, or with relation to the facts of the case, is no protection." In Russell on Crimes (vol. 1, p. 80), it is said that: "It is an indictable offense, in the nature of a misdemeanor, to refuse or neglect to provide sufficient food or other necessities for any infant of tender years, unable to provide for and take care of itself (whether such infant be child, apprentice, or servant), whom the party is obliged, by duty or contract, to provide for, so as thereby to injure its health." In Archbold's Criminal Pleading & Practice (vol. 2, p. 1365), it is said that: "An overseer of the poor is indictable for misfeasance in office, as if he relieved the poor where there is no necessity for it, Tawney's Case, 16 Vin. Abr. 415, or if he misuse the poor, as by keeping and lodging several poor persons in a filthy and unwholesome room, with the windows not in a sufficient state of repair to protect them against the severity of the weather, (Ree v. Wetherill, Cald. 482), or by exacting labor from them when they are not able to work, Ree v. Winslip, Id. 76. And if overseers conspire to marry a poor woman, big with child, for the purpose of throwing the expense of maintaining her and the issue from themselves upon another parish or township, they may be indicted. Ree v. Compton, Cald. 246. And, for most breaches of their duty, overseers may be punished by indictment or information." In Pennsylvania, overseers of the poor have been indicted, convicted, and sentenced for a misdemeanor in office, in selling the keeping of paupers, by public vendue or outcry, to the lowest bidder. Milton Overseers v. Williamsport Overseers, 9 Pa. 48, 49. It is a wise policy which exacts from a public officer intrusted with the care of the poor persons in his district faithful and humane administration of the laws enacted for their relief. In the proper enforcement of such laws, they have considerate and kind treatment, and a comfortable maintenance. Their inability to provide for themselves is not a crime, nor any excuse for neglecting or mistreating them. As charges upon the district, they are entitled to have from it wholesome food and comfortable clothing, and a sufficiency of both. If they are of tender years, or, from any cause, unable to work, it is an act of cruelty to exact from them the performance of tasks which are beyond their strength, and injurious to their health. It is culpable negligence in an officer representing the district charged with their support to bind an infant pauper to service with a person whose parsimony and cruelty in the treatment of poor children committed to his care were well known in the neighborhood in which he lived. Inquiry in respect to the character of the master is a duty, and where he resides in a county outside of the district in which the pauper is settled, and is personally a stranger to the officer, the nonobservance of it is a misdemeanor. It seems to us, also, that it is his duty, after the child is bound to service, to see that the covenants of the master are substantially complied with, and if these are willfully and persistently violated, to the injury of the child's health, to institute necessary proceedings to set aside the indenture. In the present case the directors, with knowledge of Lafferty's character, bound young Diller to him, and, with knowledge of the abuse the child was receiving from his master, refused to take any measures to rescue him from the cruelty to which he was subjected by their own negligent act. If, as they contend, their conduct is not condemned, in terms, by any of our statutes in relation to the care of the poor, it is gratifying to know, as we have seen, that the common law holds them responsible for it, as a misdemeanor in office.

The several specifications of error which complain of the admission of evidence of deprivation and cruelty after the 5th of September, 1891, and of the denial by the court of the defendants' motion to strike out such evidence, are not sustained. The evidence referred to showed a continuance of the ill usage they approved by their refusal to take any measures to prevent the master's persistence in it, and was descriptive of the consequences of their negligence. With their knowledge of his character, and of his maltreatment of the helpless boy they committed to his care, they should have anticipated what followed. Having declined, when requested, to intervene in behalf of the suffering child, and thus impliedly sanctioned the master's abuse of him, they had no reason to expect that he would receive better treatment thereafter. In plain violation of their duty to the child and the district they represented, they knowingly bound him to service with a cruel master, and continued him in it when they knew, or ought to have known, that his health was seriously impaired, and his life endangered, by it. It was this breach of duty which constituted their offense, and it was competent for the commonwealth to introduce evidence descriptive of its results, without proving personal notice to them of each specific act of cruelty which contributed to the distress of their victim.

We are not able to discover in the remaining specifications anything which calls for the reversal of the judgment. The contention that the appellant cannot be prosecuted and punished for misdemeanor in office, because his term has expired, is not supported by reason or authority; and certainly he ought not to complain that, while he was liable for all the costs, he was required to pay only three fourths of them.

The specifications of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE of Kansas

v.

Hugh O'NEIL, App't.

(51 Kan. 651.)

*1. Where a murder may have been committed by different means, and it is doubtful which was employed, its commission by all may be charged in one count of the information, and proof of any one will sustain the allegation, but the means so charged in the same count of the information must not be repugnant.

3. In addressing the jury in a criminal cause counsel may be allowed, in the discretion of the trial court, to read from standard works on matters of science and art, when pertinent, by way of argument or illustration; but it would be an abuse of this privilege to make it the pretense of getting improper matter before the jury as evidence, or to present matters of law conflicting with the instructions of the court.

4. Voluntary intoxication is no justification or excuse for crime.

5. Under a statute establishing degrees of the crime of murder, and providing that willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall be murder in the first degree, evidence that the accused was intoxicated at the time of the killing is competent for the consideration of the jury upon the question whether he was in such a condition of mind as to be capable of deliberate premeditation.

6. Where a person at the time of the commission of an alleged crime has sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and quality of the particular act or acts constituting the crime, and the mental capacity to know whether they are right or wrong, he is generally responsible if he commits such act or acts, whatever may be his capacity in other particulars; but, if he does not possess this degree of capacity, then he is not so responsible.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Marion County convicting him of murder in the second degree. Affirmed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

On the 4th day of December, 1891, an information was filed in the district court of Marion county against Hugh O'Neil, charging him with the murder of Mary O'Neil, his wife. On March 1, 1892, an amended information was filed, which, omitting cap-

NOTE.—For a collection of authorities showing that intoxication is no excuse for crime, see note to Aszman v. State (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 33, and for a limitation upon that rule in line with STATE v. 24 L. R. A.

O'NEIL, to the effect that intoxication may deprive one of the power to deliberate necessary to render a homicide murder in the first degree, see Aszman v. State (Ind.) supra.

and by the authority of the state of Kansas, I, W. H. Carpenter, county attorney in and for the county of Marion, in the state of Kansas, who prosecutes for and on behalf of said state in the district court of said county, sitting in and for the county of Marion, and duly empowered to inform of offenses committed within said county of Marion, come now here, and give the court to understand and be informed that one Hugh O'Neil, at the county of Marion, in the state of Kansas aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, on the 18th day of November, A. D. 1891, did then and there feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, make an assault in and upon one Mary O'Neil, with the intent her, the said Mary O'Neil, feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, to kill and murder: and that the said Hugh O'Neil did then and there feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and with malice aforethought, and with a certain blunt instrument, to said county attorney unknown, and in a manner to said county attorney unknown, feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, and with the intent aforesaid, inflict upon the head, face, and body of her, the said Mary O'Neil, certain mortal wounds, bruises, cuts, and contusions; and that the said Hugh O'Neil did then and there feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, and with the intent aforesaid, strike, kick, beat, and choke her, the said Mary O'Neil, with his hands and feet, in and upon the head, face, neck, legs, arms, and other parts of the body of her, the said Mary O'Neil, thereby inflicting certain other mortal wounds, bruises, cuts, and contusions on her, the said Mary O'Neil; and that the said Hugh O'Neil did then and there feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, and with the intent aforesaid, cast and throw said Mary O'Neil down upon the ground, and against a certain stone wall, with great force and violence, thereby inflicting upon the head, face, legs, arms, and other parts of the body of her, the said Mary O'Neil, certain other mortal wounds, bruises, cuts, and contusions, of which mortal wounds, bruises, cuts, and contusions so received by said Mary O'Neil as aforesaid, and so inflicted upon her, the said Mary O'Neil, by said Hugh O'Neil, as aforesaid, Mary O'Neil did then and there instantly die; wherefore the said county attorney sayeth that said Hugh O'Neil did then and there feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, and with the intent aforesaid, kill and murder the said Mary O'Neil, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and contrary to the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas. W. H. Carpenter, County Attorney of Marion County, Kansas."

The defendant challenged the information by a motion to quash, by a motion to com-

On the 21st of March, 1892, the trial of the cause was commenced, and continued from day to day until the 4th of April, 1892. After hearing the evidence, the instructions of the court, and the argument of counsel, the jury returned a verdict against the defendant of guilty of murder in the second degree. On the 4th of April, 1892, the motion for a new trial, which had been filed by the defendant, was overruled, and thereupon the court sentenced him to confinement in the penitentiary of the state for twenty-five years at hard labor. He appeals.

Messrs. Frank Doster and Madden Bros., for appellant:

The information was bad for duplicity, uncertainty, indefiniteness, and want of precision. The strokes complained of were either inflicted as a part of different transactions or as part of the same transaction. No other ways are possible.

(1) If they were part of different transactions, they would be separate offenses, and could be joined in the same informations, but in different counts.

10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 699; State v. Goodwin, 33 Kan. 588; State v. Hodges, 45 Kan. 392.

(2) If the strokes were part of the same transaction, it is proper to charge them in different counts to meet the exigencies of the proof, even if the several counts are repugnant and inconsistent with each other.

10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 699; 1 Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 297; Crim. Code, § 123.

(3) If the strokes were part of the same transaction, they may all be set forth as such in one count, alleging that death occurred from the combined effect of all. But the acts must not be inconsistent or repugnant with each other.

1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 453.

In the present case the manner of statement distinctly suggests that the informant intended to charge three separate and distinct offenses, which were separate charges of murder, or felonious assaults at least, on which a separate conviction could have been had if properly pleaded in separate counts.

State v. Goodwin, supra. See also Maxwell, Crim. Proc. p. 187; 1 Whart. Precedents of Indictments, 120; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 3d ed. §§ 418, 489; Crim. Code, §§ 121, 122; Bill of Rights, § 10; State v. Huber, 8 Kan. 447; State v. O'Kane, 23 Kan. 244; State v. Burwell, 34 Kan. 312.

Evidence of previous alleged assaults was incompetent, because it was in no way connected with the final act.

2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 628 et seq.; 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 906; 1 Whart. Am. Crim. L. §§ 321, 347.

The only theory upon which previous assaults are competent is, that they form a part of one comprehensive transaction, beginning with the first assault and ending with the fatal assault.

9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 706; Prund v. State, 43 Ga. 88; 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 625, and notes.

Habitual intoxication, extending over a period covering all the comprehensive transaction, is relevant to characterize the special assault, and is a more proper method of proof than by particular acts of intoxication.

2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 617.

Where everything depended, as in this case, on circumstantial evidence, it was important to lay the whole transaction before the jury.

2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 633.

The fact that the deceased was an inebriate would give strength to the theory of suicide or self destruction, which is but another way of stating that it would tend to show defendant's innocence.

Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146.

Standard law books and newspaper items were admissible to be read to the jury as part of their argument on the question of insanity and flight.

A part of their argument was a material error.

1 Whart. Ev. § 625; Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 538, and notes.

The question of voluntary drunkenness was improperly presented to the jury.

There was no single presentation of the subject to the jury. He was entitled to have it singly presented, at least with reference to murder, in each of the degrees.

1 Bishop, Crim. L. §§ 408, 414; State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 369.

A fixed insanity indirectly produced by intoxicating liquors if it fills the law's measure in quantity, is a complete defense to crime, or, better expressed, it relieves from all criminal responsibility.

1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 406, and authorities cited; Browne, Ins. §§ 371-373; 2 Lawson, Defenses to Crime, pp. 577 et seq.

There are recognized phases of insanity that impel the affected to act when he perfectly knows the nature and consequence of the act, and that it is wrong.

1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 387.

The defendant was not required to prove insanity by affirmative proof.

State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32.

The outbreaks found in alcoholic insanity are uncontrollable. It may be said that such impulses involve an obliteration of the power to know, as well as irresistibly impel to do. While it may or may not be so as matter of fact, it cannot be so said as matter of law. The defendant is entitled to a jury on that question.

Desty, Am. Crim. L. § 26a.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended that the motions challenging the sufficiency of the information should have been sustained. In support of this contention it is argued that at least three separate death strokes or attacks upon the deceased were alleged in one count, and therefore that the information was bad for duplicity, uncertainty, and want of precision. It is further argued that, if there were separate death strokes or attacks, they should have been charged in different counts of the information; not in the same count. Under the common-law system of criminal pleadings the facts alleged in the information ought, perhaps, to have been stated in different counts, but under the criminal procedure in force in this state we think the court committed no error in overruling the motions attacking the information. Section 103 of the Criminal Procedure reads: "The indictment or information must contain—First, the title of the action, specifying the name of the court to which the indictment or information is presented, and the names of the parties; second, a statement of the facts constituting the offense, in plain and concise language, without repetition." See, also, section 109, which prescribes the sufficiency of an indictment or information; and also section 110, only authorizing an indictand contusions were alleged in the information as having occurred at one time, and, although the information stated that each of the wounds was mortal, it concludes as follows: "Of which mortal wounds, bruises, cuts, and contusions so received by said Mary O'Neil as aforesaid, and so inflicted upon her, the said Mary O'Neil, by said Hugh O'Neil, as aforesaid, Mary O'Neil did then and there instantly die; wherefore the said county attorney sayeth that said Hugh O'Neil did then and there feloniously, willfully, premeditatedly, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, and with the intent aforesaid, kill and murder the said Mary O'Neil contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and contrary to the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas." "Even at common law it may be alleged that the party died of the divers poisons or wounds charged to have been administered or given, without averring that he died of any one of them in particular; for, as it is said, the truth may be that none of them alone, but all together, caused the death." State v. Edmondson, 48 Tex. 162; Maxwell, Crim. Proc. 187. Bishop, Criminal Procedure, § 458, states the rule thus: "We have seen that if an offense may be committed by different means, and the pleader doubts which was employed in the particular instance, he may in one count charge its commission by all, and proof of any one will sustain the allegation. The limit to this doctrine is that the means must not be repugnant." In this case the means employed to cause the death of the deceased are not sufficiently repugnant to compel different counts. The first stroke or attack was alleged to have been made upon the head, face, and body of the deceased with a blunt instrument; the second by striking, kicking, beating, and choking the deceased; and the third, by throwing the deceased upon the ground and against a stone wall with great force and violence.

It is next contended that the court committed error in the admission of previous assaults of the defendant upon the deceased. To prove these previous assaults the state introduced the evidence of several witnesses, showing that they were all made within less than a year before the death of the deceased. They were cruel and brutal, and continued down to the time of her death. This evidence was admissible on the question of motive, for the purpose of showing hatred and malice on the part of the defendant. Whart. Crim. Ev. § 786; Sayres v. Com. 88 Pa. 291; McCann v. People, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 272. In its instructions the court limited this evidence as follows: "You are further instructed that if you find from the evidence the defendant ill-treated or abused his wife on occasions prior to the act alleged against him in the information, such acts are relevant to prove motive and for such purposes only."

It is also contended that the court erred in not permitting further evidence to be given tending to show that the deceased was in the habit of becoming intoxicated. The court permitted evidence of such intoxication at intoxication, but the court announced that it would not continue such evidence unless connected with the assaults. The deceased, on the 19th of November, 1891, was found upon a sofa or settee in a room in her home, dead, with her head fractured on the right side, her face beaten and bruised, a portion of her nose torn off, an eye injured, her right arm torn, her limbs black and blue, her hair full of weeds and dirt, and with marks of a thumb and fingers on her throat.

William Hendricks testified: "Question.

Why, I was going up stairs to bed, and he went out of the bedroom. When he went in he came and asked if the bed was fixed. We told him, 'Yes,' and he said we would have to get along with it the best we could, because mamma was awful sick. Q. He told you that about ten or eleven o'clock in the evening, Wednesday? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see him the next morning? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time? A. I guess it must have been about six o'clock. Q. Where did you see him then? A. Down stairs. Q. Now, when did you next see Mrs. O'Neil, and under what circumstances? A. The next time I saw Mrs. O'Neil she was in the parlor on the sofa. Q. How did you happen to go in there, and who was with you? A. Mr. O'Neil's father was with me. Q. What time was that? A. It was in the evening,—seven or eight. Q. Well, state—Did you carry a light and go into the room? A. Yes, sir. Q. By what door did you enter the parlor? A. By the outside door. Q. When you went in there, did you have a light? A. Yes, sir. Q. The old gentleman was with you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you go and what did you do? A. I and John Farrel and grandpa [O'Neil's father] took a light from the kitchen, went out through the hall, and onto the porch. I and grandpa went in, and John stood at the door. He told me to come on with the light, so he could see. I went back with the light, and he raised up the quilt, and there she was laying there on the sofa. Grandpa caught hold of her and says: 'The poor thing is dead. She is cold.' He then put the quilt back over her. Q. Then threw the quilt back over her? A. Yes, sir; and then we left."

John Farrel testified: "Question. When did you commence working for Hugh O'Neil? Answer. The 18th of April, 1891. Q. Was you working for him at the time this tragedy occurred at his house? A. Yes, sir. Q. When was the last time you saw Mrs. O'Neil? A. Friday morning. Q. Friday morning of what month and week, if you can remember. I mean when alive? A. Wednesday morning. Q. During what month? A. November. Q. Last November? A. Yes, sir. Q. What week was it? What week in reference to the week you saw her dead? A. The same week. Q. Where was she when you saw her Wednesday morning? A. She was getting breakfast in the kitchen. Q. In the kitchen in the house where they lived in Marion county? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time in the morning was it? A. Between six and seven o'clock, I should think. Q. Did you eat breakfast at that place that morning? A. Yes, sir. Q. State whether or not Mrs. O'Neil was at breakfast. A. No, sir, she was not. Q. Who was at breakfast that morning? A. Myself, Will Hendricks, and Mr. [Hugh] O'Neil, and old Mr. O'Neil. Q. That is the father of the defendant? A. I suppose so. Q. Anybody else? A. Some of his children. I do not remember whether they were all there or not. Q. Do you know where Mrs. O'Neil was during that breakfast hour? A. I think she was in the dining room. Q. What makes you think so? A. I saw her go in just when we came in to breakfast. Q. That is, as you came in to breakfast, you saw her go into the dining room? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, did you notice the defendant, Mr. O'Neil, eat during the breakfast hour, during the time you ate breakfast there? A. He ate his breakfast. Q. Did you see him eat his breakfast? A. I saw him there eating a little. Q. Do you know how much he ate? A. No. Q. But you saw him eating? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did you eat breakfast? A. Fifteen or twenty minutes. Q. Where did you go to after breakfast? A. I went to the barn. Q. How long after that did you return to the house? A. About 12 o'clock. Q. Did you see Mrs. O'Neil at that time? A. No, sir. Q. Where did you get your dinner that day,—Wednesday? A. At Mrs. O'Neil's house. Q. What did you do after dinner? A. I shucked corn. Q. How soon did you leave the house after dinner? A. I should judge between one and two o'clock. Q. State whether or not you saw the defendant, Hugh O'Neil, at that dinner hour. A. No, sir; I didn't. Q. When did you next return to the house? A. About 7 or 8 o'clock,—about 7, I suppose. Q. That same evening? A. Yes, sir. Q. I want to ask you who got dinner that day,—Wednesday? A. I think Hendricks did; I am not certain. Q. Who seemed to be getting dinner when you was there? A. Bill Hendricks was working around the table. Q. What time did you eat supper that evening,—Wednesday night? A. About 8 or 9 o'clock. Q. Who got supper for you? A. I did myself. Q. Who was there at that time? A. Me and Mr. O'Neil's father and the children. Q. Where was Mr. Hendricks? A. He was in town. Q. Where was Mr. O'Neil? A. I don't know. He was in the house, I suppose. Q. Did you see him that evening? A. Yes, sir; I saw him after supper. Q. How long after supper? A. I should judge about half an hour. Q. Where did you see him? A. He came out into the kitchen. Q. What, if anything, did he do? A. He asked if the boy had got back from town yet. Q. Well, did you see him any more that night? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time? A. I do not remember; about 10 o'clock. Q. About 10 o'clock? A. Yes, sir. Q. What transpired at that time,—10 o'clock? A. He came out, and saw that the boy had got back from town, and the boy gave him the whiskey he sent for. Q. The boy gave him the whiskey that he sent for? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did the boy or do at that time? A. He asked what the whiskey come at. Q. What response did the boy make? A. He said, 'It cost a dollar.' Q. What did Mr. O'Neil say? A. He said, 'It comes pretty high.' Q. Did you see him again that evening? A. Yes, sir. Q. What time? A. I do not know exactly what time it was,—after we went up to the bedroom. Q. Where was it you saw him, and what was he doing? A. He came into the room afterwards. Q. What time did you say that was when he came into the bedroom? A. I do not know. I think it was pretty near 10 or 11 o'clock. Q. What did you see Mr. O'Neil doing at that time? A. I didn't see him doing anything. Q. That was Wednesday night? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where was it you saw him? A. He came into our room after we went into the room. Q. Came into the bedroom after you had gone into the bedroom? A. Yes, sir. Q. What, if anything, did he say? A. Asked how our bed was. Q. What did you say to him? A. Told him it was all right. Q. What further did he say? A. He said we would have to get along with it, for mamma was terribly sick. Q. He said you would have to get along with it, because mamma was terribly sick? Do you know who he meant by 'mamma'? A. I suppose he meant his wife. Q. He generally called her 'mamma'? A. He generally called her 'mamma'; yes, sir. Q. Now, that was Wednesday night, between 10 and 11 o'clock? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who awakened you the next morning? A. Hugh O'Neil did. He generally got up first in the morning. Q. That would be Thursday morning? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who, if anybody, came to your room and awakened you? A. Mr. O'Neil. Q. How soon after that did you see him? A. When I got down stairs. Q. How long was that after you got up? A. Right away after I got up. Q. What, if anything, was he doing at that time? A. I do not know. He was in the kitchen when I came down stairs. Q. Did he say anything to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say? A. Told me to hitch up a horse; he wanted to go to town for the doctor. Q. Was that all he said to you at that time? A. Well, he said for me to get breakfast for the children. Q. Told you to get breakfast for the children? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he say anything else? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was it? A. He told me that he would be back in about an hour and a half. Q. What did you then do? A. Got breakfast for the children. Q. Well, you spoke about him asking you to hitch up a horse? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you do that before or after breakfast? A. Before breakfast. Q. Where did you tie the horse? A. At the gate, south of the house. I suppose it is the south of the house. Q. To the gate? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far was that gate from the house? A. I should judge about 20 feet. Q. Now, you say that after you hitched the horse up and tied it there, you went in and got breakfast? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you have any more conversation with Mr. O'Neil there at that time than you have related? A. I believe not.

dear him say? A. He told the little girl not to go into the room where her mamma was or he would whip her. Q. Told the little girl not to go into the room where her mamma was? A. Yes, sir; that she was terribly sick. Q. What did he do after saying that to this little girl? A. He went into the dining room, and shut the door. Q. When did you next see him? A. Next time I saw him was in Florence. Q. How soon after that did you see him in Florence,—after he was arrested? A. Yes, sir."

After Hendricks, Farrel, and the father of Hugh O'Neil found the dead body of Mrs. O'Neil on the sofa or settee in the parlor they did not disturb it, but sent for Dr. O. B. Whittecar, the coroner. He testified, among other things, as follows: "Question. Where do you live? Answer. "At Peabody. Q. What, if any, official position did you hold last November? A. I was coroner of Marion county. Q. On or about the 20th of November last, where were you? A. I was in Peabody. Q. Where did you go? A. I was called to Florence by telegram. Q. From Florence, where did you go? A. I went to what was said to be the residence of Hugh O'Neil. Q. Did you go into the house? A. I did. Q. Upon your going into the house, what did you discover? A. I discovered the body of a woman upon the sofa or tete-a-tete in the room in the house. Q. Describe to the jury, as near as you can, doctor, the position in which you found that body. A. The body was lying upon its back, rigid in death,—markedly so; laying, as I said, on this short sofa or tete-a-tete. The body was covered with a comfort, entirely up. The woman had her shoes off, dressed in ordinary clothing, and very much disarranged. Q. Have you a judgment as to whether that body was placed on that lounge before or after death? A. I have. Q. What is your judgment? A. I think it was placed there after death. Q. Did you make any examination of the premises? A. I did. Q. State what you found, if anything. A. Generally speaking, the house was in a very much disordered condition. Clothing, bedding, and household utensils scattered promiscuously all over the house. On what I supposed at that time to be the east side of the house, but which I now think is the north side, because the house does not stand square with the compass, there was a blood stain on the outside on the foundation stone. Q. There were marks in the dust and dirt on the side of the house. Whereabouts in relation to the blood spot? A. Immediately over it. Q. Go on, and describe the size of the blood spot, where it was in relation to the ground, and in relation to these prints that you saw on the side of the house. A. The blood stain on the foundation stone was immediately below the marks on the side of the house. The size of that blood stain, if I remember correctly, was about three inches long by an inch to an inch and a quarter wide. It was of a dark color, apparently made from venous blood. Q. What, if anything, else did you discover there on the front porch leading up to this room? A. I made no discovery. The discovery was pointed out to me as made by others. Q. What was that? A. Members of my jury pointed out to me hair resembling in color the hair on the head of the deceased lady. This hair was found in the splinters of one of the steps leading up to the porch, in the ends of the boards of the porch, and was pointed out to me. Q. Did you make a comparison between the hair that you found there at that time and the hair in the head of the deceased? A. I did. Q. State what, if any similarity there was. A. They were identical in color, length, and general appearance. Q. Do you know the condition of the hair of the deceased at the time you was there in November last? A. I know, as I saw it. Q. What was that condition? A. The hair was very much disarranged and tangled and full of dirt and straw, several pieces of straw and other grass around there, several pieces of weeds, cinders, coal cinders, and one or two sandburrs were in the hair."

After O'Neil left his home on Thursday morning, November 19, he went to Florence, boarded the train, and was arrested at Cottonwood Falls on Friday, the 20th. From this and other testimony in the record, the claim that evidence of the intoxication of the deceased would have supported the theory of her suicide is not tenable. Evidence of suicide was wholly wanting. Counsel for defendant seem to admit this, for in their brief they say, speaking of the defendant's inherited appetite for intoxicating liquors, that the failure of the court to instruct as requested upon this matter "vitally affected the defendant, because it was virtually the only plea he had. It was practically the only shelter, poor as it was, that he had from the cutting blizzard force of the evidence." Of course, in some cases, the intoxication of the deceased would be very important, and it would be fatal error to reject such evidence. In this case the limit fixed by the court in the introduction of such evidence was not prejudicial.

It is further contended that the court committed error in not permitting defendant's counsel in their argument to read to the jury from law books and newspapers upon the question of insanity and flight. This court has already held that scientific books "cannot be admitted to prove the declarations or opinions which they contain." State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1. Wharton says that "in an argument to a court such works may, at the discretion of the court, be read, not as establishing facts (unless such books are regarded as matters of notoriety, as are ordinary dictionaries), but as exhibiting distinct processes of reasoning, which the court, from its own knowledge as thus refreshed, is able to pursue. But, if read to establish facts, capable of proof by witnesses, such books cannot be received. Medical works, consequently, are inadmissible for the purpose of proving the facts they contain." Crim. Ev. § 588. In Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 287, it is said: "It is not to be denied but that a pertinent quotation or extract from a work on science or art, as well as from a classical, historical, or other publication, may, by way of argument or illustration, be not only admissible (in argument), but sometimes highly proper; and it would seem to make no difference whether it was repeated by counsel from recollection or read from a book. It would be an abuse of this privilege, however, to make it the pretense of getting improper matter before the jury as evidence, in the cause." A part of the excerpts attempted to be read conflicted with certain instructions of the court. The court, therefore, under all the circumstances, committed no error in refusing to permit the law books and newspapers to be read to the jury. The counsel for the defendant, however, in their arguments, repeated from recollection very much of the language contained in the rejected law books and newspapers, and the only complaint really is that they were not permitted to impress the jury more forcibly with the authorities from which they quoted.

The more serious questions discussed in the briefs and in the oral argument concern the instructions about drunkenness and insanity. Evidence was offered upon the part of the defendant showing that he had inherited an appetite for intoxicating liquors; that he indulged that appetite during life; and that the habit for drink had grown upon him so that he had the reputation of being an habitual drunkard. It is further insisted the evidence tended to prove that at the time of the death of the deceased the defendant was insane from alcoholism. The following instruction was requested on the part of the defendant, and refused by the court: "If you believe there is a disease called dipsomania, being an inordinate, uncontrollable appetite for intoxicating drink, and if you further believe from the evidence that the defendant by long-continued and excessive indulgence in alcoholic liquors brought upon himself such disease, and that the same had so impaired his mental faculties and his power over his will as to render him subject to furious and uncontrollable impulses to assault and slay his wife, but he did not at the time understand the nature and consequences of such act, and that it was wrong, he is not guilty of any of the offenses charged or included in the information." The court, however, instructed the jury, among other things, as follows: "Voluntary intoxication is no defense to murder in the first degree unless such intoxication should be so extreme as to rob the mind of the power of premeditation and deliberation. Hence, in this case, if you find that the defendant committed the act of killing as charged in the information, and that at the time he did so he was in a state of intoxication caused by his voluntary action, he is guilty of murder in the first degree, unless you further find that such intoxication was so extreme as to prevent his mind from the exercise of deliberation or premeditation; in which latter case he would be guilty of murder in the second degree, or manslaughter in some of the degrees as you are herein instructed." "I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did the killing of Mary O'Neil, as charged in the information, but at the time he was so drunk as to be in-that the defendant had no previous knowledge that when intoxicated that he was liable to commit acts of violence upon his wife or others as a consequence of such drinking, you cannot find the defendant guilty of murder in either of the first or second degrees." "I instruct you that, where a person is shown to have been in the habit of becoming intoxicated, and it is further shown that when intoxicated he is apt to commit acts of violence upon his fellows, and endanger their lives or safety, and such person is shown to have knowledge of such fact, and, having such knowledge, voluntarily becomes intoxicated, then, and in such a case, such person would be as fully and entirely responsible for acts of a criminal nature committed by him while in such state of intoxication as though the act had been committed by him while not intoxicated. Hence, if you believe that the defendant in this case was in the habit of becoming intoxicated, and that while in such state of intoxication, and by reason thereof, was apt to and did assault and beat Mary O'Neil, his wife, in a manner dangerous to her life and safety; and if you further find that the defendant knew that he was apt to assault and beat his wife while so intoxicated, but, notwithstanding such knowledge, voluntarily became intoxicated, and, while so intoxicated, assaulted his wife, and killed her as charged in the information,—then I instruct you that the defendant is guilty in the same degree as he would be had he committed the act while not intoxicated." This court has already declared, in accordance with the views adopted generally by other courts, that if a man kills another while in a fit of voluntary intoxication, it is murder, and he must suffer the penalty." State v. Yarborough, 39 Kan. 581; Lawson, Defenses to Crime, 582-695, and cases cited. Of course, drunkenness may be considered, as the instructions declare in this case, in determining whether there was that deliberation, premeditation, and intent to kill necessary to constitute the offense charged. Cline v. State, 43 Ohio St. 384. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Law, which is quoted approvingly in the brief for the defendant, says: "When a man voluntarily becomes drunk there is the wrongful intent; and if, while too far gone to have any further intent, he does a wrongful act, the intent to drink coalesces with the act done while drunk, and for this combination of act and intent he is liable criminally. It is, therefore, a legal doctrine, applicable in ordinary cases, that voluntary intoxication furnishes no excuse for crime committed under its influence. It is so even when the intoxication is so extreme as to make the person unconscious of what he is doing, or to create a temporary insanity." Section 400 (vol. 1, 7th ed.), p. 258. In section 406 he says: "Again, the law holds men responsible for the immediate consequences of their acts, but not ordinarily for those more remote. If, therefore, one drinks so deeply, or is so affected by the liquor, that for the occasion he is oblivious or insane, he created a fixed frenzy or insanity, whether permanent or intermittent,—as, for instance, delirium tremens.—It is the same as if produced by any other cause excusing the act; for whenever a man loses his understanding, as a settled condition, he is entitled to legal protection, equally whether the loss is occasioned by his own misconduct or by the dispensation of Providence." Id. If drunkenness produces insanity through delirium tremens or mania a potu, or other disease, and a defendant at the time of the homicide has no sufficient capacity or reason to enable him to determine between right and wrong as to the particular act he was doing, or has no power to know that the act was wrong and criminal, he would not be responsible. O'Grady v. State, 36 Neb. 320. In cases of delirium tremens or mania a potu, the insanity excuses the act, the frenzy being, not the immediate effect of indulgence in strong drink, but a remote consequence superinduced by antecedent drunkenness. State v. Nixon, 32 Kan. 205; State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 369; also the various decision cited in Lawson, Insanity and Defenses to Crime, pp. 586-680; O'Grady v. State, and Cline v. State, supra.

But, it is argued on account of the instructions given and refused, that the jury were misled in not being permitted to excuse the defendant if alcoholism or other disease had created insanity. We think other instructions of the court sufficiently covered all forms of insanity, because in such instructions the jury were informed that, "when insanity is set up as a defense to crime committed, the rule that the jury must ever keep before their eyes and minds in determining the responsibility of defendant is this: 'Was the accused, at the time of doing the act complained of, conscious of the nature of his act, or did he know that it was wrong to do it?'"

Testimony has been introduced in this case covering several years of the defendant's life prior to the commission of the acts alleged against him. The object was to show the defendant's conduct and habits of life. This is all proper testimony, and you should consider it for what you may think it is worth as bearing upon the question of the defendant's sanity or insanity at the time he committed the act charged against him. If you find that he did commit such an act, remembering that it is the condition of the defendant's mind at the time he committed the fatal assault upon which you are to judge him, and that all or any of this testimony is only competent as it may throw light upon his actual condition at the time of his commission of the act charged against him. . . . If you believe that the defendant was laboring under such a defective reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong, then the law does not hold him responsible for his acts. . . . When habitual unsoundness of mind is once shown to exist either wholly or partially, it is presumed to continue to exist until the presumption is rebutted by the state.

When a person at the time of the alleged crime has sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and quality of the particular act or acts constituting the crime, and the mental capacity to know whether they are right or wrong, he is responsible, if he commits such act or acts, whatever may be his capacity in other particulars; but if he does not possess this degree of capacity, then he is not so responsible. In other words, if he has mental capacity sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong, with respect to the particular act or acts constituting the alleged crime, he should be held responsible for the commission of such act or acts, although he might be insane or imbecile with respect to other matters. Now, there are many sorts of diseases of the mind that are commented upon and discussed by physicians and psychologists in these days, and that are presented in court for the consideration of a jury, and upon which the jury is asked to find that the mind of the accused was, at the time in question, so overthrown as to make him wholly irresponsible, and therefore that he should be acquitted for his otherwise unlawful acts. Now, however varied these diseases may be, I say to you they all come under the great head or generic head of insanity, and in the main test is the rule I have just given you; all else is argument or minor rule under this head, and which must revolve itself back to it." Therefore, in accordance with the prior decisions of this court, the jury were properly instructed upon the evidence concerning the defendant's insanity, whether caused from alcoholism, through delirium tremens, or mania a potu, or from any other disease.

This court has gone further than some other courts in holding "that the defendant on a plea of insanity is not required to establish his insanity by a preponderance of the evidence, but, if, upon the whole of the evidence introduced upon the trial, together with all the legal presumptions applicable to the case, under the evidence there is a reasonable doubt whether he is sane or insane, he must be acquitted. To doubt his sanity is to doubt his guilt; and to doubt his guilt, if the doubt be a reasonable one, is to acquit. The doubt of guilt cannot be of a less degree than the doubt of sanity; and if the doubt of sanity be a reasonable doubt, the doubt of guilt must also and necessarily be a reasonable doubt." State v. Crausford, 11 Kan. 82. The rule laid down by this court concerning the responsibility of a "person who, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, has sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and quality of the particular act or acts constituting the crime, and the mental capacity to know whether they are right or wrong," is forcibly challenged by the counsel for the defendant. The theory of irresponsibility from an irresistible or uncontrollable impulse is ably presented. The following authorities are cited against the law declared in the former decisions of this court: State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 583; Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep. 193. We have also been referred to a lengthy article "on the legal aspect of insanity," published in N. W. Law Rep. 1, which states, among other things, that "it would be difficult to crowd into the same compass more erroneous ideas than are found in the charge of the court in the Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. Rep. 161." We have examined these authorities, and also read many similar articles in the magazines upon legal or forensic medicine, which support, and even go further than, the views expressed in the Law Review. Some of the articles in the medico-legal journals assert that all crime results from heredity, and therefore that all persons committing alleged offenses should be considered irresponsible, and be subjected to treatment for disease only; not for crime. The decisions cited above are sporadic cases, and against the overpowering weight of authority. Lawson, Defenses to Crime, 200-324. Mr. Justice Valentine, in State v. Nison, 33 Kan. 205, expressed himself as follows: "It is possible that an insane, uncontrollable impulse is sometimes sufficient to destroy criminal responsibility, but this is probably so only where it destroys the power of the accused to comprehend rationally the nature, character, and consequences of the particular act or acts charged against him, and not where the accused still has the power of knowing the character of the particular act or acts, and that they are wrong. Indeed, it would seem dangerous to society to say that a man who knows what is right and wrong may nevertheless, for any reason, do what he knows to be wrong without any legal responsibility therefor. The law will hardly recognize the theory that any uncontrollable impulse may so take possession of a man's faculties and powers as to compel him to do what he knows to be wrong, and a crime, and thereby relieve him from all criminal responsibility. Whenever a man understands the nature and character of an act and knows that it is wrong, it would seem that he ought to be held legally responsible for the commission of it, if in fact he does commit it. But upon this question of insane, uncontrollable impulse, we do not wish to express any very definite opinions, as we do not think the question is presented to us in this case." In State v. Mowry, 37 Kan. 369, this court adopted the views thus expressed upon uncontrollable impulse. See State v. Miller, 111 Mo. 543, where the defendant was charged with rape, and claimed he was irresponsible for the crime because committed under uncontrollable impulse. 37 Am. L. Rev. pp. 299, 300. We are not willing to change the ruling of this court in favor of irresponsibility on account of uncontrollable impulse where the perpetrator is fully conscious that the act he is doing is wrong and criminal. If the law as declared by this court does not offer sufficient safeguards and protection for "that most unfortunate class, who cannot speak for themselves," an act of the legislature may establish a different rule. Until the legislature interferes, we prefer to follow the great weight of authority upon this matter. We are not inclined to adopt the theories of psychological enthusiasts to overthrow the long-established criminal practice pass an act permitting the state or the accused to have the question of insanity tried before the main trial upon the information or indictment. In such a case a jury of physicians might be required to be summoned to determine the sanity or insanity. At present the question of insanity in a criminal case, where it is claimed that the accused was insane at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, is tried along with all the other questions. State v. Gould, 40 Kan. 258.

Several other alleged errors are referred to and discussed in the briefs. All of these have been examined, but we find no prejudicial error therein.

"Where a railway company, owning a short line of railroad of twenty-six

*Headnote by HORTON, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Mandamus to compel operation of railroad.
The right of a railroad company to abandon the exercise of its franchise by ceasing to operate its railroad has been generally denied by the courts when speaking of the subject incidentally, and also in some decisions to that effect.

In case of insolvency the practical question of how the company can be compelled to operate the road presents serious difficulty.

When the railroad company is not insolvent, but finds a certain section or branch of its road unprofitable, the right to abandon that portion for that reason is, so far as actual decisions go, somewhat uncertain. The decisions imply that such an abandonment cannot be allowed.

In Talcott v. Pine Grove Twp., 1 Flipp. 145, it was said "that a railroad cannot be abandoned after it has become one of the thoroughfares of the country, and that the company will, by proceedings in behalf of the state, be forced to continue the road and perform all its duties to the public, is beyond question." This was said, however, not by way of actual decision but in discussing the public character of the road as affecting the validity of town bonds in aid of the road.

In State v. Sioux City & P. R. Co., 7 Neb. 367, it was said that the railroad company, which had received a land grant, "unless relieved by the legislature, must conform to the terms and conditions of the grant, and the entire line must be kept in running order and operated," also that the "state may compel a compliance with the terms of the contract by mandamus, or other appropriate remedy." This was, however, said in a suit to quiet title and cancel a patent for land to the railroad company.

plied for the payment of the expenses of the company or the road, and the use of the road has been abandoned for several months, and the road cannot be operated, except at a great loss, by any corporation or person, not taking into account the repairs of the road and the taxes thereon, the supreme court, having some discretion in the granting of a writ of mandamus, will not compel, by a peremptory writ, the railway company to replace or put into repair its track, a part of which has been torn up, as such an order would be useless or futile, and of no public benefit.

(May 5, 1894.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to repair and relay certain portions of the track and roadbed of the Dodge City, Montezuma & Trinidad Railway. Denied.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

This action was commenced in this court on January 4th of the present year, to compel the Dodge City, Montezuma & Trinidad Railway Company and the other defendants to repair and relay certain portions of the track and roadbed of the railway company in the counties of Gray and Ford in this state. It appears from the evidence presented upon the trial that on May 21, 1887, the Dodge City, Montezuma & Trinidad Railway Company was chartered, to exist ninety-nine years, and organized under the laws of the state, with the declared intention of constructing a line of railway from Dodge City, in this state, to Trinidad, Colo. The Monte-

Am. Dec. 235, a suit for specific performance was held not to be an allowable remedy to compel a railroad company to restore the road, when it had torn up its track and dismantled its road with intention to abandon it and this was the extent of the decision, but a majority of the justices sitting in the case expressed the opinion that the remedy was by mandamus or indictment, or at the election of the people by proceedings to annul the existence of the corporation.

In the earliest case on the subject, which was one respecting a tram road, mandamus was issued to compel the restoration of the road and the relaying of the track, where the company had torn up a section of the track to prevent its use by collieries which were in rivalry of business with others in which the owners of the road were interested. The chief justice said "the writ should be to restate and lay down again, but not to maintain, the tram road. Rex v. Severn & W. R. Co. 3 Barn. & Ald. 645.

It seems that the road was intended for use by vehicles of others as well as for those of the railway company.

Where passenger trains had been discontinued over a section of track about a mile and a half long from the railroad depot to a dock, where connection was made with steamers according to the course of travel at the time when the charter of the company was obtained, and the railroad company undertook to justify this abandonment of passenger trains over that part of its track by a contract with another railroad company, which was evidently intended to prevent competition by the boats, mandamus was granted to compel the running of passenger trains over this track; and the court regarded the delinquency of the comsuma Company, during the year 1888, constructed its line of road from Dodge City, in a southwesterly direction, to the town of Montezuma, in Gray county,—a distance of twenty-six miles. At no time has the road been extended further. The Montezuma Company never equipped its road with cars or engines. From the time of completion of the road until May, 1893, it was operated by the Montezuma Company, by an arrangement with the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company by which the latter company was to run its trains over the road at a cost of from $18 to $26 per round trip. During the year 1888, all of the capital stock of the company, amounting to 40,000 shares, of $50 each, was issued, and A. T. Soule, of Rochester, N. Y., became the owner of 88,000 shares, which he owned until the time of his death, in 1890, since which time his son, Wilson Soule, has been the owner thereof; and Fairview township became the owner of 278 shares of the stock, and the remaining 1,722 shares have been owned and held, from that time until the present, by other individuals. The total receipts from sale of stock by the Montezuma Company, from its organization to the present time, are $68,900. Fairview township, in Ford County, through which the road runs, in September, 1888, became the owner of 278 shares of the stock of the Montezuma Company, and has ever since been the owner thereof, by issuing its bonds in the sum of $13,900 to the Montezuma Company, on the completion of the road through the township, which bonds are outstanding and unpaid. No other aid was furnished the Montezuma Company, except donations by citizens of Dodge City in the amount of $800.

The company exercised the right of eminent domain along the entire line of its road. The cost of the construction of the road was $268,000. In 1888 the Montezuma Company became indebted to A. T. Soule for $194,888.55, which was used in the construction of the road; and afterwards, in 1889, 1890, and 1891, it became further indebted to A. T. Soule and Wilson Soule in the sum of $38,000. These sums of money were furnished at various times, for which the company gave to Soule its nineteen promissory notes, aggregating these sums; and the notes not being paid on the 7th day of October, 1891, the Montezuma Company, to secure the payment of the same to Wilson Soule, gave him its mortgage upon all its property, described as follows: "All the line of railway owned by the party of the first part which extends from Dodge City, Kas., to Montezuma, Kas., including the roadbed, ties, and rails thereon, together with all side tracks, depots and appurtenances thereto in anywise appertaining or belonging; to have and to hold the same, together with all and singular the tenements and hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, forever." On the 19th day of January, 1893, by proceedings in the district court of Ford county, Wilson Soule obtained a judgment against the Montezuma Company for the amounts secured by the mortgage, and a decree foreclosing the mortgage, and an order for the sale of the property, which order was executed by a receiver appointed by the court. The sale was had on the 5th day of September, 1893, and the defendant E. F. Kellogg, who purchased for the defendant Wilson Soule, became the purchaser; and pany as aggravated, rather than excused, by that contract. It was said that the company which had made the road was bound "to put it into use,—every material part of it,—and keep it in use until discharged by the legislature." State v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538.

In Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co., 12 Gray, 180, it is held that the duty of a railroad company is not more than to meet and supply the public wants, and it is said "if trains run at reasonable and moderate fares cannot be supported, it is because they are not needed."

Mandamus was refused in that case to compel the running of passenger trains over a branch road, on which they had been discontinued after running them for a time, because they were unprofitable. The court said in this case, that the question is not as to the existence of the duty, but as to its extent and qualifications.

An electric street railway company, which had purchased the road of a former company, was compelled by mandamus to perform the duties to the public which grew out of the permission to use the streets given by ordinance. In this case the court says it was "not seriously contended that the whole line is unprofitable," but the company desired to change its line for one that was more direct, claiming that the interests of the company and of the people alike required the change. Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609.

A receiver of a railroad company was compelled, on application by the attorney-general, to repair and operate a portion of a railroad which he had abandoned. The decision was based, not only on the general ground that the exercise of the franchise could not be abandoned over any portion of the road, but also that the company had received a land grant, by acceptance of which it was bound by contract to operate the road. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Henning (Kan.) 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 266.

The United States Supreme Court in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 848, 23 L. ed. 428, affirming Hall v. Union Pac. R. Co. 3 Dill. 515; United States v. Union Pac. R. Co. 4 Dill. 479, upheld a mandamus to compel the operation of a railroad as a continuous line, and on the relation of a private individual. But this was not a case of compelling the operation of a road which the company wished to abandon, but merely the operation of the whole road, including that across a bridge, as a continuous line.

That a railroad may be compelled by mandamus to reconstruct and operate a line of road as originally laid out is implied in another decision to the effect that the lessor is a necessary party to such a suit against the lessee, where the latter has changed the line. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Crane, 113 U. S. 424, 28 L. ed. 1084.

A mandamus to compel the continued operation of a short line between two stations was denied, where the company, by consolidation, had obtained another line between the two stations which was only two miles longer but passed through an intermediate village. People v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 95.

That a railroad company cannot be compelled by any court sitting in a state to operate any part of its line outside of that state, unless it is a federal corporation and jurisdiction over it given by act of congress, is decided by a federal court in People v. Colorado Cent. R. Co. 49 Fed. Rep. 633.

This case also holds that a lessee of the road canthe order of the court, or of the property to E. F. Kellogg, who took the same in trust for Wilson Soule, the real purchaser. On the 2d day of December, 1893, Wilson Soule sold the superstructure of the road to the Block-Pollak Iron Company, with the understanding that the Block-Pollak Iron Company would remove the same from the roadbed. In the months of December and January, work being carried on until the 10th of January, the Block-Pollak Iron Company, through its agents and employes, G. T. Wisewell, Harry Benjamin, and others, tore up and removed sixteen miles of the superstructure of the road, commencing at Montezuma, and extending east to a point two miles within Fairview township, Ford county, since which time no effort has been made to remove the road, ex-drawn, and on January 20 a large number of teams were hired to haul rails, but were not used, and on January 26 twelve men pulled spikes for half the day. No part of the superstructure of the road has ever been repaired. Before any of the road was taken up, about one third of the ties were in a defective condition, and if the road were to be used, ought to have been changed at once; the other two thirds ought to be changed within the next three years. The estimated cost of replacing one third of the ties would be $15,000. In taking up the road the ties were offered for two cents to the farmers for wood, but no buyers were found, and they were left upon the ground. At the time the road was constructed, five stations were established, namely, Dodge City and Grand not be compelled to operate it, where the lease is void.

If a railroad company has neither funds nor the means of raising funds to perform the service required, a mandamus to repair and improve a portion of its road and increase passenger service thereon will be denied, because it would be unavailing, although the court says this rule, possibly, might not apply if the defendant had willfully and wrongfully put it out of its power to perform the act required. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 120 Ill. 300.

Although upon the admitted facts of the case the company was clearly guilty of a violation of duty in not keeping its road in a proper state of repair and a safe condition, the court held that if the company was wholly unable to discharge the duties it owed to the public, and which the law had imposed upon it, a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto was the proper remedy and not mandamus.

It is also said to be of doubtful propriety to make the order so general, where it was to put the road "in a good, safe, and suitable condition."

The cessation of operation of a railroad because of a strike of its employes is not excusable, if the failure to operate the road is due merely to the refusal of the company to pay sufficient wages to obtain employes. But the court says it would be a different case, if it were shown that the strike had been caused or compelled by some illegal combination or organized body which held an unlawful control of the actions of the employes, and sought through them to enforce its will upon the company, and that the company in resisting such unlawful efforts had refused to obey unjust and illegal dictation and had used all the means in their power to employ other men in sufficient numbers to do the work. People v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 28 Hun. 543.

Mandamus was denied on the ground that there was a complete remedy by injunction, where a citizen applied for mandamus to compel a railroad company to run its own road, where a rival and competing company was operating it in violation of statute. State v. Manchester & L. Railroad, 63 N. H. 22.

Increased facilities.

Mandamus to compel increased facilities for passenger travel was denied in People v. Long Island R. Co., 31 Hun. 125, where the company was running one train each way daily, and the quantity of service was not prescribed by law.

In respect to compelling increased facilities for travel, it is said in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 120 Ill. 300: "It is believed, however, no case can be found which, in the absence of a statutory requirement, has gone to the length of holding that a railway company may be compelled, by mandamus, to increase the number of trains on its road, or to run daily a particular number of trains over its road; and we are satisfied that there is no common-law authority for making such an order. Of course, where the charter of the company expressly requires that not less than a given number of trains shall be run daily, the company may be compelled, by mandamus, to perform this, like any other specific duty enjoined by its charter or by other statutory provision."

Compelling completion of road.

The power to compel a railroad company to build its road in the first instance after it has obtained a charter permitting it to build the road has been but little discussed by courts in this country.

In State v. Southern Minnesota R. Co., 18 Minn. 40, mandamus to compel the building of a road to a certain point was denied on the ground that there was no legal obligation to complete the road to that point under statutes empowering the company to build it, and making a grant of lands to aid in the construction.

In England, the earlier decisions proceeded on the theory that a railroad company by obtaining a charter became under contract obligation to build the road. Reg. v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 10 Ad. & El. 531, 2 Perry & D. 642, 1 Railway Cas. 509; Reg. v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 4 Q. B. 162, 3 Gale & D. 394, 3 Railway Cas. 483, 13 L. J. Q. B. 106, 7 Jur. 238; Reg. v. York & N. B. R. Co. 16 Q. B. 898; Reg. v. Great Western R. Co. 1 El. & Bl. 258, 16 Eng. L. & Eq. 341, Reg. v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. 16 Eng. L. & Eq. 327, 1 El. & Bl. 223, 7 Railway Cas. 265, 23 L. J. Q. B. 257, 7 Jur. 62; Reg. v. York & N. M. R. Co. 1 El. & Bl. 178, 16 Eng. L. & Eq. 299.

But this doctrine was overthrown and the earlier cases disapproved in York & N. M. R. Co. v. Reg., 1 El. & Bl. 858, 18 Eng. L. & Eq. 199, 23 L. J. Q. B. 222, 17 Jur. 690, 7 Railway Cas. 450; and Great Western R. Co. v. Reg., 1 El. & Bl. 874, 16 Jur. 675, which decide that merely empowering a company to build a railroad did not create any implied contract or obligation to build it, and that by building a part of the road, it did not bind itself to complete it.

It will be somewhat strange if the law on the subject of compelling the operation of railroads and portions of railroads when corporations may desire to abandon them is not much more fully developed by decisions in coming years as it has been thus far one of the least developed branches of the law of corporations, while the constant and great increase of railroads will naturally furnish cases of this kind for decision.

View, in Ford county, and Ensign, Macomb, and Montezuma, in Gray county. At that time Montezuma had about seventy-five inhabited houses, among which were, in operation, five or six stores, two hotels, two livery stables, one bank, printing office, postoffice, and other small business. Ensign was a place of about a half dozen houses, including one store and postoffice. Grand View and Macomb were no towns at that time or afterwards; but a postoffice was established at Macomb, which, in 1892, was discontinued by the government. In December, 1893, more than half the houses had been removed from Montezuma, and the population had been reduced to less than twenty-five. No business was carried on there, except one general store, with postoffice; and at that time Ensign was deserted, and no business whatever was carried on there, except a postoffice. The road was operated from September 5, 1888, to October, 1890, by running one train a day a round trip over the road, six days each week; and from that time until May, 1893, by running one train a round trip each day, for three days each week. The total earnings for the year ending June 30, 1889, were $1,981.28; operating expenses, $5,940.53,—making a deficit of $3,959.25. The total freight earnings for the year ending June 30, 1890, $2,011.60; total passenger and mail earnings, $2,463.47. Total earnings, $4,475.07; operating expenses, $14,447.49,—making a deficit of $9,972.42. The total freight earnings for the year ending June 30, 1891, $919.55; passenger and mail earnings $1,016.56. Total earnings, $1,936.11; operating expenses, $3,026.36,—making a deficit of $6,090.24. Total earnings for year ending June 30, 1892, were, freight earnings $3,590.21; passenger and mail earnings, $959.04, total earnings, $3,549.25; operating expenses, $7,790.67,—making a deficit of $4,151.42. Total earnings for the year ending June 30, 1893, were, freight earnings, $4,906.50; passenger and mail earnings, $374.47. Total earnings, $5,780.97; operating expenses, $8,024.55,—making a deficit of $2,243.58. In operating expenses are included all other expenses incurred by the company in connection with the maintenance and operation of the road, except the taxes of 1891 and 1892, which have been on an average $2,800 per year. During the four years of the operation of the road, the total amount (which is included in the expense item) paid to the officers and employés is $12,097.53, making an average of $3,024.88 a year. The Rock Island Company has a branch of its road at Dodge City, and the superintendent of that company testified "that the Rock Island road is better situated to operate the Montezuma road than any other company, and that his company would not take the road as a gift and operate it; that it would cost nearly as much to keep the road in repair to operate it three months of the year as if it were operated all the time, except as to the rails." M. A. Lowe, the general attorney for the Rock Island Company, also testified "that, in his opinion, the Montezuma road could not be operated as an independent line to pay operating expenses, not including taxes, and that the Rock Island

Company could not operate it so as to make it pay operating expenses, and that his company could not afford to take the road as a gift and operate it for the period of five years." He further testified "that the Rock Island Company had better facilities for operating the road than any other company, and that his company could not keep it in repair and operate it without absolute loss; that the revenues to be derived from the Montezuma road would not pay operating expenses, not taking into account the repairs of the road and taxes." The testimony of H. R. Nickerson, superintendent of the Atchison Company, shows that the cost of maintaining the track of one of the railroads in the western part of the state, under his supervision, and similar to the Montezuma Railway, is from $111.81 to $132 per mile each year, and that these figures are below the actual requirements of proper maintenance. The proposed offer of fifteen business men near Dodge City to operate the railway, if they can acquire it by gift or otherwise, if the track were relaid, is more visionary than practicable. All that they are willing at present to subscribe or offer towards the operation is $3,000. If the road were in the same condition it was before any of the track was torn up, it would cost $15,000 to put it in reasonable order for mere operation, and then cars and engines would have to be purchased at a large additional expense. $3,000 is an insignificant sum with which to commence the operation of such a road. It appears, further, from the evidence of the representative of these persons, that they might not be willing to operate the road if the loss were $1,000 a year. The evidence conclusively shows that the deficit in the operation of the road was a much larger amount than that, and therefore the proposition amounts to little, if anything,—nothing substantial. There is really no showing made that the public is sufficiently interested in the operation of the road to pay all of the expenses for so doing.

Messrs. John T. Little, Atty. Gen., B. F. Milton, and Milton Brown for plaintiff.

Messrs. Sutton & McGarry for defendants.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding has been commenced in this court, not for the purpose of compelling the Dodge City, Montezuma & Trinidad Railway Company, or any of the defendants, to operate the line of that railway in Ford and Gray counties, or any part thereof, but merely to require the defendants to repair and relay certain portions of the track and road-bed of the railway company. A railway company may be compelled by mandamus to perform the public duties specifically and plainly imposed upon the corporation; and therefore we have no doubt of the power of this court in a proper case to compel a company to operate its road, and for that purpose to compel the replacement of its track, torn up in violation of its charter. State v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 33 Kan. 176; Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609;

Barn. & Ald. 646. But the granting of a writ of mandamus rests somewhat in the discretion of the court. Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. supra. The Montezuma Railway Company is insolvent. It has no cars or engines. Its line of road has not been operated for many months. The road cannot be operated except at a great loss. The railway company is not liable to operate it, and has no funds or property which can be applied to the payment of operating expenses. A. T. Soule, the promoter of the railway company, has expended over $200,000 in the construction and operation of the road without any returns. All of its property was sold, or attempted to be sold, to the Block-Pollak Company, for $25,000 only. The venture of the promoter, A. T. Soule has been very unsuccessful to him. His experience and that of the other parties investing in, constructing, and operating this railway have been most unfortunate. No one connected with the railway corporation has realized any personal benefit from any bond, mortgage, or subsidy of the road. The Rock Island road, which, by an arrangement with the Montezuma Company, ran its trains over the road from the time of its completion until May, 1893, and which has better facilities for operating the road than any other company or person, will not take the road as a gift and operate it. It seems to be conclusively shown that all the receipts to be derived from operating the road will not pay the operating expenses, not taking into account the repairs of the road and the taxes. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs is that as the railway was sold to E. F. Kellogg for Wilson Soule by a receiver, and not by the sheriff of Ford county, the sale is absolutely void. If this be true, then there is no legal duty upon the part of Wilson Soule to repair or operate the road. If, however, the sale is not absolutely son, ought to be compelled to operate the road. The Block-Pollak Iron Company cannot, under its conditional purchase of the superstructure, be compelled to repair or operate the road. There is no legal duty upon any of the other defendants to repair the road. Therefore, the question is whether the court will compel, or attempt to compel, the railway company—a bankrupt corporation—to relay the track and repair the roadbed. The court will not make a useless or futile order. It will not do a vain thing. The order prayed for should only be issued in the interest of the public. If the track is replaced, there is no reasonable probability that the road will be or can be operated. If a railway will not pay its mere operating expenses, the public has little interest in the operation of the road, or in its being kept in repair. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1119; Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 12 Gray, 108; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 120 Ill. 200; People v. Albany & V. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 261, 82 Am. Dec. 295. The average life of cedar ties—the kind used on this road—is from three to five years. All the ties laid in 1888 will soon be so much decayed as to be worthless. A large part were worthless when the track was taken up. If the track were relaid, the road would be in no reasonable condition to be used, unless new ties were furnished, and these in a few years would again become decayed and useless. The use of the road was abandoned before any part of the track was torn up. If the track were replaced, it would be of no immediate public benefit,—possibly of no future benefit,—because, if the railway is not operated, the mere existence of a road, not in use, is not beneficial to any one.

NOTE.—Some novel questions are raised or suggested by the above case. One is as to the easement of flow over lower grounds or to increase a natural stream, in the discharge of water artificially raised from the interior of the earth. This does not seem to have been discussed in this case. Another question which is the one chiefly presented in this case is that respecting the right to pollute a stream by use for bathing in a sanitarium or hospital. This naturally falls into the question of reasonableness of use within the existing circumstances and conditions. The determination of this is a practical question of the highest importance in many cases.

For pollution by mining operations, see note to Drake v. Lady Enaley Coal, Iron & R. Co. (Ala.) ante, 64.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Morgan County enjoining her from permitting the water from a medicinal artesian well to flow into a stream running through complainants' premises, the effect of which was alleged to be the pollution of the water of the stream. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Jordan & Mathews and W. R. Harrison for appellants.

Mr. W. S. Shirley for appellee.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Since May, 1886, the appellee has been the owner of certain lots and lands in and adjoining the city of Martinsville, occupied by her as a farm. Appellants are the owners of certain lots in the city of Martinsville, adjoining the lands of appellee. During the years 1887 and 1888, a well was drilled upon appellants' lots to the depth of 800 feet, in search of gas. Instead of gas, a large volume of water flowed from the well, and has so continued to flow ever since. The water having been found by analysis to possess curative properties for certain diseases, appellants erected a bathhouse upon their said lots, to be used for bathing persons afflicted with diseases who might be benefited by the artesian waters. On the 16th day of September, 1889, the appellee filed her complaint against appellants in the Morgan circuit court, alleging that appellants, after using said artesian water in bathing the bodies of diseased persons, the same having all manner of diseases, including syphilis, and after said water has become befouled and polluted thereby, caused the same to be conveyed in a tile ditch under ground, constructed by them, to the lands of appellee, causing such water to flow upon and over the lands of appellee and into a natural stream of water running thereon, causing said natural stream of water to become befouled and polluted thereby, exposing the same to the stock pasturing and feeding upon appellee's said land where said stock is accustomed to run, feed, and pasture, such as milch cows, horses, and hogs, and the same drinking said water in its befouled and polluted condition as aforesaid. That said stream of water is a small spring branch of pure water, having its source in springs about one mile from appellee's land, and confined in a small channel upon appellee's land, and passing through appellee's land the distance of fifty-three rods, and having no outlet, but sinking into the lands of appellee and others below. That said artesian water, in its polluted condition, so caused by appellants as aforesaid, and so caused to flow upon appellee's land, accumulates in great ponds of water upon appellee's said premises, becoming polluted and stagnant thereon, to the great and irreparable damage of appellee and her said land, and to the stock pasturing and feeding thereon; also endangering the health of persons living upon said land and drinking the milk from said cows. That said mineral water from said artesian well never at any time flowed upon appellee's land and into said stream of water, by percolation or otherwise, until the same was caused to flow thereon and therein by appellants in manner as aforesaid. Concluding with a demand for damages in the sum of $1,000, and praying that appellants be forever enjoined from causing and permitting said water from said well to run upon and flow over the lands of appellee, and into said stream of water, and for other proper relief. A demurrer having been overruled to this complaint, appellants answered by general denial, and also by special plea. There was a motion to strike out parts of the special answer, which motion was sustained. A demurrer was afterwards filed to the second paragraph of the answer, which was sustained. Appellants moved for a jury to try the cause, and also moved for a jury to answer questions of fact, both of which motions were overruled. To all of these rulings appellants duly excepted. The cause was submitted to the court, and the court, having heard the evidence, found for the appellee, assessing her damages in the sum of $50, and appellants were "enjoined from causing or permitting the water of the artesian well which shall have been used at their sanitarium and bathhouse . . . in bathing or washing persons afflicted with syphilis or other infectious ailment or disorder to flow into said branch or stream, or over and upon the lands of plaintiff, . . . and are further enjoined and restrained from polluting or corrupting the water from said well which may be left by them to flow into said branch and stream in such manner that the water of said branch and stream other than that flowing from said well may be rendered dangerous or injurious to live stock." A motion for a new trial was overruled.

Various errors are assigned and discussed, but the controlling questions in the case arise under the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer. This paragraph of answer, omitting the parts stricken out as not material, or as being such as might have admitted of proof under the general denial, is as follows: "For further answer they [appellants] say that the stream of natural water set forth in plaintiff's complaint is a small stream and branch, which flows from sources northeast of the city of Martinsville, thence southward to near the center, north and south of said city, thence westward across said city, thence south to and across plaintiff's said land, and has so flowed for many years prior to plaintiff's having any interest in said land. That the said well from which said waters flow upon the said lots of defendants was dug and sociation of many citizens of said city of Martinsville, with the assent and approval of plaintiff. That the only means or way of escape of said water is in and along said branch over the said lands of plaintiff. That for more than one year after the said well was so dug and bored the waters therefrom flowed from defendants' said lots into said branch by open ditches, and were so caused to flow by the said association of persons who dug and bored the same, and without objection by plaintiff, and with her acquiescence. That thereupon and thereafter, upon testing said waters by scientific analysis, by drinking and using the same in baths, they were found to be of great value, and to have highly curative properties, and to be of great service and value in healing persons afflicted with various disorders,—rheumatism, neuralgia, kidney affections, paralysis, and many other disorders; whereupon defendants erected a bathhouse to utilize said waters for the benefit of all persons so afflicted upon their said lots at a cost of ten thousand dollars, and have treated, benefited, and cured hundreds of persons from all parts of the country so afflicted as aforesaid, and are still engaged at their said bathhouse in healing and curing such sick and afflicted. That in erecting said bathhouse and in using said waters of said artesian well for the healing of persons as aforesaid, and in all defendants did in the use of said waters and the draining the same away, as complained by said plaintiff, said defendants used all proper and possible care to avoid injury, damage, or inconvenience to said plaintiff and all others, and only did such acts as were proper and necessary to be done in the use of said waters for the purposes aforesaid. That said plaintiff stood by and assented to and acquiesced in the said expenditure of said sum in the erection of said bathhouse by defendants. That, after so erecting said bathhouse, defendants placed under ground a drain, made of porous tile, to convey the surplus water from said artesian well under ground to the branch above plaintiff's land, because the said branch was the only natural and only convenient outlet for said water, and did not thereby materially increase the flow of water in said branch."

The question presented for decision is new in this state,—whether one who sinks an artesian well upon his own land, and uses the water to bathe the patients in a sanitarium or hospital erected by him on said premises, is liable to injunction and damages for allowing the water to flow into a stream which is the natural watercourse of the basin in which the artesian well is situated, the owner being free from negligence or malice, and using all due care in avoiding injury to his neighbor. In a Pennsylvania case the plaintiff was the owner of property on one side of a street, and brought an action for damages for alleged injury to his property by the defendant company, which had constructed its elevated road on its own land, on the other side of the street. It was alleged that the noise, dust, smoke, and cinders, and the constant jar of passing trains, property, and lessened its value. The court in that case premised that under the constitution of Pennsylvania the company would only be liable if, under the same circumstances, an individual would be liable at common law, and held that in case a natural person were operating the road under the same circumstances he would not be responsible in damages, for the reason that he would have a right to the reasonable use and enjoyment of his property; and if in such use, without negligence or malice on his part, a loss should unavoidably fall upon his neighbor, he would not be liable therefor. No principle of law is better settled than that a man has the right to the lawful use and enjoyment of his own property, and that if, in the enjoyment of such right, without negligence or malice, an inconvenience or loss occurs to his neighbor, it is a wrong for which there is no liability. This must be so, or every man would be at the mercy of his neighbor in the use and enjoyment of his own. No man is answerable in damages for the reasonable exercise of a right, where it is accompanied by a cautious regard for the rights of others, where there is no just ground for the charge of negligence or unskillfulness, and where the act is not done maliciously. Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 99, 8 Am. Dec. 369. We need not consume time by further citation of authorities for so plain a proposition. It is settled law. It is true that this principle is qualified to a certain extent. A man may not carry on a business which poisons the air and renders it unhealthy in a thickly populated neighborhood, and especially in the center of a large city. So establishments which involve danger, as powder mills and certain kinds of manufactories, must seek a secluded place, where as few persons may be inconvenienced as possible. These exceptions to the general rule are well established. But the great interests of mankind must go on unhampered. Railroads must reach cities; the treasures of the earth must be drawn from the mines; factories and mills must send forth noise, dust, and smoke. Inconveniences resulting from such causes must be endured by individuals for the general good; otherwise we should have to forego a multitude of the blessings of modern civilization. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541, and authorities there cited. In Gannon v. Hargadon, 10 Allen, 106, 87 Am. Dec. 625, the court held that "the right of a party to the free and unfettered control of his own land above, upon, and beneath the surface cannot be interfered with or restrained by any considerations of injury to others which may be occasioned by the flow of mere surface water in consequence of the lawful appropriation of land by its owner to a particular use or mode of enjoyment. . . . A party may improve any portion of his land, although he may thereby cause the surface water flowing thereon, whencesoever it may come, to pass off in a different direction, and in larger quantities, than previously. If such an act causes damages to adjacent land it is damnum absque injuria." The law is the same in this state.

Shelbyville & B. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 305. Where, in Massachusetts, a riparian owner built a dam across a stream, to create a fish pond on his own land, it was held to be a reasonable use of the water; and a mill owner below had no cause to complain of it, either at common law or under the statute of that state as to mills. Yet it seems that a mill owner may not enlarge the quantity of water flowing in a stream from his mill through the land of a lower proprietor by turning a new stream into his pond. The wrong consists in turning any water upon the land which does not naturally flow there. This, however, does not extend to preventing a proprietor upon a stream from digging ditches or doing other acts in the proper cultivation of his land, though the effect of it is to increase the quantity of water in the stream. Washb. Easem. 4th ed. p. 375. In California, a man in irrigating his farm turned a stream upon it from an adjacent ravine. The water percolated through the soil into a neighboring mine in such quantities as to ruin the mine. It was held that the farmer was reasonably exercising his right to irrigate his land, and was responsible only for the injuries caused by his negligence or unskillfulness, or for such as were caused by any wanton abuse of his right. Gibson v. Puchta, 33 Cal. 316. In another California case the land owner permitted the water taken from artesian wells on his lands, and carried through a ditch to irrigate his fields, to percolate through the ditch, to the injury of his neighbor's land. It was found that at small expense the water might have been drained from the ditch so as probably to prevent the injury, and he was accordingly enjoined from continuing the injury. What might have been the opinion of the court in case the fields could not be irrigated without injury to the neighbor does not appear. Parker v. Larsen, 86 Cal. 236.

The general rule in England is that a person discharging noxious substances into a stream will be liable to the riparian owners lower down for any damages occasioned, yet some exception seems to be made in favor of mining operations. Bainbridge on Mines, 8d ed. 517, says: "It should also be remembered that the prosperity of a mining country and its inhabitants depends upon the successful efforts of the adventurer. The value of all property in the vicinity of mines is inseparably associated with the spirit of adventure. The miner, therefore, should not be harassed in his operations by claims of an unsubstantial or imaginary character, for the benefits he confers generally far surpass the injuries he may commit." In Mason v. Hill, Blanch. & W. Lead. Cas. 697, and notes, the exception as to mineral products is also made: "But the right to throw refuse into a natural stream, or discharge into it water which has been used for the precipitation of minerals, and rendered noxious, may be acquired by prescription, custom or user. The same rule applies to smelting and washing processes." Id. 721, and authorities there cited. In this country the severity of the English rule is still further relaxed. "If one builds a dam upon his own premises, and thus holds back and accumulates the water for his benefit, or if he brings water upon his premises into a reservoir, in case the dam or the banks of the reservoir give way, and the lands of a neighbor are thus flooded, he is not liable for the damage without proof of some negligence on his part." Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 477, and authorities cited. "As a general proposition, it is safe to say that the owner of land has a right to make reasonable use of his property, and that right extends as well to an unlimited distance above the earth's surface as to an unlimited distance below." Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 57, 20 Am. Rep. 164. The right to flowing water is a right incident to property in land; and while it is a right common and equal to all through whose land it runs, yet as one of the gifts of Providence each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it as it passes through his land. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question, depending on various circumstances. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 193, 57 Am. Dec. 85. Sewage and waste material may be cast into streams if material injury is not thereby caused. The right of one proprietor to have the stream descend to him pure must yield in a reasonable degree to the right of the upper proprietors, whose occupation of their own lands and whose use of the water for mill, manufacturing, domestic, or other purposes, will tend to make the water more or less impure. So it is of public importance that proprietors of useful manufactories should not be held responsible for slight injuries, or even some degree of interference with agriculture. In regard to some waste deposits in such streams, there would seem to be no question. The uniform practice, the convenience, and, in some instances, the indispensable necessity, would seem sufficient to decide such cases. Gould, Waters, § 220. In Health Department of New York v. Purdam, 99 N. Y. 257, 53 Am. Rep. 22, which was an action to enjoin the sale of adulterated tea, it was said that "courts will not in all cases interfere by way of injunction to restrain the continuance of an illegal trade, the abatement of a nuisance, or the prosecution of a dangerous employment, its power, however, to do so in case of the exercise of any trade or business which is either illegal or dangerous to human life, detrimental to health, or the occasion of great public inconvenience, is not only conferred by the provisions of the statute, but belongs to the general powers possessed by courts of equity to prevent irreparable mischief and obviate damages for which no adequate remedy exists at law." In that case it was found that, although the teas were adulterated, yet there was no sufficient evidence that the use of the teas was dangerous to human life or detrimental to health, and therefore the injunction was refused. In Owen v. Phillips, 73 Ind. 284, it was attempted to enjoin the re-erection of a flouring mill which had been burned, the claim being made that the mill was a nuisance, and that it could not be operated without becoming a nuisance; that the smoke and cinders made the water of plaintiff's cisterns and wells foul and impure; and that the noise, smoke, dust, dirt, and offensive odors caused by the running of the mill essentially interfered with plaintiff's enjoyment of life and property. The following instruction in that case was objected to by the plaintiffs because the court modified it, by inserting the words "materially and essentially:" "If the jury find from the evidence that the personal enjoyment of the plaintiffs in their residence has been and will be materially and essentially lessened by either the noise, smoke, dust, dirt, cinders, horses, mules, or teams, caused by the running and use of said mill, then the allegations of the complaint have been sustained." The instruction, as so modified, was, however, approved by this court, the court adding that "a lawful business may be so conducted as to become a nuisance, but, in order to warrant interference by injunction, the injury must be a material and essential one," quoting, also, with approval from the opinion rendered by Cooley, J., in Gilbert v. Shoverman, 28 Mich. 448, that in such cases "minor inconveniences must be remedied by actions for the recovery of damages, rather than by the severe process of injunction." See also Bowen v. Mauzy, 117 Ind. 258. "The granting or refusal of an injunction rests in each particular case in the sound discretion of the court. An injunction ought not, therefore, to be granted when it would be against good conscience, or productive of great hardship, oppression, injustice, or of public or private mischief." Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind. 531, 49 Am. Rep. 109, and authorities there cited.

The natural right to have the water of a stream descend in its pure state must yield to the equal right of those above. Their use of the stream for mill purposes and the other manifold purposes for which they may lawfully use it will tend to render it more or less impure. The water may thus be rendered unfit for many uses for which it had before been suitable; but, so far as that condition results from reasonable use of the stream in accordance with the common right, the lower riparian proprietor has no remedy. When the population becomes dense, and towns or villages gather along its banks, the stream naturally suffers still greater deterioration. Against such injury, incident as it is to the growth and industrial prosperity of the community, the law affords no redress. So in cities and towns, with their numerous inhabitants and diversified business, with their mills, shops, and manufactories, with their streets and sewers, all the products and means of a high civilization, it would be impossible that the pure streams that flow in from the farmsides should remain uncontaminated; and those that live upon the lower banks of such streams must, for the general good, abide the necessary results of such causes. Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, 14 Am. Rep. 592. That it is not, under all circumstances, an unreasonable or unlawful use of a stream to throw or discharge into it waste or impure matter, and that whether, in any given case, such use would be reasonable or not, is a question for the jury. See Angell, Watercourses, 7th ed. § 140d.

In the case before us the stream flowed through the heart of the city of Martinsville before it reached the lands of appellee. Will it be said that there is any liability for contamination from the refuse of the city? Must it be that one who lives on the lower lands on the banks of a stream shall forbid forever the founding of a city on the lands above, forbid the grading of streets, the building of sewers, the erection of mills, factories, hospitals, or other means of livelihood, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants? A case in many of its features resembling that now before the court is the well-considered case of Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 118 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 445. That was a mining case, and the chief question was as to the liability of the mine owners for the flowage of foul water from the mine into a stream which was the natural watercourse of the basin in which the mine was situated. The plaintiff in that case, Mrs. Sanderson, had purchased a tract of land in the city of Scranton, on Meadow brook, near its mouth. The existence of the stream, the purity of its water, and its utility for domestic and other purposes, it is said, was a leading inducement to her purchase of the land. She erected a house, threw dams across the brook to form a fish and ice pond and to supply a cistern, and the water was forced by hydraulic pressure from the cistern to a tank in the house, and was used for domestic purposes and for a fountain. The plaintiff alleged in her complaint that the large volume of mine water which the defendant company poured into the brook above had corrupted the stream to such an extent as to render it totally unfit for domestic use; that the fish were destroyed, the pipes corroded, and her entire apparatus for utilizing the water rendered worthless. She brought her action to recover damages for such pollution of the stream. In the course of the opinion the court says: "It must be conceded, we think, that every man is entitled to the ordinary and natural use and enjoyment of his property. He may cut down the forest trees, clear and cultivate his land, although in so doing he may dry up the sources of his neighbor's springs, or remove the natural barriers against wind and storm. If, in the excavation of his land, he should uncover a spring of water, salt or fresh, acidulated or sweet, he will certainly not be obliged to cover it again, or to conduct it out of its course, lest the stream, in its natural flow, may reach his neighbor's land. . . . In sinking his well he may intercept and appropriate the water which supplies his neighbor's well. Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 824; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 731; Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514, 84 Am. Dec. 511. Or, if his own well is so close to the soil of his neighbor as to require the support of a rib of clay or of stone on his neighbor's land to retain the water in the well, no action will lie against the owner of the adjacent land for digging away such clay or stone, which is his own property. Whart. Neg. 939. So, also, each of two owners of adjoining mines has a natural right to work his own mine in the manner most convenient and beneficial to himself, although the natural consequence may be that some prejudice may occur to the owner of the adjoining mine. Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. 515. One mine owner may thus permit water naturally flowing in his own mine to pass off by gravitation into an adjoining or lower mine, so long as his operations are carried on properly and in the usual manner. Bainbridge, Mines, 297. To the same effect are Wilson v. Waddell, 3 App. Cas. 95; Crompton v. Lea, L. R. 19 Eq. 115. The defendants, being the owners of the land, had a right to mine the coal. It may be stated as a general proposition that every man has the right to the natural use and enjoyment of his own property, and if, while lawfully in such use and enjoyment, without negligence or malice on his part, an unavoidable loss occurs to his neighbor, it is damnum absque injuria, for the rightful use of one's own land may cause damage to another without any legal wrong. 'It is established,' says Cotton, L. J., in West Cumberland Iron & Steel Co. v. Kenyon, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 788, 'that taking out mineral is a natural use of mining property, and that no adjoining proprietor can complain of the result of careful, proper mining operations.' In the same case Brett, L. J., says: 'The cases have decided that where that maxim (sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas) is applied to land and property, it is subject to a certain modification; it being necessary for the plaintiff to show not only that he has sustained damage, but that the defendant has caused it by going beyond what is necessary in order to enable him to have the natural use of his own land.' Page 787. . . . The right to mine coal is not a nuisance in itself. It is, as we have said, a right incident to ownership of coal property, and, when exercised in the ordinary manner, and with due care, the owner cannot be held for permitting the natural flow of mine water over his own land into the watercourse by means of which the natural drainage of the country is effected. . . . The defendants were engaged in a perfectly lawful business, in which they made large expenditures, and in which the interests of the entire community were concerned. They were at liberty to carry on that business in the ordinary way, and were not, while so doing, accountable for consequences which they could not control. As the mining operations went on, the water, by the mere force of gravity, ran out of the drifts, and found its way over the defendants' own land to the Meadow brook. It is clear that for the consequences of this flow which by the mere force of gravity naturally, and without any fault of the defendants, carried the water into the brook, and thence to the plaintiff's pond, there could be no responsibility as damages on the part of the defendants. . . . It is said the defendants created an artificial watercourse from their mine to Meadow brook; but this artificial watercourse was upon their own land, and conducted no more water than, by the natural conformation of the surface, could otherwise have reached it. If it be suggested that the defendants might have extended this artificial water way, in form of a sewer, to some point of safety, it may be asked where, short of the sea might the sewer be discharged that the same complaint might not be made? Nor do we say that a miner, in order that his mines may be made available, may enter upon his neighbor's lands, or inflict upon him any other immediate or direct injury; but we do say that in the operation of mining in the ordinary and usual manner he may, upon his own lands, lead the water which percolates into his mine into the streams which form the natural drainage of the basin in which the coal is situate, although the quantity as well as the quality of the water in the stream may thereby be affected."

The foregoing case of Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, and the reasoning of the court, seem to be closely in point with the case at bar. In both cases the owners cause water to rise from the earth, to become foul, and then to be carried by an artificial drain, and discharged into a running stream, the natural watercourse of the basin or valley in which the water rises, and into which stream the water would naturally flow if left to itself. In both cases the owners were engaged in a lawful and necessary work, of great advantage to mankind at large, and particularly to the community in which they operated; the one in mining out of the earth and distributing coal for heating and industrial uses, and the other also taking out of the earth mineral water for healing and curing the infirm. Both were free from fault or negligence in conducting their business, and in avoiding, so far as possible, all injury to others; the injury in each case being but the necessary incident of a lawful business. In each case there was no other place but the stream for the water to go, so that, if it were unlawful to discharge the water into the stream, then the enterprise itself of necessity would be at a standstill and, a lawful business thus come to an end because it could not be lawfully carried on. It would seem that the decisions show that when a business is dangerous, unhealthful, or otherwise greatly injurious to a community or to an individual, and it is possible to avoid the injury by a more careful management, or even, if necessary, by a removal of the works, to a more secluded or less objectionable place, then the owners of the noxious business will be mulcted in damages, and, if necessary, restrained by the courts. We have seen that in the case of Parker v. Larsen, supra, when it appeared that the defendant could flow water from his artesian wells over his fields without injury to his neighbor, but did not do so, he was enjoined. In the case of Indianapolis Water Co. v. American Strawboard Co. 58 Fed. Rep. 970, where there was a discharge of refuse matter from a strawboard factory into a nonnavigable river used by a water company as a source of supply for furnishing a city with water for domestic and other purposes, it was held that injunction would lie to restrain such pollution of the water supply. In Kinnaird v. Standard Oil Co. 89 Ky. 408, 7 L. R. A. 451, defendant had stored petroleum which leaked and percolated through the ground until it reached plaintiff's spring of water. Ottawa Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Graham, 28 Ill. 78, 81 Am. Dec. 263, was a similar case, the offensive substances percolating from the gas works into plaintiff's well. Also Pottstown Gas Co. v. Murphy, 39 Pa. 257. Either of two courses could have been followed by the offending defendants in these last three cases. They could improve their works so that the oils would not leak and percolate through the earth to the fouling of the water, or they could remove their works to another locality. Accordingly, damages were assessed in each case for the injury. So of various kinds of dangerous or offensive mills, factories, or other establishments or occupations. If they are conducted in such a manner as to materially and essentially injure adjoining proprietors, the owners may be subject to suits for damages, or, in case the injury is continuous, the business may be enjoined. But in this class of cases either a change in the method of conducting the business, so as to avoid the injury, or else a total removal of the works to another and safer locality, may be had. But the case before us does not belong to this class. Railroads must reach our cities and the marts of trade. They cannot do business elsewhere. Mines and mineral springs, natural gas and oil wells, cannot be removed. They must be operated where they are, or totally abandoned. Where, therefore, a work is lawful in itself, and cannot be carried on elsewhere than where nature located it, or where public necessity requires it to be, then those liable to receive injury from it have a right only to demand that it shall be conducted with all due care, so as to give as little annoyance as may be reasonably expected, and any injury that may result notwithstanding such care in the management of the work must be borne without compensation. It is then a case in which the interests and convenience of the individual must give way to the general good.

The demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer in this case admits the facts stated in the answer to be true. We have, then, to consider the statements of the answer as facts, and in the light of these facts examine whether the business of appellants is a lawful business, and whether it is carried on with due care, and so as to do no injury to appellee which can reasonably be avoided. From the answer, then, we learn that said artesian well was dug and its waters caused to flow upon appellants' said lands by an association of the citizens of Martinsville, with the assent and approval of appellee. That the waters from said well flowed into a stream, which, after running through said city, passed over the lands of appellee, and for more than a year so continued to flow, with the acquiescence of appellee. That the only means or way of escape of the water from said well is in and along said branch, which is the only natural outlet for the same; and that the increase of the flow of water in said stream was not materially increased by the water from said artesian well. That afterwards, by scientific analysis, and by the use of said water for drinking and bathing, it was discovered that the waters were of great medicinal value, and possessed of curative properties in the healing of persons afflicted with rheumatism, neuralgia, paralysis, kidney affections, and various other diseases; that thereupon, for the purpose of utilizing said waters in the cure of persons so sick and afflicted, appellants erected upon their said lots a bathhouse at a cost of $10,000, in which they have since continued to treat those affected as aforesaid, using said waters. It would seem from these statements that the business in which appellants are engaged is a lawful one. They sunk, or permitted to be sunk, on their own land, an artesian well. This they had a perfect right to do, and, in addition, it would appear that this work was done with the help of many citizens of the town, and with the acquiescence of appellee as well. Such help and acquiescence, however, were not necessary to make the act of sinking the well lawful. It appears that the stream into which the waters flowed naturally from the well is a spring branch, which passes directly through the city before it reaches either the land of appellants or that of appellee. This stream is not only the natural outlet for the drainage of said land, but is the only means or way of escape of said artesian water. But was it lawful to build a sanitarium for the cure of the sick or to bathe in the waters those afflicted with disease? It was certainly lawful to do so, provided the sanitarium is properly conducted and well managed, so as to do no injury to any person which reasonably and with due care can be avoided. This court has already said: "Hospitals and homes for the sick are very far from being nuisances per se. They are wise and beneficent charities, to be fostered and encouraged by liberal legislation, and not to be suppressed, or even discouraged, by what may seem to be harsh or restrictive laws." Bessontes v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189. But was due care exercised in the construction and management of the sanitarium and in the drainage of the waters therefrom? The answer states "that in erecting said bathhouse, and in using said waters for the healing of persons as aforesaid, and in all that appellants did in the use of said waters and the draining of the same away, appellants used all proper and possible care to avoid injury, damage, or inconvenience to appellee and all others, and only did such acts as were proper and necessary to be done in the use of said waters for the purposes aforesaid; that after erecting said bathhouse, appellants placed under ground a drain made of porous tile, to convey the surplus water from said artesian well under ground to the branch above appellee's land, because said branch was the only natural and only convenient outlet for said water." It would seem, therefore, that all due care has been exercised in the premises, and that the business is lawful, and that it is conducted in a lawful manner.

It is a question, also, whether appellee, having stood by and assented to and acquiesced in the expenditure of said sum of $10,000 in the erection of said bathhouse, is not now estopped from seeking to enjoin the continuation of its use. For over a year before this she had also acquiesced in the flowing of the artesian water into the stream, and now she could hardly be ignorant of the purpose for which the sanitarium was to be used. This court has held that, under certain circumstances, by remaining silent, and allowing acts to be done and expense to be incurred, persons may lose their remedy by injunction, and be compelled to assert their rights at law. Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind. 581, 49 Am. Rep. 109, and authorities there cited. In New Jersey it was held that if a person "has given his consent, either expressly or impliedly, to the erection of expensive works, he cannot afterwards enjoin their operation, though they prove more annoying or injurious than he anticipated." Hulme v. Shreve, 4 N. J. Eq. 116. We think the facts stated in the second paragraph of the answer sufficient.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the second paragraph of the answer, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on November 11, 1893, Howard, J., on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

Counsel for appellee earnestly refer us to the provisions of the statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 658), forbidding the reversal of a judgment when it shall appear to the court that the merits of the case have been fairly tried and determined, and contend that the judgment in this case should be allowed to stand, and so prevent further litigation. If, indeed, it should appear to the court that the merits of this case had been fairly tried and determined, it would be our duty to affirm the judgment; but, the trial court having sustained a demurrer to the affirmative matter set up in the answer, we are left unable to say whether appellants were harmed by the ruling. It is only when the allegations of a proper paragraph of pleading may be established by proof under other paragraphs that the sustaining of a demurrer to the paragraph in question will be held harmless. By its ruling on the demurrer in this instance, the court has said that the facts stated in the answer, even if true, would not constitute a good defense to the action. Under this ruling, also, the affirmative paragraph of the answer was, in effect, stricken out, and the appellants had no right to offer proof to sustain its allegations. "Nor," as said in Wilson v. Monticello, 85 Ind. 10, "would it be just to a defendant, who has put in a valid plea, to hunt through the evidence to ascertain whether he was or was not injured, for he is entitled to the benefit of the explicit admission made by the demurrer." See also Pennsylvania Co. v. Poor, 103 Ind. 558; Fleetwood v. Brown, 109 Ind. 567; Rush v. Thompson, 112 Ind. 158.

Counsel intimate, further, that it could be shown that the allegations made in the answer are not, in fact, true, and that appellants could have obtained an outlet by constructing a drain to another stream, and so have avoided injury to appellee. In answer to this, "it may be asked," as said in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 445, cited in the opinion, "where, short of the sea, might the sewer be discharged, that the same complaint might not be made?" However that may be, appellee is in no condition to make such contention against the answer. If the averments of the answer were believed to be untrue, they should have been replied to, and the truth of the matter alleged be thus put in issue, and determined. Gilmore v. McClure, 133 Ind. 571. Instead of this, however, appellee chose to demur to the answer, and thus to admit the truth of the facts therein pleaded. The facts alleged being thus admitted, the appellants ought to have judgment. We do not wish to be understood as holding that appellants were authorized, by artificial means, to conduct the waters from their spring into the stream upon appellee's land, unless the said waters would have naturally flowed into said stream without such artificial aid; and it was upon this interpretation of the answer that the opinion was written.

The petition for a rehearing is overruled.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Sybilla KRAUTER,

*Certain language was used upon the exchange of a horse. Held, under the circumstances, no evidence of a warranty against taking fright at a trolley car.

(June 12, 1894.)

NOTE.—As to implied warranty of fitness of property bought for special purposes, see note to McQuaid v. Ross (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 137, 24 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon an alleged warranty of a horse. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. S. Kalisch for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John A. Miller, for defendant in error:

The jury had left to them matters purely within their province. The intention is a question of fact for the jury. There was no error in refusing the nonsuit, nor in declining to direct a verdict for defendants.

As to effect of representing things sold to be "good," see note to Crane v. Elder (Kan.) 15 L. R. A. 705.

Chapman v. Murch, 19 Johns. 290, 10 Am. Dec. 227; Baldwin v. Shannon, 48 N. J. L. 596; Synear v. Wharton, 48 N. J. L. 97; Benjamin, Sales, § 613, and cases.

The intention of the person speaking or acting is for the jury to consider, and the test is, "whether the vendor assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the vendor has no especial knowledge, and on which the buyer may be expected also to have an opinion and to exercise his judgment. In the former case there is a warranty; in the latter not."

No particular form of words is necessary to make a warranty.

Oneida Mfg. Soc. v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. 440; Benjamin, Sales, p. 566, note K.

Garrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the warranty of a horse. The alleged breach was that the horse took fright at a trolley car that came up behind it. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The question before us is whether there was any evidence of a warranty of which the subsequent behavior of the horse was a breach. In other words, was there proof that the horse was warranted not to take fright in the manner in which he did? The trial court permitted the case to go to the jury with evident hesitancy. Upon a full consideration of the testimony, we think the verdict should have been for the defendant. The case presented is this: There had been transactions in horses between the parties for a number of years. Nine years previously the defendant had sold plaintiff a horse, and had agreed that if it did not suit it could be returned, and "he would try to make it right, and try to find a horse suitable." This horse appears to have been exchanged for another, and that in turn for the horse in suit, and upon each occasion the defendant said: "If it don't suit you bring it back."

With the second horse a receipt had been given in these words: "Said gray horse is sound and kind in single and double harness, and five years old." This was in July, 1891. The gray horse proved to be a kicker, and the plaintiff returned him to the defendant, whereupon the following conversation took place between the vendee and the vendor: "Mr. Meyer, here is your horse. I can't use it." "Why?" he said. I said: "Because he is a kicker. He done so and so." Meyer never said a word, but told one of the boys to take this horse away, and said, "Show him Frank" [the horse in suit]. Well, I went up to the stable, and he showed me that horse, Frank, and I said: "Frank? Well, if that horse is all right, hitch him up,—put him in the shafts." Mr. Meyer said: "This is your horse, exactly the horse you want; but it costs fifty dollars more." I said, "I won't pay any more." He said: "Well, that is all right, I don't want any more. If you are satisfied, take the horse home." The plaintiff's husband, who gave this testimony, also testified as follows in answer to the question: "Was there anything said about the sort of a horse he was, or the sort of a horse you wanted?" "There was nothing specified what the horse should do, and whether it should please. Mr. Meyer sold one nine years ago to my wife, and he knew she wanted a family horse, and . . . Mr. Meyer agreed that if this horse should not suit us, we could return it, and he would make it right, and try to find a horse suitable."

Giving to this testimony its extreme significance, it might cover vicious conduct, such as that shown by the horse that was brought back and was exchanged for the one in suit. But there is nothing capable of affording an indication that in the sale of any of the horses it was in the minds of the parties to exact or to give a guaranty that the animal should not be frightened by the spectacle of a car drawn without horses, as in the case of a trolley car. It is a matter of common knowledge that horses otherwise well broken and kind show signs of terror at the sight of a moving vehicle drawn by an invisible motor. The court will also take judicial notice of the fact that trolley lines had not superseded horse cars at the time the earliest of these sales were made. Whether they were in anything like general use in the city of Newark in 1891 does not appear from the testimony. As there was no express guaranty of any kind, the jury must find in the language used, and in the circumstances surrounding the last exchange of horses, a warranty broad enough or sufficiently special to cover the case of fright at the sight of a moving trolley car. This, from the considerations above mentioned, could not have been intended as to the earlier purchases, and, as the warranty of the last horse did not go beyond those previously given, there was no evidence from which the jury could find such an intention in the minds of the contracting parties.

As the action is on contract, and not for deceit, mere knowledge of the purpose for which the horse was wanted is without significance; and, in any event, it would be without force unless it was also shown that the vendor knew that the horse was unsuitable for the purpose for which he sold him.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

SUCCESSION OF Elizabeth BEY.

(48 La. Ann. —.)

*1. When the will is established to have been made by the testator himself, or by a notary at his instance and dictation, in presence and hearing of the subscribing witnesses, unaided by others, and its provisions and expressions are sage and judicious, containing nothing sounding to folly, these facts establish a presumption, even in the case of a person habitually insane, that it was made during the existence of a lucid interval, and impose on those who attack the will the burden of proving insanity at the moment when it was made.

2. Death of the testatrix, by suicide, does not raise a presumption of insanity at date the will was executed. Even when the suicidal act is unquestionably the effect of insanity, it does not necessarily follow that a will prepared within a short time previous is invalid.

(April 23, 1894.)

APPEAL by the testamentary executor of A Elizabeth Bey from an order of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans refusing probate to an instrument alleged to be the last will and testament of the said Elizabeth. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellant:

sumed, but must be affirmatively and contradictorily established.

Kingsbury v. Whitaker, 33 La. Ann. 1056, 36 Am. Rep. 278.

The presumption is always in favor of the act; insanity is never presumed.

Chandler v. Barrett, 21 La. Ann. 60, 99 Am. Dec. 701.

If a testament presents a series of wise and judicious dispositions the opus is upon the heirs who attack it to prove unsoundness of mind at the date of its execution.

Ibid.

When the will was made by the testator himself, unaided by others, and its provisions and expressions are sage and judicious containing nothing sounding to folly "it will be assumed, even in case of a person habitually insane, that it was made in a lucid interval; and the burden of proof will be upon those who attack it, to show insanity at the moment when it was made.

Kingsbury v. Whitaker, supra.

The test of the law upon this subject is, whether at the moment of making the will the testator was of sufficiently sound mind to fully understand the nature of the testamentary act and appreciate its effects.

Ibid.

Suicide committed by the testator soon after making his will is not conclusive evidence of his insanity.

Brooks v. Barrett, 7 Pick. 194.

The law draws no inference against the sanity of a person from the mere fact of suicide.

NOTE.—Suicide as evidence of testamentary incapacity.

The authorities are uniformly in accord with the above case in holding that suicide alone is not sufficient to invalidate a will although it was made only a short time prior to the suicide.

Suicide soon after making the will is not conclusive evidence of insanity. Brooks v. Barrett, 7 Pick. 94.

If there was no evidence of derangement at the time the will was executed, the mere fact of committing suicide a few days afterwards will not invalidate it. Burrows v. Burrows, 1 Hag. Eccl. Rep. 109.

In Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415, the will of one who just before the execution of it was shown to have been acting under an illusion and who committed suicide was upheld on the ground that at the time the will was executed he was of sane mind.

In the case of Dalley's Goods, 2 Swab. & T. 154, 31 L. J. P. 173, 4 L. T. N. S. 477, 7 Jur. N. S. 712, it appears from the argument that suicide will forfeit the goods of decedent to the crown, and some of the older text-writers are referred to, showing conflicting opinions as to the effect upon the will, but that case in accordance with the majority opinion of the text-writers holds that the will is valid,—at least so far as the appointment of the executor is concerned, and that he will be entitled to probate.

Some of the cases, however, seem to give the fact of suicide considerable probative force in determining insanity. Thus it has been said that—itself as evidence of insanity, but it cannot be denied that in most cases it is committed in moments of mental aberration, and is an act which nothing less can otherwise justify. Godden v. Burke, 35 La. Ann. 160.

The fact of suicide may be shown in evidence on the question of disposing mind. Pettitt v. Pettitt, 4 Humph. 191.

In Frary v. Gusha, 59 Vt. 257, in considering the admissibility of evidence of an expert as to what was intimated by suicide, the court says: "While it has been generally held that the fact that one committed suicide is not conclusive evidence of insanity, it has as generally been held that it was evidence tending to show insanity."

In Re Card's Will, 28 N. Y. S. R. 523, it is held that suicide may suggest insanity, but the suggestion is greatly enfeebled where the man has reached old age and has no resources of enjoyment and has many trials, and where his will is not unnatural but shows that he understood what he was doing.

Self-destruction is but a fact, together with all the other facts in the case from which the court and jury are to determine the testamentary capacity of the testator, not at the time of committing the suicide but at the time of making the will. Mo-Elwee v. Ferguson, 43 Md. 479.

The law makes no inference from suicide. It stands as a fact, together with all the other acts of the decedent's life, together with his character, situation, habits, thoughts, purposes, principles, and affections, as far as these are made known to the jury, from which they are to determine whether or not the decedent, not merely at the time of committing the suicide, but at the time of mak-

Where general insanity, even with some intervals, is shown, the burden of showing that the particular act in dispute was made during such an interval, is thrown on the party who supposes the validity of the act or contract.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1788, § 9.

A lucid interval, under the civil law, is not an apparent tranquillity or a seeming repose. It is not a simple diminution or a remission of the disease, but a temporary cure.

Aubert v. Aubert, 6 La. Ann. 108.

The law recognizes two classes of insane persons—one called furiosos, the other mente captos; the latter class do not enjoy lucid intervals.

Ibid.

Melancholia is classed as mente captos.

Only in cases of furiosos or where acts of insanity are rare and intermittent, will apparent wisdom of the testament necessitate proof that decedent was sane at moments of its completion.

Chandler v. Barrett, 21 La. Ann. 58, 97 Am. Dec. 701.

The decision in Kingsbury v. Whitaker, 32 La. Ann. 1057, 36 Am. Rep. 278, must be read in the light of the facts therein involved, which explain the expressions therein and give a different effect thereto, than when read by itself.

Mr. Frank Zengel for absent heirs.

ing the will, was of insane mind. Duffeld v. Robeson, 2 Harr. (Del.) 883.

And evidence which might not of itself be sufficient to show insanity may become sufficient when coupled with the fact that deceased committed suicide.

Thus where a man was laboring under an insane delusion as to the infidelity of his wife, because of which he shot her and then committed suicide, the court held that there was evidence of his insanity, not only at the time of his death but at the time his will was made, and they set it aside. Burkhart v. Gladish, 123 Ind. 337.

In accord with the above decisions is McAdam v. Walker, 1 Dow. P. C. 143, in which a man declared his mistress to be his wife in the presence of some of his servants, and a short time afterwards committed suicide, and the question was as to his sanity at the time of the act which was alleged to have constituted the marriage, and it was held that he could not be declared to be insane from the mere fact that he committed suicide.

The weight of the fact of suicide as evidence of insanity has also been considered in cases where the question of testamentary capacity was not involved but the decisions being uniformly in accord upon the question such decisions may throw light upon the question and are therefore inserted here.

In several insurance cases the question has arisen and it has been held that the law does not presume that a person who takes his own life was insane at the time. Coffey v. Home L. Ins. Co. 3 Jones & S. 314; Weed v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 561, citing Grover, J., in McClure v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 24 L. R. A.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The legal and presumptive heirs of the deceased resist the probate of her last will, on the ground that she was insane at the time of its execution, and incapable of making a legal and valid testament. The introduction of evidence took a wide range, and at the trial there was judgment in favor of opponents, annulling the will, as having been made by an insane person; and it decreed that, "by reason of her insanity," the testatrix died intestate. The testamentary executor propounded the will for probate, and had an inventory taken, but the probate of the will was resisted by the attorney for absent heirs, who had theretofore been appointed at the suggestion of the public administrator, who had undertaken the administration of the succession, as a vacant estate.

The theory of opponents seems to be that the testatrix was afflicted with that species of insanity known in medical jurisprudence as "melancholia," the effect of which was to render her incapable of transacting the business affairs of everyday life, and, consequently, of making a testamentary disposition; and the fact of her having committed suicide shortly subsequent to the execution of the will is referred to, and relied upon, by opponents, as confirmatory proof of her previous insanity. And it is asserted in the brief, as well as in the oral argument of appellant's counsel,—without denial from the other side,—that the judge below assigned the fact of her suicide as being a weighty, if not a conclusive, proof of her previous want of capacity to make a will. Counsel for the appellees made reference to the proceedings which were inaugurated for the interdiction of the deceased, shortly previous to the making of her will, as a circumstance corroborating her state of confirmed insanity of New York, 55 N. Y. 561, which case is not fully reported in the place cited. Terry v. Life Ins. Co. 1 Dill. 403.

The fact that an insured committed suicide is not of itself evidence of insanity. Merritt v. Cotton States L. Ins. Co. 55 Ga. 103.

And in Fowler v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 4 Lane. 203, the court refused to consider suicide proof of insanity.

In Rex v. Saloway, 3 Mod. 100, the coroner's inquest found one who had drowned himself in a pond non compos mentis, because it is more generally supposed a man in his senses will not be felo de se. A motion was made that the inquest be set aside, and the reporter's note says the coroner ought not to presume insanity from the fact of suicide.

In Rex v. Coronor de —, Comb. 2, in which a melius inquirendum was granted in a case in which the coronor had found a suicide non compos, the chief justice says: "It is a vulgar error that none of sane mind can be felo de se, and that whosoever kills himself must be non compos. For if he be compos as to other acts, that sole act shall not denominate him non compos."

In Hales v. Pett, Plowd. 261, it was determined that one killing himself commits murder.

And in another case upon a trial for murder the defense was insanity, and a desire, intention, and attempt to commit suicide before and at the time of the murder was shown, but the court said the desire to commit suicide did not always evidence insanity. Reg. v. Barton, 3 Cox, C. C. 275.

at that time. To these facts, or incidents, rather, in the life of the unfortunate young woman, all of the testimony on either side seems to have been directed, other evidence being merely corroborative. Arranging these three events in the order of their occurrence, we find from the record that the interdiction suit was filed on the 16th of August, 1893, the will was executed on the 1th of November, 1893, and the suicide occurred on or about the 3d of January, 1898. As it is evident that the test of the sanity of the testatrix at the time of making her will is of the greatest importance,—in fact, is the crucial question in the case,—the terms of the will, and the circumstances surrounding its execution, must be examined at the outset; this court having decided that the test of the law is whether, at the moment of making a will, the testator was of sufficiently sound mind to fully understand the nature of the testamentary act, and appreciate its effect. Kingsbury v. Whitaker, 32 La. Ann. 1055, 36 Am. Rep. 273. An examination of the will discloses that it was executed in the presence of F. D. Charbonnet, a notary public, and four witnesses, two of whom were practicing lawyers. It appears from the testimony, that on the 18th of November, 1893, during the business hours of the day, the deceased appeared at the notary's office pursuant to a previous agreement to that effect; and that, at the time and place agreed upon, said notary received her last will and testament, in the presence and hearing of the four witnesses, as dictated to him by said testatrix.

A fair synopsis of the testament is as follows, viz.: That the testatrix bequeathed to one of the legatees an improved city lot; to another, a sum of money that was to her credit in a designated homestead association, and a lot of household furniture, etc.; to another, certain shares of stock in the Mechanics' Mutual Insurance Company; to another, certain other shares of stock in the same company; to another, certain other shares of stock in the same company; to another, certain other shares of stock in the same company; to another, the family tomb in the St. Vincent de Paul cemetery; and, to another, the vaults in the Odd Fellows' Rest. It was concluded by appointing an executor without bond, denominating him "her good friend." The circumstances under which the testament was executed are detailed by the notary and subscribing witnesses. The notary states that the will was made at his office, during the business hours of the day, and in the immediate presence and hearing of the four witnesses who subscribed their names to the act. That same was executed by him in pursuance of a previous agreement with the testatrix. That, previous to the execution of the will, the deceased had called at his residence to see him, and, learning of his absence, she left with his wife a message for him, to the effect that she desired to see him about making a will. That, accordingly, he visited her, and they had a conversation upon the subject, and agreed upon the price. "She wanted," so the witness states, "the will to be made at her house. I told her what I would charge. She hesitated, and jewed me down. . . . She asked me if I could not do it any cheaper (naming a price); and I told her if she wanted it at that price to come to my office; and she came a day or two afterwards." This witness further states that, when the deceased came to his office, she stated that it was for the purpose of making her will, and the will "was dictated to [him] by Miss Bey's own lips." That "she appeared to be in a condition such as any ordinary person would that would come to make a will." That, when completed, the will was read to her in the presence and hearing of the witnesses, and she seemed to perfectly understand its provisions, and signed in his presence and that of the subscribing witnesses. That, after its completion, she handed to him the exact amount of the fee agreed on between them some days previously, without any discussion, or suggestion from any one. During the course of the notary's examination, the following occurred with relation to his visit to the residence of the testatrix, viz.: "Q. But you afterwards went to her house? A. Yes. Q. Did she seem to thoroughly understand the object of your visit? A. I asked her if she sent for me; and she said 'Yes.' Q. Did she tell you she wanted a will made? A. Yes." And, with reference to her visit to his office, he said: "Q. If there had been the slightest doubt in your mind as to her sanity, would you have made the will? A. No, sir; I would not. Q. You have known this lady, how long? A. I have known her a long time. I lived in the neighborhood for some time." In speaking of the deceased as she appeared on the occasion of his visit to her, and on that of her visit to his office, he says she was well dressed, and made a nice appearance. Again, he says, in speaking of what transpired at the time the will was executed, the following occurred, viz.: "Q. Did she have any hesitation in declaring her intentions to make a will before you? A. None at all. Q. Did any one help her or aid her in making the disposition? A. No; I would not have written what I did, if anybody had. . . . Q. Did Miss Bey have any papers or memorandum from which she read when dictating the will? A. I never saw any. Q. When you read [the will] aloud to her, and to the witnesses, did she have any paper before her to [enable her] follow the reading? A. I never noticed any." The testimony of this witness is entirely supported, and confirmed throughout, by that of the four subscribing witnesses, they being interrogated and cross-interrogated at length. The testament, dictated as it was by the testatrix, bears internal evidence of judgment, forethought, and careful preparation, as well as accurate knowledge of her property, and the means she possessed at the time of its confection, as well as perfect acquaintance and familiarity with the different persons who are mentioned as legatees. Not only so, but it evidences a sentiment of affectionate interest in, and concern for, the persons she considered her special friends; and she seems to have apportioned her bounty relatively to their nearness to her. And in the dispositions of her will, taken as a whole, she seems to have exercised reasonable care for the mutual interests of all, without making any unreasonable or unusual bequest to any. The only thing preferred against it is that the testatrix instituted friends, instead of collateral relations, as her heirs. But in the light of the law, she had a recognized right to thus dispose of her property; and her collateral relations resided abroad, and were unknown to her,—no intimacy, or even acquaintance, seeming to have ever existed between them during her lifetime. Certainly, this testament possesses no internal evidence of the insanity of the testatrix at the date of its execution; and the circumstances detailed by the notary and subscribing witnesses negative that idea.

With regard to the interdiction proceedings that were instituted in August, previous to the making of the will in November, nothing need be said beyond the fact that they were but the culmination of a sentiment that prevailed in the community in which she lived, during some months previous, to the effect that she was insane; and the further fact, that they were discontinued, voluntarily, ten days before the will was made, by the parties who inaugurated them, without the assignment of any reason or excuse. Of themselves, they cannot furnish any evidence of insanity, as they did not result in a judgment of interdiction. The person in whose name the interdiction suit was brought states that he had known the deceased for a long time; and that during her father's lifetime she was "a very sensible, fine young lady." He says, "She was of good, sound mind before [he] saw her at Mrs. Roper's." His testimony is that her father died in February or March, 1891, and soon afterwards she removed to the house of one Dr. Keltz, on an invitation of the latter, carrying all of her furniture, clothing, and effects. Another witness states that the deceased was removed from the residence of Dr. Keltz to her own on the 2d of June, 1892, more than two months previous to the institution of the interdiction suit; and, inasmuch as most of the evidence appertaining to her insanity relates to the period of time she resided in Dr. Keltz's house, it is well to look into the circumstances of her arrival at, and her departure from, his house—a period of something more than one year. The witness last referred to states that she had known the deceased about seven years previous to her death, and very intimately. That the deceased and her father lived in a tenement adjoining the one which witness and her husband occupied, there being only a partition wall between them. That, during the seven years of their acquaintance, the greatest intimacy existed between the two families. That she was present when the testatrix's father died, and she describes the death scene and surroundings graphically. That the deceased remained, alone, in her father's house about three weeks, when she moved to the house of Dr. Keltz to live. That, in speaking with witness on the subject, she said: "Well, Dr. Keltz says for me to break up housekeeping, and go to his house, and I will fall into grand society." That witness replied: "All right, Lizzie; just as you wish." That the deceased responded: "Well, I am going to try it; it may be better and it may be worse." Up to this date there is no suggestion of her insanity, the first intimation of it coming from Dr. Keltz, in May, after her installment in his house in March, though it remained undisclosed until the rumor had become flagrant in the neighborhood. About six months later she stated to Mrs. Roper that she wished she had broken her neck before she went to Dr. Keltz's house; making many serious complaints, and, among others, that she had been drugged by the doctor, and affirming "that she had not felt well since Dr. Keltz drugged her with those pellets." This lady, Mrs. Roper, states that the first she heard of Miss Bey's alleged insanity was through Mrs. Heitzman, in the spring of 1892. That, about that time, Miss Lizzie Bey sent for her to come to see her, and she went; but that she first met Dr. Keltz, who stated that Miss Bey was "going from bad to worse, was losing her mind." That, on afterwards meeting Miss Bey, she exclaimed: "O, Mrs. Roper, Mrs. Roper, I should have broken my neck the day I first put my foot in this house. . . . I have been taking those pellets; I have been taking too much of those morphine pellets." Soon after this occurrence, the rumor of Miss Bey's insanity was publicly discussed in the vicinity of Dr. Keltz's residence, and it created quite a sensation among the people of her acquaintance. Many people visited Dr. Keltz's house for the purpose of seeing the insane girl, without protest or objection on the part of any member of Dr. Keltz's family. On the contrary, these visits were apparently encouraged by them. A day or two after the occurrence above related, Dr. Keltz called Dr. Castellanos to see Miss Bey professionally; and he held a short interview with her, in the presence of a number of persons who seem to have been attracted there through curiosity, and afterwards gave it as his opinion that she was suffering from melancholia. The day following the interview, Mrs. Roper carried Miss Bey to her house to live, said removal being made at the instance of Dr. Keltz's wife. On the occasion of Miss Bey's removal from the house of Dr. Keltz, he stated to Mrs. Roper "that, if anything happens to her," she must let him know; qualifying the observation by the remark that she might die, or that she might have to be strapped down. All of this occurred in Miss Bey's presence. Dr. Keltz, as a witness, states that he had been the family physician of Miss Bey's father, and had known the family for several years prior to her coming to his house to live; but the first symptoms of insanity developed in May, 1891,—two months after her coming into his house to live. He speaks of having only seen her once after she was removed to Mrs. Roper's, and that was in October, 1892. In speaking of her capacity to make a will, he says: "The disease may have abated but I do not think she was ever after of sound mind." Notwithstanding the fact that Miss Bey was removed from his house on the 2d of June, 1892, and he had not seen her afterwards until October, Dr. Keltz admits that he had first suggested her interdiction, and that the suit was filed at his request in August. Though Dr. Seaman had seen Miss Bey, professionally, after her removal to Mrs. Roper's, and he testified, at the commencement of the trial of the interdiction suit, that she "had been subject to fits of melancholia" for six months previous, yet it is a fact that the interdiction suit was discontinued, at his suggestion mainly, ten days prior to the making of the will, and subsequent to the delivery of his testimony therein. But it does not appear that Dr. Seaman ever made a careful examination of Miss Bey with a view to making a test of her insanity; and hence the conclusion is that his opinion was based upon casual observation.

Dr. Szabary was called, and interrogated by opponents, as a medical expert on matters of insanity, and he testifies that he visited Miss Bey professionally during the time she was at Mrs. Roper's house, and he states that her disease was nervous prostration. He states that he visited her twice, and found no other sickness except emaciation and prostration. Those two visits were made on June 4 and 8, 1892, respectively; that is, immediately after her removal to the residence of Mrs. Roper on the 2d of June. The doctor states that he questioned her critically as to her condition, and that she answered him simply and satisfactorily, giving no evidences of insanity. The following interrogatories and answers will best discover the true situation, viz.: "Q. During the entire conversation, was there anything which she said that would lead you, as a medical man of standing and reputation, to think that she was out of her mind? A. No, sir. Q. Then, on the other hand, speaking affirmatively, as a medical man, was there, or was there not, sufficient evidence that she was an intelligent person? A. Yes. Q. A person of good common sense? A. Yes. Q. She spoke to you lucidly and plainly? A. She answered all my questions. Q. And answered them sensibly? A. Yes. . . . Q. Did she have the appearance that would indicate, in the slightest degree, that her mind was disordered or disarranged? A. None whatever. . . . Q. Are you prepared to say, doctor, that you made an examination of her mental condition, and that you are prepared to testify as to its condition at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. As an expert? A. Yes; as the physician in charge of the insane asylum, years ago, I can tell you something about it. . . . Q. If there had been, in your judgment, the slightest indication tending toward insanity in this woman, would you, or not, have noticed it? A. I would. Q. Would it not have come directly under the investigation you were then making? A. Yes. Q. Did you notice anything of the kind? A. There was nothing to be noticed tending to show that she was insane. Q. From her looks, demeanor, and general conduct, was she, or not, in your opinion, as an expert, capable of attending to her business, and attending to the ordinary affairs of life? A. She was." It is a noteworthy fact that this doctor was first called to see Miss Bey the day after she had been removed to Mrs. Roper's, and that Dr. Castellanos was called to see her the day previous to her departure from Dr. Keltz's residence; and, while their statements are diametrically opposed to each other in respect to the lady's mental condition on those two occasions, we are of opinion that the difference is mainly attributable to the radical change in her situation and surroundings, occasioned by her removal from Dr. Keltz's to Mrs. Roper's house. Under the circumstances detailed, we are disposed to attach greater importance to the testimony of Dr. Szabary than to that of either of the other medical experts, owing to his special fitness to testify in reference to insanity, and to his having made a most careful examination of the testatrix, and under more favorable conditions.

Outside of the isolated expressions of opinion by Drs. Seaman and Castellanos,—we do not include that of Dr. Keltz,—none of the opponents' leading witnesses testified to facts or circumstances which occurred subsequent to Dr. Szabary's examination of Miss Bey, though all of the executor's witnesses devote almost exclusive attention to such subsequent facts and circumstances. These witnesses state that they had known the deceased for ten or twenty years, and they concur in the opinion that she was not insane, while admitting that she did evince some idiosyncracies while she resided at Dr. Keltz's house. All of them join in the statement that she was generally right-minded and sensible while she lived with Mrs. Roper, and was at all times capable of attending to her own affairs; and it is in proof that she did attend to the payment of her taxes, the collection of her rents, and the management of her investments. And it is also in proof that, on the day the interdiction suit was fixed for trial she was present at the wedding ceremony of Mrs. Roper's son, and participated in the wedding feast. Even Dr. Keltz admitted that Miss Bey had given him promissory notes in liquidation of her board while at his house. A careful examination of the evidence, embracing the dates above given, has satisfied us that Miss Bey was, at the moment of making her will, of sufficiently sound mind to fully understand the nature of the testamentary act, and appreciate its effects; whether the will was made during the existence of a lucid interval, or by a person of absolutely sound mind, it is comparatively unimportant to inquire. The theory of the medical experts favoring the insanity of the testatrix is that she was afflicted with melancholia, which in its nature is incurable, and not susceptible of lucid intervals. Such is the opinion of authors on medical jurisprudence, and it was likewise a precept of Justinian, which has been recognized in the jurisprudence of this court. Aubert v. Aubert, 6 La. Ann. 104. But it is our opinion, accepting this theory, that the evidence does not make a case against the testatrix of melancholia; but, conceding for the argument, that the evidence tends in that direction, the clear and indisputable proof of the will having been made at a time when the testatrix was perfectly rational and apparently sane contradicts it, and renders it an unacceptable theory, or proves her sanity altogether. Our code recognizes the validity of a will made by an insane person during the existence of a lucid interval. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1788, § 9.

The rule in reference to the power and strength of mind necessary to make a will is well stated in Chandler v. Barrett, 21 La. Ann. 58, 99 Am. Dec. 701, thus: "So far as the latter is concerned [the amount of intellect required in a testator], a will may well be made by any mind which has the soundness and strength necessary to endure the conflict involved in the making of a bargain. It would be unreasonable to require that a testator should have more mental vigor and a more lucid memory than a person who makes a contract." The court states the French jurisprudence to be the same as our own, or, rather, that our jurisprudence has followed the treatises of the French commentators; the rule being that, if the testament presents a series of wise and judicious dispositions, it is for the heirs who attack it to prove the unsoundness of mind at the date of the testament; if, on the contrary, it contains dispositions such as would cause insanity to be presumed, it is for the legatee to prove the sanity of the testator, as against the terms of the testament. Coin, Delisle, Don. & Test. p. 82. The legal presumption is always in favor of the sanity of the testator. 3 Droit, C. C. p. 44; 8 Marcade, p. 403; 8 Dur. Dr. Fr. p. 167. The presumption of sanity does not cease because the testator has experienced some transitory intellectual derangement at a time anterior to the testament. 2 Trop. Don. & Test. p. 56. The English jurisprudence is the same. Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415; Ray, Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, 272; 1 Jarman, Will's, p. 72; Fullack v. Allinson, 8 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 527; Halley v. Webster, 21 Me. 461; Clark v. Fisher, 1 Paige, 174, 2 L. ed. 605, 19 Am. Dec. 402; Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 380.

In the instant case, the circumstances that are recited and relied upon as indicating the mental unsoundness of the testatrix are not nearly so strong or so convincing as those recited in the Chandler Case, while those surrounding the testatrix at the time of making the will are very much the same. The opinion in the Chandler Case is thus concluded: "If the acts of insanity are rare, and occur at periods distant from each other and from the date of the testament, the testament, if not destitute of good sense, and betraying no folly on its face, will sustain itself [and] be presumed to have been the offspring of a healthy relation and a lucid memory." The will under consideration fulfills all of those requisites completely. The proven acts of folly occurred some months previous to the execution of the will. The will is sensible throughout, and was by the testatrix dictated to the notary, without any memorandum or suggestion from any one, and betrays no folly on its face. The extrinsic evidence of insanity of Bowditch, on which the court decided the case of Kingsbury v. Whitaker, 82 La. Ann. 1057, 36 Am. Rep. 278, was in our opinion much stronger than it is in this case against Miss Bey, and yet the judgment annulling the will of Bowditch was reversed, notwithstanding three of the most distinguished physicians of the city of New Orleans testified that the testator was insane, and the Boston physicians testified in the same tenor, and Bowditch had been regularly interdicted by a judgment of court, and he was incarcerated in the asylum. The court said: "When physicians tell us that Bowditch must have been insane on the 24th of June, 1876 [the date on which the will was executed], we turn to the will, written entirely by himself, as shown by the testimony of two witnesses of unimpeached character and veracity, who saw and conversed with him on that day and at that moment, to whom he spoke very rationally of his will, and we must conclude that the physicians were mistaken," etc. The will of Miss Bey contained more convincing proof of her sanity, and the notary and four subscribing witnesses testify, most circumstantially, to its dictation by her in a manner clearly indicative of her sanity. In the Kingsbury Case the rule of interpretation, as formulated from the consensus of opinion on the subject, is thus stated: "The real question is whether the brain or other physical organ, whatever it may be, which is the medium through which the action of the mind is manifested, is so diseased or impaired as to make it an untrustworthy vehicle for the conveyance of the true wish or will of the testator, unbiassed by any delusion which may be the result of disease. The law fixes the time for the application of this test at the moment when the will is made, and expressly recognizes the capacity of persons subject at times even to complete dementia to make a will in lucid intervals. When the will is established to have been made by the testator himself, unaided by others, and when its provisions and expressions are sage and judicious, containing nothing sounding to folly, the facts establish a presumption, even in the case of a person habitually insane, that it was made during the existence of a lucid interval, and imposes on those who attack the will the burden of proving insanity, at the moment it was made." This rule is more accurately stated than the one formulated in the Chandler Case, and we prefer to follow it. But the will of Miss Bey sustains all the requirements of this rule, as well as of the former; for, in our view, her will is good and valid, whether it be interpreted by intrinsic or extrinsic evidence. But if we go further, and look into the evidence surrounding the suicide of the testatrix, it is impossible to conclude that, even if she were confessedly insane at the time, it evidenced her previous insanity at the time of making her will.

The following is the full text of the letter that was found on the person of the deceased after her death, viz.: "New Orleans, Jan. 3d, 1893. Dear Friends: I wish to inform you that I am tired of living, so concluded to take my life. Dr. Keitz and Dr. Castellanos said that I was insane, and going from bad to worst, that I would not live longer than two or three days after they took me out of his house to Mrs. Roper's they would have to strap me down; it is going on to eight months and have not been strapped yet, and am no more insane than he is. When dead I ask of Dr. Seaman, the Corner, to examine my brain and let the public know what he said about me. I am not sick, and not well; I do not know what ails me; he must have drugged or got some one to harm me, for it is not natural what I have; I cannot live any longer, for I am in misery and cannot help myself. I have my will made some months ago to my friends with the exception of ten shares of stock of the Mutual Ins. Co., to pay my funeral expenses, by my adopted brother Henry Schippmann who is my testator, if there is any left to keep it and give Margaret $50.00. It is hard for me to take my own life, but I hope God and my friends will forgive me, for I could not live longer, there is not another person in this City that is like I am, the party who did that to me

I hope will have no luck and follow me soon. When my body is found let Mrs. Roper be notified, and let Mr. Duprees, the Undertaker, bury me. Mrs. Roper's address is 675 North Rampart Street. Yours, truly Elizabeth Bey." This letter evidences care and thought; and it corresponds throughout with the whole pitiful story that is detailed by other witnesses. It evinces an exact memory of former transactions, especially the occurrence of the 2d of June, 1892, when, in the presence of a number of persons, she was examined by Dr. Castellanos; and of the 8d of June, when she was removed to Mrs. Roper's house. Its reference to her will is quite significant indeed; and the exactness of her recollection as to the reservation of certain shares of insurance stock for the purpose of defraying the expenses of her funeral is even more remarkable for its tenacity. Instead of this letter, dated on January 8, 1893, proving her insanity, it furnishes additional evidence of the sanity of the deceased.

Dr. Ray makes the following observations on the question of the suicide of a testator as affecting the validity of his will, on the theory that suicide raised a presumption of insanity: "At present," says that author, "the fact of suicide has no other importance than what it derives from its connection with the mental derangement which must be supposed to have given rise to it. Courts would very justly refuse to consider it as sufficient proof of insanity, in the absence of other proofs, because it might have been the act of a rational mind, and because, too, if it really had sprung from insanity, the delusion had been so circumscribed as not to have prevented the judgment in regard to testamentary dispositions and other civil acts. The principle adopted in the ecclesiastical courts is that in case of doubtful sanity, among which those of suicide must always be ranged, the validity of the individual's testament must be determined solely by the character of the instrument itself." (Our italics.) "Here is a difficulty that courts will never be very anxious to encounter, and that is to determine the exact connection of suicide with insanity in point of time, supposing the latter to be admitted. When this act is the only proof we have of mental derangement, we are left without the means of ascertaining where this connection began to exist or to disappear; and, consequently, nothing can be more difficult than to decide within what time, either before or after the suicidal attempt, the individual can be pronounced insane. It not uncommonly happens that a person kills himself, or makes the attempt, shortly after making his will, when the question requires judicial decision whether or not the insanity which led to the fatal act existed at the time of making the will. The practice has usually been, if there were no other evidence of unsound mind, either in his conduct, in his conversation, or in the testamentary dispositions themselves, not to impeach the testator's sanity. In a certain case it was said by Sir John Nicholl that when there was no evidence of insanity at the time of giving instructions for a will, the commission of suicide three days afterwards did not invalidate the will by raising an inference of previous derangement." Burrows v. Burrows, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 109, Chief Justice Parker, also, held that suicide committed "fifteen days after the date of the person's will was not sufficient, in the absence of other evidence, to prove him insane, and thus invalidate the will on account of the difficulty just mentioned." Brooks v. Barrett, 7 Pick. 94. "Similar views prevailed in Duffield v. Robeson, 2 Harr. (Del.) 383; Chambers v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 415. In both of those cases, suicide occurred the next day after the execution of the will; and, in the latter, delusions were proved to exist on the three [days] next previous to the will." Ray, Jurisprudence of Insanity, p. 448, § 460. In the Brooks Case, the court maintained the principle that, "if the evidence be doubtful the presumption of the law in favor of sanity is to have its effect." Dr. Ray lays down the general proposition that, even when the suicidal act is unquestionably the effect of insanity, it does not necessarily follow that a will prepared within a short time of it is invalid,"—that is to say, if the will be reasonable. Ray, Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, p. 449, § 461. "If the will be a rational act, rationally done, a suicidal act, or attempt, ought not to invalidate it, because the presumption is either that the will was made before the mind became impaired, or that the derangement was of a kind that did not prevent the judgment from using ordinary discretion in the final disposition of property." Id. p. 450, § 452. Other authorities and text-writers might be cited with advantage, but we prefer to rest our conclusions on this branch of the case upon the opinion of Dr. Ray, on account of his exceptionally concise and correct conclusions of law, as well as on account of this court having, in other cases, cited his works with approval. On this branch of the subject, as on the one previously argued, our conclusion is clear to the effect that even conceding for the argument that Miss Bey was insane on the 8d of January, 1893, when she penned the letter that was afterwards found on her person, after her death by suicide, there is nothing to show any causal connection between the act of suicide and the circumstances surrounding the execution of her last will. Altogether, our conclusion is that on the 18th day of November, 1892, when Elizabeth Bey executed her will, she was of sufficiently sound mind to fully understand the nature of the testamentary act she executed, and appreciated its effects, and that, consequently, her will is good and valid. Hence, the judgment appealed from must be annulled and reversed.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed; and it is now ordered and decreed that the will of Elizabeth Bey, which was executed on the 18th of November, 1892, be declared legal and valid, and entitled to probate and registry. And it is further ordered and decreed that the aforesaid last will and testament of Elizabeth Bey, deceased, be and the same is ordered to be probated, registered, and executed; and that opponents pay all costs of both courts.

Regulations and ordinances as affecting contracts.

Ordinarily, the relation of a licensee to a market stall with the city is not that created by ordinary contracts, and the party cannot claim the premium back which he has paid for a stall where the market house was torn down some years thereafter. Woolpper v. Philadelphia, 38 Pa. 203.

Nor can he claim that his permits cover spaces in a new market house. People v. Meyer, 24 N. Y. S. R. 968.

Nor is he entitled to damages in condemnation of the market house. Strickland v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 21 L. R. A. 224, 154 Pa. 348.

And a market license is not a contract against competition. Peck v. Austin, 22 Tex. 261; Jacobs v. Levy, 27 La. Ann. 619; Rosa v. New Orleans, 1 La. 126; Newson v. Galveston, 7 L. R. A. 797, 76 Tex. 559.

And the license is no guarantee that it will be continued. Newson v. Galveston, supra.

And a tenant of a market is subject to the exercise by the council of the power to remove the market. Petz v. Detroit, 95 Mich. 169; Cougot v. New Orleans, 16 La. Ann. 21; Gall v. Cincinnati, 18 Ohio St. 563.

And it was said in Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 9 L. R. A. 69, 26 Fla. 163, that a legislature may confer the power to establish or change a market.

And for good cause under the power vested in the city council of Charleston, it may revoke a stall license. Charleston v. Goldsmith, 2 Speers, L. 423.

And a party who has a license is not deprived of his property without due process of law by an ordinance forbidding private markets within certain limits, as he is not denied the right to sell meat only at a particular place. Newson v. Galveston, 7 L. R. A. 797, 76 Tex. 559.

Possession of a stall under an invalid contract with the market master is not that of a trespasser. San Antonio v. Royal (Tex.) June 16, 1891.

And an ordinance providing for ejectment of a party occupying a stall without the consent of the collector does not apply to a party who obtains possession under a former collector. Douat v. Beombay, 15 La. Ann. 377.

A city cannot recover on an implied contract for use and occupation from one who sells without a license, where there are no stalls for the wholesale market, nor portions of space defined under an ordinance requiring produce dealers to pay a license fee of fifty dollars. Baltimore v. Grievs, 20 Wash. L. Rep. 608. See Newport v. Saunders, 3 Barn. & Ad. 411, infra.

A permit to occupy a market stall does not constitute property right. Barry v. Kennedy, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 421.

4. The city ordinance regulating the markets must give free access to the markets, and afford proper facilities to persons who desire to sell goods which the ordinance requires to be exposed for sale there. The ordinance must be impartial, making no discriminations, and creating no monopolies, and offering no serious impediments to trade.

may be confined to producers. Hughes v. Farmers' Asso. 1 Phila. 338.

A city authorized by its charter may grant exclusive privileges to a party erecting a market house with a right to lease stalls. Palcatine v. Barnes, 50 Tex. 538.

But a charter authorizing a corporation to sell milk does not grant the privilege of violating a city ordinance against the sale of milk without a license. People v. Mulholland, 82 N. Y. 324, 37 Am. Rep. 563.

Market regulation and rules.

A city may under the power to regulate markets, adopt such regulations as are necessary for the preservation of public health and conducive to the public interest and use of house. State v. Garibaldi, 44 La. Ann. 809; State v. Leiber, 11 Iowa, 407; Philadelphia v. Davis, 6 Watts & S. 269.

And in Atlanta v. White, 33 Ga. 223, it was stated that the city controlling a market house could regulate by contract the use of it to certain hours, but that such regulation and prohibition would not be presumed in a criminal case.

Requiring license for sales in market.

City ordinances under their charters prohibiting sales in the market by non-producers without having obtained a license, have been generally sustained as valid. Re Nightingale, 11 Pick. 166; Com. v. Rice, 9 Met. 253.

And an ordinance requiring a small fee for stalls, is valid. Cincinnati v. Buckingham, 10 Ohio, 257.

So one prohibiting all butchers who are not licensed from cutting meat in public market is valid. Brooklyn v. Cleves, Hill & D. Supp. 231.

So an ordinance prohibiting produce wagons standing within the limits of the market at certain times without permission of the superintendent is valid. Com. v. Brooks, 109 Mass. 355.

But in Hughes v. Detroit, 4 L. R. A. 363, 75 Mich. 574, it was held that the prohibition of a sale except from stands and its confining of farmers to places where there was inadequate accommodation and virtually shutting out sales from market, was void. But subsequent to this case an ordinance which did not prohibit farmers and gardeners from selling their produce through the city but was intended only to prevent such wagons standing until such produce was sold, was held to be a reasonable restriction and within the power given in the charter to prohibit and prevent incumbering or obstructing of the streets. People v. Keir, 78 Mich. 93.

Where the charter prohibits the city council from assessing any charge upon persons bringing provisions to the market in wagons, but allows the prevention of huckstering and forestalling, an ordinance cannot include persons as hucksters who are not within the ordinary meaning of that term. Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 238.

McEnery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were convicted and fined for to five dollars for every hour that a person may keep his wagon in the market without a license, may exceed twenty dollars and is therefore void. Com. v. Wilkins, 121 Mass. 356.

Licenses for streets.

Generally all ordinances prohibiting sales upon the streets are strictly construed, and unless clearly authorized by the charter, will be held void as in restraint of trade or unreasonable. Barling v. West, 20 Wis. 307, 9 Am. Rep. 576; Chaddock v. Day, 4 L. R. A. 309, 75 Mich. 537; St. Paul v. Traeger, 25 Minn. 243, 33 Am. Rep. 422; Milton v. Hoagland, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 238.

And under an ordinance providing that no person shall keep, leave, or deposit truck carts, wagons, or carriages on a street, a push-cart peddler who is licensed cannot be convicted under such ordinance, although he remained with his cart for over half an hour at one place selling his wares. State v. Ravantis (Minn.) Oct. 24, 1893.

Under the authority to prohibit sales of vegetables and produce during market hours, a city has no power to prohibit the sale of vegetables and farm products, except by licensed vendors. State v. St. Paul Municipal Ct. 32 Minn. 329.

A city may be enjoined for maintaining a market or taking pay therefor in front of private property on the street. McDonald v. Newark, 42 N. J. Eq. 126.

But a city may be authorized to pass an ordinance prohibiting sales at auction upon the streets, alleys, and sidewalks and public grounds of the city. White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550.

Licenses for shops.

Ordinarily cities have the power to regulate meat shops, and other similar businesses by rules and regulations and requiring a license therefor, and such ordinances are generally valid. New Orleans v. Dubarry, 33 La. Ann. 451, 30 Am. Rep. 273; Atkins v. Phillips, 10 L. R. A. 158, 26 Fla. 281; Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359; St. Paul v. Colter, 12 Minn. 41, 90 Am. Dec. 278; St. Louis v. Spiegel, 8 Mo. App. 478; State v. Dubarry, 46 La. Ann. 33; St. Johnsbury v. Thompson, 59 Vt. 300, 59 Am. Rep. 731.

And a license was required to be obtained by the butchers from the clerk of the county court and the penalty, a double tax collected by distress, was sustained. State v. Manz, 6 Coldw. 557.

And a butcher who carried on business in the market, but who went out in the country to purchase his cattle, was required to take out a license. Sledd v. Com. 19 Gratt. 818.

But an ordinance requiring a license and in addition that the party shall give a good bond, providing that he will keep a record of sales for the inspection of the police, was invalid as in restraint of trade, and in this case not authorized by any statute. Long v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 7 Lea, 134.

And an ordinance prohibiting the establishment violating sections 22, 26, 27, of City Ordinance 4155, Council Series, amended by Ordinance 4274, Council Series. They appealed, alleging the unconstitutionality and illegality of the ordinance. In detail the defense is that the provisions of said ordinance are oppressive, and contrary to the enlightened policy of the state, and, "inasmuch as section 27 aforesaid prohibits the sale of their vegetables in any other part of the market or vicinity, and during more than half the business portion of the day,—i. e. between the hours of seven o'clock A. M., and two o'clock P. M. in violation of the first and the two hundred and sixth articles of the state constitution;" that the said sections of the ordinance are arbitrary, and in

of a private meat, fish, or vegetable market, without permission of the city council is void, where it makes no provision for such permission. State v. Dubarry, 44 La. Ann. 1117; State v. Deffen, 45 La. Ann. 638.

And where the ordinance requires that no person should sell fresh meat at retail, without a license from the common council, at such rates as they should fix, and the discretion given to the council to grant or withhold a license was too sweeping, the ordinance was in restraint of public trade, unreasonable and void. St. Paul v. Laidler, 2 Minn. 190, 73 Am. Dec. 89.

And where an ordinance for the sale of fresh meat properly included the sale of game or fish, a subsequent ordinance, requiring a new license for the sale of such articles, was void. Vosse v. Memphis, 9 Lea, 294.

And one who complies with all the requirements of police and sanitary ordinances cannot be also required to produce a written consent of the majority of the property owners near a proposed private market. State v. Garibaldi, 44 La. Ann. 530.

Prohibition of sales except at market.

An ordinance prohibiting the keeping of a private market within six squares of the public market, where it is authorized by statute, is valid. State v. Natal, 30 La. Ann. 430, 41 La. Ann. 387; Natal v. Louisiana, 139 U. S. 631, 35 L. ed. 238; Gossigi v. New Orleans, 41 La. Ann. 522.

Six squares are computed by starting from around the far side of the street, around the public market, and walking six blocks, the nearest way. Vidalat v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 1121.

And a radius of six blocks is not measured in an air line, but by the usual route by which a person would walk. State v. Schmidt, 41 La. Ann. 27; State v. Barthe, Id. 46.

And the term "squares" is used in the usual way and includes the width of the street also. State v. Berard, 40 La. Ann. 172.

And the word "blocks" means the same as squares. State v. Deffen, 44 La. Ann. 164; State v. Natal, 42 La. Ann. 612.

And the legislature may grant the power to prohibit private markets between twelve squares of the public market. New Orleans v. Stafford, 27 La. Ann. 417, 21 Am. Rep. 568.

Ordinarily, an ordinance prohibiting the sale of meat, poultry, fish, game, and the like, except at a public market, will be sustained as reasonable and in the proper exercise of police power, where it is authorized by a statute or charter. Shelton v. Mobile, 30 Ala. 540, 68 Am. Dec. 143; Winnabow v. Smart, 11 Rich. L. 551; Newson v. Galveston, 7 L. R. A. 797, 76 Tex. 559; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 549; St. Louis v. Jackson, 26 Mo. 37; Ex parte Cantor, 21 Tex. App. 61, 57 Am. Rep. 609; Buffalo v. Webster, 10 Wend. 100; Brooklyn v. Cleva, Hill & D. Supp. 231; Bush v. Seabury, 8 Johns. 413; State restraint of trade, and in contravention of common as well as private rights; that the provisions of section 22, if they apply to defendants' calling, exclude them from the markets, in violation of their constitutional rights to sell their produce; that the sale of the defendants' vegetables is not a nuisance, and injurious to the public health; that the police force of the city and the market lessees are convinced of the illegality of the ordinance, and have not heretofore attempted to enforce it, and permit the sale of vegetables from gardener's carts at the market on the payment of 25 cents per day. Article 206 of the Constitution has no application to the case. Article 1 has reference to the origin of government from the people, and defines the legitimate objects of government, its legitimate end being "to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property." Its failure to protect the public health would be as great a violation of its "legitimate end" as to entirely depart from its object by the enactment of a law infringing upon the rights of the individual. We may assume, therefore, that the proper regulation of the market is a sanitary measure, being for the purpose of promoting the public health, and a legitimate exercise of the governmental power. In the exercise of this power the legislature has conferred ample and complete power on the city council to establish markets, and to provide for the cleanliness and salubrity of the city. In carrying out this conferred power, the city council has the power "to designate certain

Under an ordinance excepting farmers who sell meat produced on their own farms from a license, a butcher is not within the proviso who fattens sheep on his farm, only as an appendage to the butcher's shop. Homewood v. Wilmington, 5 Houst. (Del.) 123; Rochester v. Pettinger, 17 Wend. 265.

Generally the power given to establish public markets and confine the sale of commodities within the limits thereof, has been sustained where the same is reasonable and in consideration of public health. Ex parte Byrd, 84 Ala. 17; Henry v. Macon (Ga.) Feb. 12, 1893.

And where a green grocer had a license before a market place was established, he was required to comply with the market regulations, forbidding the sale and purchase of marketable articles during market hours. Bowling Green v. Carson, 10 Bush, 64.

But an ordinance prohibiting the sale of fresh meat outside of the market, and the keeping of a private market for such a purpose, was held unreasonable and void, as an ordinance must be reasonable and not create a monopoly. Bloomington v. Wahl, 46 Ill. 489.

And the grant to establish and keep up a market does not of itself give the power to prohibit persons from selling marketable articles elsewhere within market hours. Bethune v. Hughes, 28 Ga. 660, 73 Am. Dec. 749.

In Henry v. Macon, supra, the court in referring to Bethune v. Hughes, said, that the legislature knew that they could not confer authority to pass any ordinance which would be wholly prohibitory upon sales elsewhere than in the city market.

And a city ordinance cannot restrain a merchant from selling vegetables at his place of business outside of the market limits, under pretext of regulating markets, as this would be unreasonable and in restraint of trade. Caldwell v. Alton, 33 Ill. 416, 85 Am. Dec. 282.

An ordinance prohibiting dairies within certain limits, and giving the council the authority to grant permission, which is not general in its operation among the class it affects, is void. State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496.

An instruction that the city may prohibit the sale of fresh meat, except in market, yet if the jury believe the ordinance is in restraint of trade, and trade in fresh meat is not unlawful, then they should find the defendant not guilty, is contradictory and void. Peoria v. Calhoun, 29 Ill. 317.

These cases fully sustain the position taken in STATE v. SARRADAT, as to the power of the city 24 L. R. A. council to confine the sale of perishable goods and provisions to certain places and times, and require a license fee for use of market stall, or a license fee for shop.

Under the power to regulate and license a certain business the corporation cannot pass an ordinance which is in effect a revenue measure. Brooklyn v. Nodine, 28 Hun, 512; Kip v. Paterson, 26 N. J. L. 298; State v. Rowe, 72 Md. 548; Mestayer v. Corrige, 38 La. Ann. 707; State v. Blaser, 36 La. Ann. 363.

And a butcher is not liable to be taxed as a trader. State v. Yearby, 32 N. C. 551, 33 Am. Rep. 664.

Nor a manufacturer. Tippecanoe v. Boercher, 5 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 6.

Nor is a farmer liable to be taxed as a dealer where he sells some produce for a neighbor as his agent. Barton v. Morris, 10 Phila. 390.

But a grocer may also be compelled to take out a butcher's license. Eastman v. Jackson, 10 Lea, 162.

And a butcher may be required to take out a license tax on his carts and horses in the city, although he pays a property tax on the same in the county. Frummer v. Richmond, 31 Gratt. 646, 31 Am. Rep. 748.

And a butcher license tax is not invalid in classifying them as meat shop keepers. And in permitting them to deliver goods without further license. St. Louis v. Freivogel, 95 Mo. 532.

An act providing that it shall be lawful to make prudential by-laws, relative to public market and taverns, gin shops, and hucksters, does not authorize them to require a huckster's license, where it does not appear necessary, and is used as a means of crippling business. In this case he had paid an excise tax also. Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. 462.

Slaughtering.

The right of a city to prohibit the slaughtering of animals in the city limits and confine that business to certain districts, is generally conceded. Lowenstein v. Myers, 49 N. Y. S. R. 303; Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 32 Am. Dec. 196; Rock Island v. Huesing, 25 Ill. App. 600; Villavaso v. Barthol, 32 La. Ann. 247.

And the slaughter-house statute giving the exclusive privilege for twenty-five years to a company providing for accommodations for the public was sustained. Slaughter-House Cases, 33 U. S. 36, 21 L. ed. 394.

But a state cannot make a grant of this character that cannot be modified by a subsequent legislation. Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 748, 28 L. ed. 585.

The question of slaughtering animals more properly belongs to the topic "Nuisances."

In doing so they facilitate the people in the purchase of provisions of first necessity by confining the sale of them to particular places and hours of the day, and they facilitate the inspection of provisions; and by the hire of stalls they raise money to defray the expenses of building market houses, and pay the salaries of officers they appoint to prevent the sale of unsound provisions; and they have an undoubted right to prevent the violation of ordinances they may pass in establishing markets." *Morano v. ##### Market rights and disturbance.

The occupier of a stall in a market is liable to the owner of the market in an action of assumption, without proof of a contract. Newport v. Bauncera, 8 Barn. & Ad. 411. See also Baltimore v. Griever, 20 Wash. L. Rep. 13.

Where there is a market grant, an action will lie against others defrauding the owner of the profits of his market by erecting a rival market near. Mosley v. Chadwick, 7 Barn. & C. 47 note, 8 Dougl. 117.

Under a statute prohibiting a sale, except in a dwelling place or shop, the party was liable for keeping a place in which were sheds for the sale of cattle, in competition to a market. McHole v. Davies, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 50, 38 L. T. N. S. 501, 45 L. J. M. C. 80.

And a sale on a covered skittle ground is not excepted as though made in a dwelling house or shop. Hooper v. Kenshole, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 127, 46 L. J. M. C. 180, 36 L. T. N. S. 111, 26 Week. Rep. 368.

But a wooden shed attached to the house supported on wooden posts is within the proviso of such a statute. Ashworth v. Heyworth, L. R. 4 Q. B. 316, 38 L. J. M. C. 91, 20 L. T. N. S. 439, 17 Week. Rep. 662, 10 Best & S. 309.

And the shop need not be attached to the dwelling house of the party himself. Wiltshire v. Willett, 11 C. B. N. S. 240, 81 L. J. G. P. 8, 6 L. T. N. S. 355, 10 Week. Rep. 44.

The right to protect market privileges against disturbance may be acquired by prescription. Macclesfield v. Pedley, 4 Barn. & Ad. 397, 1 Nev. & M. 708; Mosley v. Walker, 7 Barn. & C. 40, 9 Dowl. & R. 463; Penryn v. Best, L. R. 3 Exch. Div. 282, 48 L. J. Exch. 103, 38 L. T. N. S. 805, 27 Week. Rep. 126; Pickards v. Bennett, 2 Dowl. & R. 389.

And the right obtained to hold a market by prescription, in certain places, in the manor, does not create a presumption that it was to be at those places only, but the presumption may exist that it was to be at any convenient place in the manor. De Rutzen v. Lloyd, 5 Ad. & El. 456, 6 Nev. & M. 778.

A lessee from a borough corporation of premises, with covenants of quiet enjoyment which he uses for the sale of cattle, is liable under the English Market and Fair Act of 1847, and the lease confers no right which the corporation could not interfere with by establishing a market. Spurling v. Bantoff [1891] 2 Q. B. 384, 60 L. J. Q. B. 745, 65 L. T. N. S. 564, 40 Week. Rep. 157, 50 J. P. 132, 17 Cox. C. C. 372.

In an action for disturbing market, a change of place does not forfeit plaintiff's rights. Dorchester v. Ennor, 30 L. J. Exch. 11, L. R. 4 Exch. 336; Rex v. Cotterill, 1 Barn. & Ald. 67.

A person having the right of a stall in front of his shop in the market may maintain an action for disturbance of this right by allowing another on market days near that place. Ellis v. Bridgnorth, 24 L. R. A.

15 C. B. N. S. 52, 38 L. J. C. P. 273, 9 Jur. N. S. 1073, 6 L. T. N. S. 668, 12 Week. Rep. 58.

A disturbance of a market may occur where a contract of sale is made upon a day other than that upon which the market was held. Exeter v. Heaman, 37 L. T. N. S. 534; London v. Low, 40 L. J. Q. B. 144, 42 L. T. N. S. 16, 28 Week. Rep. 250, 44 J. P. 169; Dorchester v. Ensor, supra; Elwes v. Payne, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 468, 48 L. J. Ch. 581, 41 L. T. N. S. 118, 28 Week. Rep. 234; Yarde v. Forde, 1 Lev. 206, 1 Mod. 60, 1 Vent. 93.

Where the accommodation is not inadequate, a rival market will be enjoined. Goldamid v. Great Eastern R. Co. 47 L. T. N. S. 727, affirmed L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 510, 53 L. J. Ch. 371, 32 Week. Rep. 841.

But in an action against a person selling out of the market it is a good defense that the accommodations are inadequate. Re Islington Market Bill, 3 Clark & F. 513; Prince v. Lewis, 5 Barn. & C. 363, 8 Dowl. & R. 121, 2 Car. & P. 68.

And where a corporation has the grant of a market privilege under 37 & 38 Vict., they were not entitled to exclude the public from the covered portions of the market during market hours and devote the building to other purposes. Edinburgh Magistrates v. Blackie, L. R. 12 H. L. Cas. 685.

The owner of a market may lose his right of action for disturbance of his market by lapse of time. Holcroft v. Heel, 1 Bos. & P. 400.

The mere selling in a private shop, not within the limits of a market place, marketable articles on market days, is not in point of law an injury to the market. Manchester v. Lyons, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 287, 47 L. T. N. S. 677; Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 Mees. & W. 18, 13 L. J. Exch. 32, 7 Jur. 1041.

And where a statute authorized preventing sales and purchases by those who live within the town, or within a mile of it, an attempt to prevent a purchase or sale by any one, is invalid. Snell v. Belleville, 30 U. C. Q. B. 61.

Tolls.

A claim of tolls for goods sold in the market is supported by evidence of a right to toll for goods brought into market and there sold. Mosley v. Pierson, 4 T. R. 104.

But a baker who lives outside the limits of a borough, who delivers bread to his customers in the borough from a car, three days in the week, is not liable for exposing for sale an article for which tolls may be taken. White v. Yeovil, 61 L. J. M. C. 213.

So, a hawkers of an article on which toll is not authorized to be taken, cannot be made liable under the act establishing a market. Caswell v. Cook, 11 C. B. N. S. 637, 81 L. J. M. C. 185.

The Prior of Dunstable's Case, 11 Hen. VI., Lib. 7, p. 19 A. is explained in the case of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 Mees. & W. 18, 13 L. J. Exch. 32, 7 Jur. 1041, to amount only to this, that a person shall not regulate the police management of the market places; to lease the same, not for the purpose of revenue alone, but in order to maintain the proper police of the markets; the building of market houses, and the repairs of the same; and for this purpose to authorize the lessee to charge a reasonable sum for stall and market room. Morano v. New Orleans, 2 La. 217.

The establishment of market places is for public convenience, as well as for the promotion of the cleanliness and health of the city. It is not a permit or license to sell particular articles there, and therefore no special license for selling at that particular place can be exacted. But this does not prohibit the payment for the use of stalls and market room or space, which is exacted for the purpose of keeping up the market places. The market places having for their double purpose the preservation of the public health and the general convenience of the public, all persons who resort to them for the sale of such articles as are required to be sold there must have access to them. The market regulations must be impartial, affording the same rights to all, avoiding the creation of monopolies in one or several persons, and the prohibition of trade in any article, or an undue restraint of trade. Parker & W. Public Health & Safety, par. 306; Dill. Mnn. Corp. § 380; Jacksonville v. Ledwith, 26 Fla. 163, 9 L. R. A. 69; State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 497. Section 23 of the ordinance prohibits the peddling of meats, fish, game, fowls, vegetables, and fruits in any of the public markets, or within six blocks of same. Section 26 gives the right to market wagons to back up to the banquettes along the markets, to deliver goods previously sold to occupants of stalls. It prohibits the owners of the wagons from selling their produce from said wagons between the hours of 7 A. M. and 2 P. M. No fees or dues are to be collected from said wagons. Section 27 prohibits the sale of any article on the sidewalk or the public walks in front or in the rear or around any of the markets. The offense of defendants was selling from their wagons while they were backed to the market banquette for the purpose of delivering goods sold to owners of stalls.

Under the terms of the law referred to above, we are unable to see where any of the rights of defendants were infringed. They were dealers in vegetables, which the ordinance required should be sold, if within market limtake the benefit of the lord's market and customers attending it and yet fraudulently deprive him of the tolls.

The grant of a fair "cum omnibus libertatibus et liberis consuetudinibus ad hujusmodi forum pertinentibus" does not give a right to take tolls. Egremont v. Saul, 6 Ad. & El. 924.

And an action of trover will lie against the party taking toll where it should have been taken by dipping with the hand, and toll was taken by sweeping with the hand so as to take more than the regular toll. Norman v. Bell, 2 Barn. & Ad. 190.

The owner of a market could not maintain an action for disturbance against a rival market, where the holder of the latter was not liable for tolls. Abergavenny Imp. Com. v. Straker, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 83, 58 L. J. Ch. 717, 60 L. T. N. S. 756, 88 Week. Rep. 156.

And a person who supplies milk to customers upon their doorsteps, in pursuance of a contract, is not liable for evading tolls, where there is no statute forbidding such sale. Quilligan v. Limerick Market, L. R. 14 Ir. Rep. 286.

Sales by sample.

A sale by sample of a tollable article has been held to be a disturbance of the market. London-derry v. McElhinney, 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 71.

And a person who left his sheep forty yards from the market, and then went to the market and brought his customers to his sheep, was liable in an action on the case by the lessee of the market. Bridgland v. Shapter, 5 Mees. & W. 375.

And in Tewkesbury v. Bricknell, 2 Taunt. 120, it was held that an action on the case may be maintained by a market corporation against a seller of corn by sample.

This was based on Moseley v. Pierson, 4 T. R. 104, a dictum: "If the plaintiff's demand had arisen on contract of sale by sample, he would have brought a different kind of action, an action for the fraud in not bringing the goods into the market."

But a sale by sample, on a market day, near the market, is not a disturbance unless done with the intent of evading toll. Brecon v. Edwards, 1 Jurist. & C. 51, 6 L. T. N. S. 293, 81 L. J. Exch. 368, 8 Jur. N. S. 461, 24 L. R. A.

Where a judgment was had for toll traverse, for the sale of forty-one quarters of corn, by two sacks pitched in the market, a new trial was granted, because it did not appear but that the sale was two sacks, and it might be inferred that the corn was at a distance. Vines v. Reading, 4 Bing. 8, 13 Moore. 201, 1 Younge & J. 4.

And an action on the case by the owners of market cannot be maintained against the purchaser of corn, alleging that he bought the corn in the market by sample. Tewkesbury v. Diston, 6 East, 438, 2 Smith, 508.

And a prescription of toll for goods sold by sample in the market and afterwards delivered cannot be maintained. Hill v. Smith, 4 Taunt. 520, 10 East, 476.

\ License and regulation.*

A by-law and regulation prescribing the places where fresh meat or other articles are sold and requiring a license for the sale of certain articles is valid. Pigeon v. Montreal Rec. Ct. 17 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; Snell v. Belleville, 30 U. C. Q. B. 81; Kelly v. Toronto, 23 U. C. Q. B. 425.

Where only licensed hawkers may sell at market or at their own houses, others who have no licenses are liable. Openshaw v. Oakeley, 60 L. T. N. S. 622, 53 J. P. 740, 18 Cox, C. C. 671.

And a by-law fixing the amount of licenses for hawkers is not void as repugnant to a previous by-law, providing that no license should be required from peddler of a small article that could be carried in a small basket. Vergo v. Toronto, 22 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 447.

But the by-laws regulating a market must not be so restrictive as to interfere with the frequenters of the same, or it will be void as in restraint of trade as a by-law forbidding throwing the skins of animals on the ground occupied by the market or on a cart on the market ground, without leave from the superintendent. Worthy v. Nottingham Local Board, 21 L. T. N. S. 582.

In the preparation of this note cases in regard to "Adulteration of food," "Inspection of food," "Nuisances," "Oleomargarine," and "Occupation and peddler's license,"—have been omitted, although some of the cases included incidentally touch upon the last-named subject. E. T.

its, within market hours. They were not excluded from the sale of their produce in the markets. They could have rented stalls or space, and disposed of their goods within the market inclosure. There was no monopoly created in favor of one or more persons by the prohibition of the sale of certain articles immediately on the banquettes and approaches to the markets. This regulation did not prevent their sale elsewhere, either in the market or beyond the market limits. The market ordinance is not oppressive, as it interferes with no right of the defendants. It is not partial, and does not operate against them exclusively, but is applicable to the vendors of articles or goods required to be sold within certain limits and within certain hours. The conflict about the deficiency of room for the numerous carts or wagons at the market has nothing to do with the case. There is no prosecution for obstructing the approaches to the market by defendants' carts.

The testimony which was rejected also has no place in determining the question at issue. It is immaterial whether the defendants for a long time were permitted by the market lessees and the police to sell from their wagons while backed to the market sidewalks, or that they were required to pay 25 cents for selling from their wagons. The ordinance does not require the payment of such a fee, and the evidence was irrelevant.

Because the defendants raised the produce which they sold, in violation of the ordinance, gave them no special privilege of exemption from its operation. The case of State v. Blaser, 36 La. Ann. 363, relied upon by defendants, presents a different state of facts, and different issues were involved, and it therefore is inapplicable here.

Judgment affirmed.

MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE CO.

(46 La. Ann.—)

- *1. In an action on a life policy, proofs of loss, stating suicide as the cause of death, are admissible, but not conclusive against the assured.
- *2. In such actions, when the defense is self-destruction, the burden of proof is on the insurer to establish the suicide; and when circumstantial evidence, only, is relied on, the defense fails, unless the circumstances exclude, with reasonable certainty, any hypothesis of death by accident, or by the act of another.
- *3. No such exclusion of any hypothesis save suicide can be predicated on the mere fact of the dead body of the person insured, found with a mortal wound from a gunshot, the discharged pistol wedged on the thumb, "as if thrust in forcibly," and there being other circumstances inconsistent with self-destruction.

*Headnotes by MILLER, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of defendant in a proceeding to enforce the payment of the amount alleged to be due under a policy of life insurance, the payment of which was resisted on the ground that decedent committed suicide. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. H. Leonard and Morris Marks, for appellant:

Where the dead body of an insured is found under such circumstances and with such injuries that death may have resulted from negligence, accident, homicide, or suicide, the presumption is against suicide as contrary to the general conduct of mankind and a gross moral turpitude.

The burden of proof is on an insurance company when it alleges that deceased committed suicide, and the evidence must exclude all other reasonable hypotheses. Circumstantial evidence which does not exclude all other reasonable hypotheses proves nothing.

The circumstances under which the dead body of the insured was found and the injuries thereon, as shown by the evidence in this cause, are such that death may have resulted from homicide or accident, and all the witnesses examined as experts on behalf of defendant company so concede and state on cross-examination.

The total absence of any evidence even tending to show any reason or cause for suicide, the total absence of any direct evidence tending to show suicide, and the evidence showing that insured was at the time of his death a prosperous merchant, of high standing financially and socially, whose relations with his wife and children were happy and affectionate, and whose mind was to all outward appearances free from anxiety or trouble, are facts inconsistent with the theory of suicide.

Inquests are not admissible as evidence of causes of death.

Messrs. Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellee:

Where, under a policy of insurance, which is a conditional contract of indemnity, proofs of loss must set up, specifically and categorically, the date, circumstances, and cause of death, etc., and proofs of loss are made in conformity with said contract, no suit will be allowed to be instituted, much less legally prosecuted, by attempting to show facts at the time the case is tried, and for the first time, which are substantially at variance with the proofs of loss furnished to the insurer.

Cook, L. Ins. § 119, and authorities there cited; Campbell v. Charter Oak Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 10 Allen, 218.

A policy of insurance with a clause in the contract to the effect that if the assured die by his own hand, sane or insane, and in case of death by suicide, the company agrees to pay the net reserve of the amount due on said policy, is reasonable and legal, and the courts will maintain said contracts.

Bigelow v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 98 U. S. 284, 23 L. ed. 918; Pierce v. Travelers L. Ins. Co. 84 Wis. 389; De Gogorea v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 65 N. Y. 237; Chapman v. Republic L. Ins. Co. 6 Bias. 238; Bois v. Massachusetts L. Ins. Co. Ct. App. for Parish of Orleans, Opinion No. 284.

On petition for rehearing.

The second clause in the policy is as follows:

"The company does not insure against self destruction in any form, whether insured be sane or insane, but in every such case will pay the legal net reserve on this policy at the time of death."

This clause has been uniformly upheld by all the courts of the country.

Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Daviess, 87 Ky. 551.

The proofs of death became as much a part of the petition as the policy itself; and if the proofs of death are to be ignored and the plaintiff given a judgment which she would not be entitled to if the proofs had not been executed then a case is made out different from the pleadings, and relief given to which the party is not only not entitled, but for which she did not ask.

Every admission upon which a party relies is to be taken as an entirety of the facts which make for his side, with the qualifications which limit, modify, or destroy its effect.

The preliminary proofs presented to an insurance company, in compliance with the condition of its policy of insurance, are admissible as prima facie evidence of the facts stated 24 L. R. A.

therein, against the insured and on behalf of the company.

Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 82, 23 L. ed. 793; Campbell v. Charter Oak Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 10 Allen, 218.

In setting aside the verdict of the jury, the court has in effect overruled the accepted and uniformly established practice of the ablest courts of the country.

According to Rice on Evidence, p. 791, juries are the judges of the value of evidence, and that able commentator cites a section of the California Code of Civil Procedure, which, according to him, is believed to embody the prevailing sentiment of the American judiciary as regards this subject.

We find there: "The jury, subject to the control of the court in the cases specified in this code, are the judges of the effect and value of evidence addressed to them, except when it is declared to be conclusive.

"That their power of judging of the effect of evidence is not arbitrary, but to be exercised with legal discretion and in subordination to the rules of evidence.

"That they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declaration of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds against a less number, or against a presumption, or other evidence satisfying their minds." Observe, a presumption satisfying their minds may be preferred to any number of witnesses.

"That evidence is to be estimated not only by its intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and of the other to contradict."

Where a case fairly depends upon the effect or weight of testimony, it should never be withdrawn from the jury unless the testimony be of such a conclusive character as to compel the court, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, to set aside a verdict rendered in opposition to it, and has declared it could not do so except by usurpation of the functions of the jury.

Rea v. Missouri, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 532, 21 L. ed. 707; Phenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. v. Doster, 106 U. S. 30, 27 L. ed. 65; and other authorities cited in Rice on Evidence, p. 800.

The proof in cases of this kind must almost necessarily be established by circumstantial evidence. The suicidal act is one ordinarily committed secretly, and to prove it resort must be had to circumstantial evidence.

The question of suicide in this case, being one of inference, the court should not disturb the verdict of the jury.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant on the life of her husband. The defense is, the husband committed suicide, and the policy excludes liability in cases of self destruction, sane or insane. The jury found for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the verdict.

The proof of loss furnished the company, i. e. statements of the undertaker, physicians, agent, and friend, as well as the coronor's inquest, stated suicide as the cause of death. The defendant, offering these proofs, insisted plaintiff was bound by them; that is, defendant objected to any testimony contradicting these proofs. The court admitted the testimony. It is to be observed, at the outset, the cause of death, in this case, is purely a matter of opinion. There is no testimony whatever on the subject, except the fact the insured was found dead, from a mortal gunshot wound, with a pistol wedged in the bend of his thumb, and the body so disposed (as will be discussed in another place) as to suggest inferences entirely consistent with accidental death, or, at least, not of a character to exclude every supposition but suicide. I opinions of witnesses as to the cause of death are to be accepted as conclusive, contained in statements which the company exacts under their policy, it is a harsh application of the supposed rule as to the effect of such statements. In our opinion, neither reason nor authority support the contention of the company in this respect. We think the proofs of death were admissible, to be weighed by the jury with other testimony administered. Such was the ruling of the lower court, and we sustain it. See Home Ben. Asso. v. Sargent, 142 U. S. 699, 85 L. ed. 1165, Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 36, 5 L. ed. 795; Phillips v. Louisiana Equitable L. Ins. Co. 26 La. Ann. 404, 21 Am. Rep. 549.

The authorities, perhaps, do not go the full length here affirmed; but they tend to give the proofs of death admissibility, but certainly do not assert their conclusiveness. The better opinion is, the insurer is not estopped by the proofs. Bliss, Ins. § 265.

The discussion on the point that suicide should be regarded as proceeding from insanity, and not bar recovery, even though the policy stipulated no recovery in cases of self-destruction, has been ended, as life policies now, usually, we believe, contain what is known as the "sane or insane clause," i. e. no recovery in cases of suicide, sane or insane. That clause is in this policy. But still, notwithstanding the sane or insane clause, to defeat a recovery on this policy, it must appear the deceased took his life. In this case the testimony, mainly, the mute witness of the dead body, is all on which the company relies, besides the statements in the proofs of loss, from those who were possessed of no knowledge, save that afforded by the body of the deceased. There is in the record a mass of what is termed "expert testimony." It, of course, consists of theories as to the cause of the death. The testimony is of those who testify from their experience in the use of firearms; and from physicians, who draw their inferences from the gunshot wound, the position of the body, and other circumstances. The admissibility of such testimony is, at best, doubtful. Bliss, Ins. §§ 378, 379. The court, at last, must determine the basis and potency of all such theories, arising from all the facts. These facts are: The body, found with the wound from a gunshot, causing death; the discharged pistol, wedged, or as if it had been forced, on the thumb of the right hand; the body reclining on the sofa, as of one sleeping; the left arm rested on the breast; the right leg crossed on the left; the head in the usual position of one in repose, and there being no evidence of any convulsive movement, if we correctly translate the technical word "jactitation," used by the physicians who testify. The pistol was tightly wedged to the thumb, so as to require force to remove it. The question is whether these appearances point to suicide, to the exclusion of any other cause. Why not, with equal potency, to accidental death, or death by the hand of another? Dr. Gray, who was one of those who gave a statement, at first, attributing the death to suicide, seems to have changed his opinion. He testifies: "I was first led to believe it was suicide from the fact that the body was dead, and the pistol was on his hand. But the fact, as stated in a previous answer, viz. that the thumb was thrust through guard of pistol, and tightly wedged, as if it had been thrust in forcibly; the force necessary to draw the thumb from the guard; the absence of any evidence of jactitation, or of having been any, as shown by the precise manner in which the body laid, with arms folded, the legs crossed at ankles, as in a person sleeping,—have raised doubts in my mind as to how his death did occur,—whether by his own hand, or by that of another." The testimony of others professing to be experts as to the handling of firearms, and the causes of this death, reaches a conclusion different from that of Dr. Gray. We think, giving all due effect to the expert testimony, it is at least fair to say it does not establish the suicide. In any consideration of the cause of the death, weight is due to the condition of the deceased in life, i. e. his domestic relations, his means, his health, and the state of his mind. It is human experience that the motive or prompting for self-destruction is to be sought, and usually found, in domestic unhappiness, ill health, financial troubles, or insanity. In this case, no such causes are exhibited by the record. The deceased was fortunate in business; had a wife and children to whom he was attached, and with whom he was happy. He parted with them on the day of his death in the best of spirits, and the shock of his death came a few hours later. No physical malady or mental disturbance or financial trouble existed to furnish any cause for taking his life. In this condition of the record, there is no adequate basis to refer the death to the intentional act of the deceased. If there are indications that point to suicide, there are other features not consistent with that theory. When, as in this case, circumstantial evidence alone is relied on to establish suicide, it is at least within bounds to say the evidence must be of a character to exclude, with reasonable certainty, any other cause of death.

If the evidence falls short of this exaction, the suicide is not proved. The fact of death remains, and that casts the liability on the company insuring against death, with the excepted case of self-destruction, which the company fails to establish. This appreciation of the evidence and of the burden of proof constrains us to set aside the verdict and judgment of the lower court in favor of the defendant. Bliss, Ins. §§ 866, 867; Mallory

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the lower court be avoided and reversed, and that plaintiff do have and recover from defendant $5,000, with legal interest, and that appellee pay costs.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

Giuseppa GIANFORTONE

v.

City of NEW ORLEANS.

(61 Fed. Rep. 64)

1. A statute making municipal corporations liable for the destruction "of property" by mobs will not make a city liable for killing of a person by a mob.

I. General doctrine.

II. Liability.

III. Grounds of liability.

IV. Extent of liability; damages.

V. When not liable.

VI. Contributory negligence.

VII. Necessity of notice.

VIII. State statutes.

IX. Constitutionality of statutes.

X. Construction of statutes.

XI. Power to enforce judgment.

XII. Right of action over.

I. General doctrine.

The general principle of the law deducible from the decisions and generally admitted is, that municipal corporations are not liable upon any doctrine of common law to an action for damages occasioned to the property of a private individual by the acts of a mob or riotous assemblage.

Municipal corporations are invested by the laws of their incorporation with the duties of imposing and regulating police powers, such duty being held to be administrative and legislative, officers being appointed for the purpose of carrying out the same.

Under these laws of incorporation it has also been held that such corporations are not liable for damage caused by such assemblies.

Corporations are, however, liable in such cases, where the liability is imposed upon them by statute of the legislature of the several states, expressly passed for such purpose, the terms and conditions of which are to be strictly followed.

As a general rule, a corporation is not responsible for the unauthorized and unlawful acts of its officers, although done under the color of their office. To render it liable, it must appear that it expressly authorizes the acts to be done by them, or that they were done in pursuance of a general authority to act for the corporation on the subject to which they relate. Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 585.

A corporation appoints its officers to office, but does not in that act sanction their official delinquencies, nor render itself liable for their official misconduct. Ibid.

Quasi corporations, created by the legislature for purposes of public policy, are subject by the common law to an indictment for the neglect of duties enjoined on them, but are not liable to an action for such neglect unless the action be given by 24 L. R. A.

some statute. Mower v. Leicester, 9 Mass. 247, 6 Am. Dec. 63.

City authorities are not bound to place officers or guards to prevent trespasses and depredations, and are not liable for any destruction unless committed by a riotous and tumultuous assemblage, too strong to be resisted without the aid of the civil authorities, and which tumultuous assemblage the civil authorities had reasonable ground to believe would take place for the purpose of destroying the property. Duffy v. Baltimore, Taney, C. C. 300.

The omission of a duty imposed upon police officers by law, productive of prejudice to an individual, is not a corporate injury. Jolly v. Hawesville, 89 Ky. 279.

No action lies against a corporation for a breach of its duty, by any person specially injured by the breach. The only remedy is by way of information or indictment. Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals, 7 Mass. 169, 5 Am. Dec. 35.

Yet the general rule that the common law that a municipal corporation is not liable for the misfeasance or nonfeasance of one of its officers, in respect to a duty specifically imposed by statute on such officer, has no application in a case within the provisions of the Maryland code. Hagerstown v. Dechert, 33 Md. 389.

A distinction has been drawn between those powers delegated to a municipal corporation to preserve the peace and protect persons and property, whether to be exercised by legislation or the appointment of proper officers, and those powers and privileges which are to be exercised for the improvement of the territory comprised within the corporate limits, and its adaptation to the purposes of residence and business. The municipality representing the state, as to the first,—discharging duties incumbent upon the state; and representing the pecuniary and proprietary interests of individuals; as to the second, the responsibility for acts done or omitted, in the first, being governed by the same rule of responsibility which applies to like delegations of power; the rules governing the responsibility of individuals being properly applied in the second class. Western College of Homeopathic Medicine v. Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375, 377.

Where the liability of the city was based upon the act of incorporation which made it "the duty of the council to regulate the police of the city, preserve the peace, prevent riots, disturbances, and disorderly assemblies," the court held the city not liable for damage done by a riotous mob, the provision referring to the passing of ordinances en-forcible by officers appointed for that purpose. Ibid.

The same conclusions were reached by the court in Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 585; Hart v. Bridgeport, 13 Blatchf. 290; Cheaney v. Hooser, 9 B. Mon. 380; Ward v. Louisville, 16 B. Mon. 184; Baltimore v. Poultney, 25 Md. 107; Cobb v. Portland, 55 Me. 381, 92 Am. Dec. 598; Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright. (Pa.) 116; Louisiana v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 253, 27 L. ed. 936; Clear Lake Water Works Co. v. Lake County, 45 Cal. 90.

So they were upheld in Boylard v. New York, 1 Sandf. 27, where the action was brought against the city for damages occasioned by the discharge of a cannon in violation of the laws, in a public park during a public meeting sanctioned by the city authorities.

And the case of Levy v. New York, 1 Sandf. 465, further illustrates the principles of nonliability at common law of such corporations.

Where the action was for personal injuries received, while aiding the police officers in arresting offenders by virtue of the city ordinance, the statute not providing for the remedy, the question being whether such liability was founded in tort or on contract, the court held there was no claim against the city, the parties being engaged in the service and as representing the authority and dignity of the state, and not merely of the city, the liability of municipal corporations being fixed by statute, and not dependent upon any contingency so uncertain as the conduct of its officers. Cobb v. Portland, supra.

The question of the city's liability was raised in Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 585, there being no provision in the city charter subjecting it to liability for the acts of a mob, and the court stated that it knew of no principle of law that subjected a municipal corporation to a responsibility for the safety of the property within its territorial limits, there being nothing in the nature or design of a municipal corporation that imposed such a duty upon it.

The refusal of relief in Prather v. Lexington, supra, was placed upon the broad ground that the officers of a city were quasi civil officers of the government, although appointed by the corporation, and were personally liable for their malfeasance or nonfeasance in office, but for neither was the corporation responsible; that the omission of a duty imposed upon them by law, productive of prejudice to an individual, was not a corporate injury; and further that the duty of the officers of the city were prescribed by a statute from which they derived their power. Ibid.

II. Liability.

The state legislature has power to impose liabilities upon counties, towns, and cities for damage to property through a riot, and such power extends to directing the time and manner of enforcing such liability. Hagerstown v. Sehner, 37 Md. 180.

The liability thus imposed is imperative, where the plaintiff has not been guilty of negligence. Greer v. New York, 3 Robt. 406.

Such an action will lie no matter whether the owner of the damaged property is a resident or

Parlange, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit in damages against the city of New Orleans, brought by Giuseppa Gianfortone, widow of Pietro Monasterio, on her own behalf and as natural tutrix of her minor children, issue of her marriage with said Monasterio. The petition alleges that Monasterio, together with other persons, was arnot. Williams v. New Orleans, 23 La. Ann. 507; Chadbourne v. New Castle, 43 N. H. 196.

The act complained of must be that of a mob or riotous assemblage within the meaning of the statute. Street v. New Orleans, 32 La. Ann. 577; Duryea v. New York, 10 Daly, 300; Fauvia v. New Orleans, 20 La. Ann. 410.

Even though the original purposes for which the crowd assembled may be lawful, yet they may unite in unlawful conduct and thus become rioters. Solomon v. Kingston, 24 Hun. 582.

In Darlington v. New York, 81 N. Y. 164, 88 Am. Dec. 243, it was held that the legislature had the power to render the property of the city liable to such a judgment as a judgment recovered for any other cause of action, the property owned by the corporation being subject to a law-making power of the state vested in the legislature. Affirming 28 How. Pr. 332.

The duty and obligation of the state to provide for the safety of property against the destructive violence of mobs of lawless and riotous men is too plain for question, and the supplemental obligation imposed upon cities and counties to provide compensation for the injury or destruction of property, which they could not or would not prevent, is but another application of the same principle of public duty. Luke v. Brooklyn, 43 Barb. 54; Salles v. New York, 47 Barb. 447.

The liability of cities and towns under the provisions of the Louisiana statute is no longer an open question. Williams v. New Orleans, supra; Folsom v. New Orleans, 28 La. Ann. 336.

Where a particular act, operating injuriously to an individual, is authorized by a municipal corporation by a delegation of power, either general or special, it will be liable for the injury in its corporate capacity, where the acts done would warrant a like action against an individual. Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 585.

The law allows its officers, in execution of its sentence, only to do what is necessary, and for that reason will not sanction destruction without limit by individuals. Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 426, 20 Am. Rep. 711.

In Chestnut Hill & S. P. Turnp. Co. v. Rutter, 4 Serv. & R. 6, 8 Am. Dec. 675, it was held that a corporation was liable for a tort upon an action of trespass on the case, the declaration showing that the act was unjust and wrongful. Lyman v. White River Bridge Co. 2 Ark. 255, 16 Am. Dec. 705, to the same effect.

It must be shown by the evidence that the property was destroyed by a riotous and tumultuous assemblage, too strong to be resisted without the aid of the civil authority. Duffy v. Baltimore, Taney, C. C. 200; Street v. New Orleans, 32 La. Ann. 577; Fauvia v. New Orleans, 20 La. Ann. 410; Duryea v. New York, 10 Daly, 300.

So the city authorities must have reasonable grounds for believing that such an assemblage had taken place, or was about to take place. Duffy v. Baltimore, supra.

And there must also be the want of reasonable diligence to suppress or prevent in. Ibid.

The fact that the property destroyed is so delapidated as to be a nuisance and dangerous to enter, is no defense, as it cannot be lawfully abated by a chief of police of New Orleans, that he was prosecuted, together with said other persons, for said crime, before the criminal district court for the parish of Orleans,—the trial resulting in a mistrial as to Monasterio and two of his coaccused, and in a verdict of acquittal as to six of his coaccused; that immediately after said verdict, a conspiracy was formed by a certain body of men, unknown to the petitioned at night the findings of the jury in the criminal district court, and with the sole purpose of taking the law into their own hands, and of summarily, and without trial, destroying, by wholesale slaughter, the lives of Monasterio and his coaccused, all of whom were then incarcerated in the parish prison; that, in pursuance of said conspiracy, a mass meeting was called for the next day at Clay riotous or tumultuous assemblage, Ibid.; Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 426, 20 Am. Rep. 711.

Neither is the inability of the sheriff to do what is necessary to suppress the riot a defense under the New York Act of 1855, any more than his neglect would be a ground for it, the liability being, irrespective of either, imposed for the destruction of property by the riot, whether the sheriff has done all in his power or not to prevent it. Wolfe v. Richmond Supra, 11 Abb. Pr. 270, 19 How. Pr. 370.

Nor is the fact that the premises were kept for illegal purposes a defense; the proper remedy in such a case being to remove the nuisance and not to destroy the property. Moody v. Niagara County Supra, 46 Barb. 659, affirmed, 36 N.Y. 297, under title Ely v. Niagara County Supra; Blodgett v. Syracuse, 36 Barb. 656.

In the last-mentioned case the defense rested entirely upon the provision of the third section of the New York Act of 1855, exempting corporations from liability for injury to, or destruction of, private property, when such injury or destruction was occasioned, or in any manner aided, sanctioned, or permitted by the carelessness or negligence of the person whose property was destroyed, and he had not used all reasonable diligence to prevent the injury complained of. Blodgett v. Syracuse, supra.

Where the mob, originally collected for the lawful purpose of seeing a fire near the plaintiff's premises, subsequently showed signs of a desire to break in upon his premises which he was notified to vacate and to remove his goods, but neglected to do, and put up his shutter and looked the doors when the mob became boisterous, the plaintiff applying to the chief engineer of the fire department for protection, who turned a stream of water upon the crowd, when he was struck with a brick, and retired for a revolver, and the crowd then rushed upon the store, broke into it and carried away the plaintiff's stock,—it was held that although the purposes for which the crowd originally assembled were lawful, yet there was no defense to the action, as they ultimately conducted themselves in an unlawful and wrongful manner, and that notice was not material under the circumstances of the case. Solomon v. Kingston, 24 Hun, 562.

The fact that a state, when called upon, renders its assistance and sends a portion of its military to the scene of the riot, does not absolve the corporation from its implied obligation to preserve the peace, nor from its responsibility for a neglect of that duty. Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670.

In Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 426, 20 Am. Rep. 711, the defendant's contention was that the acts were justifiable as the property was a nuisance by reason of the noxious exhalation and offensive smell and stench arising from business operations, and that it was contributory negligence in the plaintiff to continue such business. The court held the town liable as such evidence was not admissible, and gave damages for the actual value at the time of its destruction.

The question in such cases is whether the destruction of the property was caused by the owner's illegal or improper conduct, or if not then whether he gave the proper notice, in case he had notice himself long enough beforehand to enable him to do so. Chadbourne v. New Castle, 48 N. H. 196; Wing Chung v. Los Angeles, 47 Cal. 531.

Where the plaintiff had no knowledge of the intention or attempt to destroy the property in question, the proof being merely that of an apprehension, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 121.

Allowance should, however, be made for any seeming defect in the plaintiff's evidence, caused by the violence of the mob. Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 116.

In Williams v. New Orleans, 23 La. Ann. 537, the action was founded upon the Statutes of 1855 as re-enacted in 1860, the defense being that the Act of September, 1868, establishing a metropolitan police district and providing for the government thereof, divested the city of New Orleans of the power and means to maintain order and suppress riots, mobs, and insurrections, but the court held the city liable, the liability of municipal corporations for losses occasioned by riotous conduct within their limits not depending upon the condition of having police forces, the underlying principle on which the Laws of 1855 as re-enacted in 1860 were founded, being that it is the interest of every one that property should be protected, and that it was for the general good that such acts should exist, the metropolitan police, although not under the control of the city authorities, being established for the benefit of the city and the other places within the metropolitan district.

Where the question was one of jurisdiction, the court held in Atlantic Dock Co. v. Brooklyn, 3 F. & C. 44, the pier injured being within the limits of the city of Brooklyn, that the boundary of territorial jurisdiction between the counties of New York and Kings was the actual line of low water on the Brooklyn side, whether corresponding with the low-water mark on the east river shore, or varied by the permanent encroachment of docks, piers, and wharfs, or other artificial erections for the purpose of general commerce, and that therefore the city was liable. See also, Orr v. Brooklyn, 38 N.Y. 661, infra, V., where the city was held not liable for the destruction of a floating elevator.

In Hagerstown v. Dechert, 23 Md. 369, the mayor was notified and protection claimed, some hours before the damage, but no steps were taken or used by him and the defendants contended that neither the mayor nor the other authorities of the town, had any lawful power to create or employ a police force, for the purpose of preventing or suppressing riots, or to call on the citizens for aid for that purpose, and that without such power no liability could devolve upon the town under the provisions of the code. The court, without passing upon the construction of the code, held that the acts of an assembly incorporating the town gave full and ample means for the preservation of the peace, and to call on the citizens to aid in the prevention and suppression of a riot; and further that conceding the construction to be corrected, it was clear that on the main street of the city, which assembly was advertised in the morning newspapers of the city; that in answer to said call a crowd congregated at said place, where inflammatory speeches were made, and that, after the passions of the mob had been aroused, it moved in a body to the parish prison; that some forty or fifty armed men, whose names are unknown to the petitioner, preceded the main body of rioters, and secluded admission inside the walls of the prison by breaking open a rear door of the building, meeting with no resistance from the police authorities; that said armed body took possession of the prison, and shot down and killed Monasterio and ten of his coaccused.

The petition further avers that if the mayor and chief of police of the city, upon reading in the newspapers the advertisement of the proposed mass meeting, had taken the proper the town could not escape liability for want of requisite power in the mayor.

Where, in answer to an application for a mandamus to compel the treasurer to pay a certain claim out of moneys in the treasury, it was contended inter alia that neither the judgment nor the claim based thereon was an existing or valid claim against the city or county, the court held that under section 4452 of the Political Code every municipal corporation was responsible for such injuries. Bank of California v. Shaber, 55 Cal. 322.

Under sections 4453, 4453, 4455, of the same Code, and the Act of April 23, 1868, section 84 of the Consolidation Act, the claim for such damages need not be presented in the first instance to the board of supervisors for their rejection or allowance as in the case of general demands, but a judgment must be first had and the claim as found thereon must be ordered to be paid by the board, unless they appeal, their discretion only extending to the question of appeal. Ibid.

Clear Lake Water Works Co. v. Lake County, 45 Cal. 90, to the same effect.

The California Act of March 27, 1868, created a new right and provided a new remedy therefor complete in itself. Ibid.

III. Grounds of Liability.

If the city is liable, in its corporate capacity, for the outrage committed by a mob which occasioned the injury, it can only be upon the ground that the existence and lawless intention of the mob were known to the mayor or marshal of the city, and that they neglected or refused to use any means, or to make any efforts, to prevent the perpetration of the unlawful act which could have been prevented by them. Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 550, 56 Am. Dec. 595.

The ground of liability is the existence of a mob or riot in the county, and the destruction of the property by such mob, the New York Act of 1855 not placing the responsibility either on the act of the sheriff or upon his neglect to act. Wolfe v. Richmond Supra, 11 Abb. Pr. 370, 19 How. Pr. 370; Duffy v. Baltimore, Taney C. C. 200; Street v. New Orleans, 82 La. Ann. 577, to the same effect.

It must be proved that the premises were injured or the goods removed by such an assembly, and that such mob could not be resisted without assistance of the proper authorities, and also that the city had reason to believe that such a mob assembled, and that the city had ability to prevent the same but was negligent in the exercise of its powers. Baltimore v. Poultney, 25 Md. 107; Wolfe v. Richmond Supra, Duffy v. Baltimore, and Street v. New Orleans, supra.

The charging the county with the consequences of the riot is not to punish for the acts or negligence of the sheriff, but for the county's own conduct in permitting such riots to take place. Wolfe v. Richmond Supra, supra.

Evidence tending to show the want of reasonable diligence in the suppression of a riot is admissible. Hagerstown v. Dechert, 32 Md. 369, wherein the evidence showed the indifference on the part of the mayor, and his sympathy with the spirit and temper of the mob.

It is not the possibility or probability that a sheriff might arrive in time to save the smallest portion of the plaintiff's property, or to arrest a rioter that should disturb the plaintiff's claim against the county. Schlielstein v. Kings County Supra, 48 Barb. 490.

The law will not tolerate the spectacle of a great city looking on with indifference while property to the value of millions is being destroyed by a mob. Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 597, 35 Am. Rep. 670.

The liability imposed by the statute is irrespective of any liability or neglect on the part of the city. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

IV. Extent of Liability.

Damages.

The right to reimbursement for damages caused by a mob or riotous assemblage of people is not founded upon any contract between the city and the sufferers, the liability of the former for damages being created by a law of the legislature and can be withdrawn or limited at its pleasure. Louisiana v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 225, 27 L. ed. 938.

Where the proof showed that the mob forcibly broke into plaintiff's store, threw a large portion of his stock into the street, which was then in the possession of the rioters, such property being instantly appropriated by the mob and carried away, and the store then set on fire and consumed with such property as was not carried away, the court held the city liable for the property so carried away by the mob, as well as for that destroyed by fire,—the taking and carrying away of the plaintiff's property, coming within the words of the New York statute, rendering the city liable for property "destroyed or injured." Series v. New York, 47 Barb. 447.

In such an action the instruction to the jury should direct them to find damages against the corporation, so far as such interruption and injury were the direct and natural results of the attack of the mob. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

The plaintiff need not prove every article destroyed; a general estimate of the plaintiff's damage is sufficient, it being a matter to be considered from necessity, in mass and not in detail. Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 116.

In such an action, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount of any damage sustained to the property, and the full value of goods taken away forcibly, or surrendered in fear of injury. Baltimore v. Poultney, 25 Md. 107; Series v. New York, 47 Barb. 447; Solomon v. Kingston, 24 Hun. 562; St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 121; Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, supra; Brightman v. Bristol, 66 Me. 423, 20 Am. Rep. 711.

Interest may be added at the jury's discretion, running from the time of the destruction of the property. St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, supra.

steps for the protection by the police of the parish prison, as well as the lives of the prisoners, the riotous assemblage would not have organized, nor have proceeded to the parish prison, nor have taken the same, and the slaughter would have been prevented; that the parish prison is a massive building, easy to defend by a handful of disciplined policemen, for a time, at least, and until the militia of the state, or other police assistance, could have been summoned; that, from the place where the mass meeting was held, to the parish prison, no police officers were stationed, with instructions to arrest the march of the mob; that the police force at the parish prison was insufficient, imperfectly armed, and demoralized, and yielded easily to the mob; that the safety of the prisoners might have been provided for by their prompt removal to another prison; that the Exemplary damages cannot be given, however, against the county. Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, supra.

But the city would not be liable under such a statute, where the destruction of the property could, by ordinary care and prudence, have been avoided. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

And the fact that the plaintiff published certain articles, which tended to the destruction of his property, is competent evidence upon the question of the exercise of ordinary care and prudence in the publication of such articles, and the mitigation of damages. Ibid.

In Fortunich v. New Orleans, 14 La. Ann. 115, damage was done to fruit stands of the plaintiffs in the fruit market, the question presented being a bill of exceptions to the defendant's introducing the city ordinance prohibiting the opening of the market-stalls after 12 o'clock M. in evidence as a complete bar to the plaintiff's action. It was held that although such ordinance was no defense, yet it might be given in evidence for the purposes of mitigation of damages.

But the value of such goods cannot be recovered, except it is shown that the plaintiffs, having knowledge of the danger, made reasonable efforts to give notice to the mayor or sheriff of the danger and took no part in the proceedings. Wing Chung v. Los Angeles, 47 Cal. 531.

Where the jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for the value of his life interest in the property injured or destroyed, with interest upon such value from the time of final demand upon the comptroller, the court held that if the jury ascertained the value of the plaintiff's interest in any other way than by assessing the value of the buildings, it was doubtful whether the plaintiff could claim interest as a right, but otherwise the verdict was correct. Greer v. New York, 3 Robt. 406.

In Folsom v. New Orleans, 23 La. Ann. 908, $15,000, the amount awarded in the court below was the only matter in controversy. The plaintiffs appealed, thinking the amount too small, the city not instituting a careful scrutiny into the matter, calling no witnesses and making no effort to ascertain the amount of the city's liability; the court accepted the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, and ordered and decreed judgment against the city for $26,886 with interest on costs of both suits.

V. When not liable.

If the injury was done upon a sudden excitement, which the civil authorities had not good reason to apprehend, or from a suddenness had not time to prevent, they are not responsible. Duffy v. Baltimore, Taney, C. C. 300.

So if diligent inquiry was made after notice that danger was apprehended, and reasonable precautions taken by the city authorities to guard against such riots and tumultuous assemblage. Ibid.

Where the damages were occasioned in the first 24 L. R. A.

instance by a few boys pulling down the stoop, their numbers gradually increasing to fifty or sixty, until the house was wrecked and taken down, the court held the city could not be made liable under the act, the property not being destroyed or injured by a mob or riot. Duryea v. New York, 10 Daly, 300.

Where the plaintiff's declaration failed to allege the existence of the mob and its intentions known to the city marshal, or the watchman appointed by the charter, or any application to them for assistance, but merely alleged the failure and refusal of the city to suppress the mob, "although well knowing of the same," the declaration was held defective, even in case the liability contended for rested upon the city. Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 588.

So where the like facts were alleged and further that notice was given to the mayor that the mob would assemble, and application was made for protection and assistance, the court held the city was not responsible, relying upon Prather v. Lexington, supra. Ward v. Louisville, 16 B. Mon. 184.

In the above case, the court pointed out that the declaration omitted to state the manner and time of the notice so as to show its sufficiency to enable the officers notified to use with effect the means of defense or protection within their power, or that they could by those means have prevented the injury. Ward v. Louisville, supra.

The question, however, was decided upon the broader ground that it was not shown that the city had been guilty of any breach of duty, and that she was not liable for the delinquencies or failure of her executive and ministerial officers, in the preservation of the peace and good order of the city, and that upon general principles of law she was not responsible for injuries committed by lawless individuals or mobs, and was not made responsible by statute; and further that the petition did not show an illegal act done under the city's authority, or that she was guilty as a corporation for a breach of a legal duty. Ibid.

In Orr v. Brooklyn, 30 N. Y. 661, the question was whether the locus in quo of a floating elevator with its machinery at the time of its destruction, was within the boundaries of the county of Kings of which Brooklyn was a portion, and the court held (the elevator lying below low-water mark) that it was outside of the county, and therefore the action did not lie, the waters below low-water mark and the lands under them being expressly declared to be within the limits of the county of New York. See Atlantic Dook Co. v. Brooklyn, 3 Keyes, 444, supra, II.

Where the action was brought to recover the value of a schooner burnt by a mob, the court held that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to render his claim against the city certain, and that the Act of 1855 did not apply, there being no evidence to show anything beyond the fact that cotton had been put on the schooner, and that she was taken to the opposite bank of the basin, and it was not proved that she was destroyed by a mob, although while she was burning a number of persons were present. Fauvia v. New Orleans, 20 La. Ann. 410.

In Robinson v. Greenville, 43 Ohio St. 625, 51 Am.

mayor was not in his office that morning, and could not be found, and that he gave no instructions to the police to disperse the mob; that the mayor is the chief magistrate and chief executive of the city, is at the head of the police force, and is charged with the duty of seeing the laws executed, and of preserving peace and good order within its limits; that the chief of police, next in command to the mayor, was equally derelict in his duties, and was, together with the mayor, and all of the employes, agents, deputies, and subordinates, guilty of gross carelessness and culpable negligence; and that by reason thereof, and of their failure to perform the duties of their respective offices, the city of New Orleans is liable in damages to the petitioner in the sum of $10,000, on a cause of action which had accrued to said Monasterio, and which has survived his death, and become

Rep. 857, the action was brought to recover damages for an injury to the person, sustained by reason of the negligence of the corporation's agents, by reason of the discharging of a cannon by an unruly mob. The court held the corporation not liable, even though under section 2640 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, such a corporation was bound to keep its streets in repair, and cause the same to be kept open and free from nuisance, and the fact that the city had notice of such an illegal act made no difference.

Where the petition alleged that owing to a violation of the duty of the defendant to preserve the peace and prevent riots the plaintiff's premises were destroyed, and contended that the specific duty to prevent riots was imposed by the legislature, it was held that under the Act of 1833, section 6, 84 Ohio Laws, 271, providing that "it shall be their duty to regulate the police of the city, preserve the peace, prevent riots, disturbances, and disorderly assemblages" the duty to prevent riots was in connection with the duty to regulate the police and to preserve the peace, and the city was not liable for the destruction of such property, or for the acts of its officers. Western College of Homoeopathic Medicine v. Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375.

So where the act was that of a well-organized body of citizens, acting under the orders of and in obedience to a state government ordained by the people and wielding legitimate power, such corporations, exercising the sacred rights of resistance to oppression or usurpation, and the state cannot legally be held liable for damages of property in such a case. Street v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 577.

In the above case the city had no control over the police force, which had been removed by the state authorities from its post of legitimate duty and converted into a military brigade, armed, equipped, officered, and marched out to disperse the citizens, who had assembled to protest against the usurping of the state government. Ibid.

Where the action was brought by the widow against the city, to recover damages for the killing of her husband by an armed mob, who took him from the jail and hung him, the court held the remedy was by way of action in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, for the benefit of the widow and children if any, or next of kin, and that the action in the present case was improperly brought by the widow. Atchison v. Twine, 9 Kan. 360.

In a case where a policy of insurance exempted the company from liability, in case of loss or damage by fire caused by means of an invasion, insurrection, or riot, it was held under the Indiana Revised Statutes 1881, § 1981, which provide that if three or more persons shall do an act in a violent and tumultuous manner, they shall be guilty of a riot, that the invasion in the night-time by force of a dwelling house, and compelling the occupant to vacate under threats of violence and the subsequent burning of the building, by men in disguise, amounted to a riot within the meaning of the policy. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Deokard, 3 Ind. App. 361.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gatewood, 10 L. R. A. 412, 79 Tex. 32, it was held that a common carrier might, by special agreement, stipulate for exemption of liability for loss of property occasioned by a mob or strike, or threatened violence to person or property, it being shown that the carrier diligently endeavored to forward the property over the line of railroad contemplated by the parties, but failed, owing to a railroad strike.

In Street v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 577, plaintiffs sued the city for damages to property, by a body of rioters who took violent possession of the state house and other buildings of the city, and used and carried away and destroyed, or otherwise illegally disposed of plaintiff's property, the city denying the claim, urging a special defense that the city government was suspended of its functions after a certain date, and that the then state government, which had the exclusive control of the police, had been subverted, or had ceased to exercise authority, both the state and city governments being at the time under the control of a de facto government which rendered the state powerless to hinder the act complained of. The court held that it must be proved that the body of men who took possession of the state house was a mob or riotous assemblage within the meaning of the statute, and, in default thereof, must fall in the action.

VI. Contributory negligence.

Those who seek indemnity against the action of a mob are bound to keep property, likely to be the object of attack, in a position a man of ordinary prudence would keep it if he wished to guard against a mob. Eastman v. New York, 5 Robt. 369, 367.

It being a general principle of law that there is no remedy for a loss caused by the plaintiff's want of ordinary care. Underhill v. Manchester, 45 N. H. 214.

If the damage would not have happened but for the plaintiff's action, and could have been guarded against by ordinary prudence according to the circumstances of the case, the city will not be liable. Chadbourn v. New Castle, 48 N. H. 193.

The party must avoid everything which might aid, sanction, or permit the injury to be done, and where he knows of the intended injury he must use all reasonable diligence to prevent it, and as an evidence thereof must show that he has applied to the sheriff of the county for protection. Wolfe v. Richmond Supra, 11 Abb. Pr. 270, 19 How. Pr. 370; Moody v. Niagara County Supra, 46 Barb. 662.

Diligence on the part of the owner often preventing the intended injury or destruction, the remedy is made dependent upon such use of diligence. Moody v. Niagara County Supra, supra.

Where the mob became violent and unruly through drink supplied by the owner of the premises, their violent action in the destruction of the property being caused by his refusal to further supply them, the court held the county not liable, the destruction being caused or aided through the plaintiff's own act in the supplying of such liquor. Paladino v. Westchester County Supra, 47 Hun. 397.

So where the act complained of was that of persons who developed into rioters upon the plaintiff's premises, owing to the fact that her servants had freely supplied them with intoxicating liquors.

vested in petitioner, individually and as mother and tutrix.

Act No. 51 of 1855 (now La. Rev. Stat. § 2453) provides that "the different municipal corporations in this state shall be liable for damages done to property by mobs or riotous assemblages in their respective limits." Anterior to the enactment of this statute, there was no liability, under the law of Louisiana, on the part of municipal corporations, for the destruction of property by mobs. In 1855 a similar statute was enacted in the state of New York, and as late as the year 1865, a vigorous attack was made upon its constitutionality, but its validity was sustained by the court of appeals of that state. See Darlington v. New York, 81 N. Y. 164, 88 Am. Dec. 248. This case is of much value and interest, as setting forth the history of the legislation by which municipal corporations

Hill v. Rensselaer County, 119 N. Y. 344; Underhill v. Manchester, 45 N. H. 214.

Even though the parties originally assembled with an illegal intent, the plaintiff's servants in charge being blamable. Hill v. Rensselaer County, 83 Hun. 194, affirmed, 119 N. Y. 344.

In an action under the New Hampshire statute, the illegal and improper conduct on the part of the owner of the property will not be presumed, and he need not prove the legality or propriety of his conduct. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 606.

VII. Necessity of notice.

Notice must be given when the party has knowledge of the intention or attempt to destroy his property, or to collect a mob for that purpose, and he is not required to give notice when he has no such knowledge, and cannot be debarred of his remedy though he has not given such notice. Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670; Donoghue v. Philadelphia County, 2 Pa. 220, to the same effect.

When a statute directs notice to be given, the rule is that it is to be given in writing. In this respect the statutory differs from the common law. St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 121.

Under the Pennsylvania act, notice is only necessary when the plaintiff has knowledge of the threatened attack, verbal notice being sufficient. Donoghue v. Philadelphia County, supra.

It must be explicit in designating the property threatened, and in giving information to the proper officer of such threat or intention to attack or destroy. St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, supra.

The notice must be given by one of the plaintiffs, or by an agent duly authorized for that purpose. Ibid.

Where the notice was given by a person who had a mere power of attorney to sell property on behalf of the plaintiff, it was held sufficient within the act. Donoghue v. Philadelphia County, supra. Lavery v. Philadelphia County, 2 Pa. 223, to the same effect.

The fact that threats and complaints were made to the owner is competent evidence with respect to the question of notice. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 606.

The liability of the city or county is general, applying to all cases whatever, where property may be destroyed by riots or mobs, the comprehensiveness of the action only being restricted so far as to deny the remedy, where the party has been previously apprised and afterwards fails to give the required notice, notice only being required in such cases. Moody v. Niagara County, supra, 46 Barb. 669.

With regard to the question of notice as contained in the New York statute, it was held that such statute unnecessarily contemplated that sufficient period of time should intervene between the threat or attempt and the execution of the deed, to admit of notice being given. Ibid.

Such notice is given to the sheriff, whose duty it is to take all legal means to protect the property, 24 L. R. A.

and in case he neglects or refuses he is made individually liable for the damages sustained. Schiellein v. Kings County, supra, 43 Barb. 490.

It is not intended to restrict the action against the city or county, but such as shall give notice to the sheriff if such notice be useless for the purpose of protection. Ibid.

The notice is not for the purpose of fixing any liability on the sheriff. Wolfe v. Richmond, supra, 11 Abb. Pr. 270, 19 How. Pr. 370.

The object of the notice required by the New York Act of 1855 being for the purpose of protection only. Schiellein v. Kings County, supra.

The fact that the plaintiff was detained in custody and held during the destruction of the property is sufficient to excuse notice. Moody v. Niagara County, supra.

In Ely v. Niagara County, supra, 36 N. Y. 297, where the action was brought under the New York Act of 1855, the plaintiff not notifying the sheriff of any authority or attempt to destroy the property, or of any facts brought to his knowledge, not being apprised of any threat or attempt until the destruction had considerably progressed, and when apprised being unlawfully taken into custody by the police and others acting in concert with the rioters, and confined until after the destruction was complete, the court held that under the circumstances notice was not required.

When the crowd becomes a riot, there is no time to give notice. Solomon v. Kingston, 24 Hun, 552.

In Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670, the property destroyed belonged to an inhabitant of another state and was being transported over the line of the railroad company whose employes were on a strike, notice not being required under the act, and the company was held liable, even though it was beyond its power to suppress the riot, the state militia having been called out and the mob fired upon prior to the destruction.

If, upon knowledge had of an intention to attack or destroy the property of the plaintiffs, or to collect a mob for the purpose, the plaintiffs did not give notice to the sheriff of the county, or the alderman or constable of the ward, sufficient time intervening to enable them to do so, they cannot recover under the Pennsylvania act. St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 121.

Where under such circumstances the civil authorities could and would have afforded protection if notified, no recovery can be had because it is his own fault or negligence that the injury was not prevented. Newberry v. New York, 1 Sweeny, 369.

If he deserted the store in order to give notice, the crowd becoming threatening, it might be urged that he had not used reasonable diligence to prevent the damage. Solomon v. Kingston, supra. See this case supra, II.

VIII. State statutes.

By section 4452 of the Political Code of California (Hittell's ed. vol. 1, p. 573), every municipal corporation is responsible for injuries to real or personal are made liable for the destruction of property by mobs. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (vol. 2, § 959), says: "Public or municipal corporations are under no common-law liability to pay for the property of individuals destroyed by mobs or riotous assemblages, but in such case the legislature may constitutionally give a remedy." Numerous cases cited.

"At common law . . . a municipal corporation is not liable for the destruction of property by a riotous assemblage of persons, or for the neglect of its officers in not preserving the peace, and preventing such destruction. But this doctrine is not in accordance with sound public policy, and has been changed by statute in many of the states. . . . But the right to demand reimbursement from a municipal corporation for damages caused by a mob is not founded property situated within its corporate limits, done or caused by mobs or riots.

By section 4453, such action must be tried in the county in which the property injured is situated.

And by section 4454, must be commenced within one year after the act is committed.

By section 4455, on the certificate of the presiding officer, or the clerk of the court, the board of supervisors of the county or the legislative authority of the city, must by ordinance direct and cause a warrant for payment to issue on the general fund, and the same must be paid in regular order and be collected by a tax upon the property, within a period of not more than three years.

But by section 4456, if the plaintiff in such action has been guilty of negligence, he cannot recover.

By section 5436 of McClain's Annotated Code of Iowa, vol. 2, 1888, p. 1574, the person or persons committing the acts specified therein are answerable to any person injured, to the full amount of the damage by him sustained in an action at law.

Section 5 of the General Statutes of Kentucky, ed. 1888, chap. 1, p. 168, provides, if within any city of this commonwealth, any church, convent, or chapel, dwelling house, or house so used or designed for the transaction of lawful business, or deposit of property, any ship, ship yard, boat, or vessel, or any railroad, or property of any kind belonging to any railroad company, or any articles of personal property, shall be injured or destroyed, or if any property therein or thereon shall be taken away or injured, by any riots or tumultuous assemblage of people, the full amount of the damage so done shall be recoverable by the sufferer or sufferers, by action against said city: Provided, the authorities thereby have the ability, of themselves or with the aid of their own citizens, to prevent such damage: And provided also, that no person shall maintain such action who shall have unlawfully contributed, by word or deed, towards exciting or inflaming such tumult, or who shall have failed to do what he reasonably could towards preventing, allaying, or suppressing it: And further provided, that no liability shall be incurred by such city, unless the authorities thereof shall have had notice or good reason to believe that such riot or tumultuous assemblage was about to take place, or, having taken place, shall have had notice of the same in time to prevent said injury or destruction, either by their own force, or by the aid of the citizens of such city.

In Jolly v. Hawesville, 89 Ky. 279, the action was brought under the General Statutes of Kentucky, chap. 1, § 5, to recover for death caused by a gun shot, in a disorderly proceeding and riotous assembly, and the court held such action would not lie as the provisions of the statute restricted it, in express terms, to cases of injury to property, and that it was not meant to authorize a recovery against a city for personal injuries resulting from the malfeasance or neglect of police officers.

By section 2453 of the Revised Statutes of Louisiana, ed. 1878, p. 639, it is provided that the different municipal corporations in this state shall be liable for the damages done to property by mobs or riotous assemblages in their respective limits.

Under article 82, section 1, of the Public General 24 L. R. A.

Laws of Maryland, ed. 1888, p. 1288, the full amount of the damage done by any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people shall be recovered by the sufferer or sufferers, by suit at law against the county, town, or city within whose jurisdiction such riot or tumult occurred.

But by section 2 of the same article, the authorities must have had good reasons to believe that such riot or tumultuous assemblage was about to take place, or having taken place, must have had notice of the same in time to prevent said injury or destruction, either by its own police or with the aid of the citizens, the intention of the article being that such liability shall not rest upon such county, town, or city, unless the authorities having notice have also the ability of themselves or with other citizens to prevent such injury, such action to be prosecuted within three years from the time of its accrual.

Under section 8 of the same, indemnity is not to be recovered where it is satisfactorily proved that the city authorities and citizens, when called upon by civil authorities, have used reasonable diligence and all the powers entrusted to them for the prevention of such riot.

By section 13 of chapter 40 of the Public Statutes of New Hampshire, ed. 1891, p. 145, if persons unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled, injure or destroy any property, real or personal, the town within the limits of which such property is situate, is liable to the owner thereof for the damages suffered by him in an action on the case.

But by section 14 of the same, no person shall be entitled to the benefits of the foregoing provisions, if it shall appear that the destruction of his property was caused by his illegal or improper conduct, or unless it appears that he, upon knowledge had of the intention or attempt to destroy his property, or to collect a mob for such purpose, sufficient time intervening, gave notice thereof to the mayor, one of the select men, or a justice of the peace of the town in which the property was situated.

And by section 15 of the same, any town which shall pay any sum of money under the provisions of the thirteenth section may recover the same in an action on the case against any one, or against two or more jointly, who shall have injured or destroyed the property.

Where the action was brought against the city to recover damages for property destroyed by a mob, under the New Hampshire statute it was held the city was liable even though it could not have prevented the mischief and the rioters were not citizens. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605.

In the above case, the plaintiff was a publisher and printer of the "Democrat Standard," and his printing materials were destroyed by a mob, consisting of privates in the First New Hampshire Regiment Volunteers, the defendants justifying their actions by producing in evidence a copy of the paper containing certain articles libeling the regiment. Ibid.

In Carey v. Paterson, 47 N. J. L. 365, it was held that a married woman was not barred of her action for an injury to property by a riot, by an elapse of three months after the injury and before suit, she on contract. It is a statutory right, and may be given or taken away at pleasure." Numerous cases cited. 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, verbis, Municipal Corporations, p. 1183.

It is therefore clear that, in the absence of a statute, municipal corporations are not liable for the destruction of property by mobs, and I have stated that as late as 1865 the constitutionality of such a statute was contested. Even now, in a number of states, there are no statutes imposing the liability upon municipal corporations.

Act No. 51 of 1855 cannot be construed so as to include within its purview loss of life caused by a mob. It was not until the enactment of Act No. 71 of 1884 that an action could be maintained in this state for damages caused by the death of a human being. See Vredenburg Case, 83 La. Ann. 637; Van Am- being within the saving clause of the section relating to riots which confers the right of action.

By section 5 of the New Jersey Act, Revised Statutes, 778, each city of the state is made liable to actions on the part of the owners of real estate or personal property for an injury to such property, or its destruction by riot. Such right is limited by the 9th section of the statute, which provides, no action shall be maintained against any city or county, under the provisions of this act, unless the same shall be brought within three months after the loss or injury.

By chapter 423 of the New York Laws of 1855, it is provided, § 1, whenever any building or other real or personal property shall be destroyed or injured in consequence of any mob or riot, the city or county in which such property was situated shall be liable to an action by or in behalf of the party whose property was thus destroyed or injured for the damages sustained by reason thereof.

And by section 2, such action or actions may be brought and conducted in the same manner that other actions may be prosecuted by law, and the judgment may be appealed from in the manner now provided for appeals in civil actions; and whenever any final judgment shall be recovered against any such city or county, in any such action, the treasurer of said city or county shall, upon the production and filing in his office a certified copy of the judgment roll, pay the amount of such judgment to the party or parties entitled thereto, and charge the amount thus paid to said city or county.

And by section 3, the right to recovery is barred, if the person or corporation whose property has been destroyed or injured in any way aided, sanctioned, or permitted such destruction through carelessness or negligence, or unless they have used all reasonable diligence to prevent such damage and notified the mayor of the city, or the sheriff of the county immediately after being apprised of any threat or attempt to destroy or injure the property, upon receipt of which notice such officers shall take all legal means to protect the property, or in case of refusal or neglect shall be liable for such damages, the party aggrieved to be entitled to elect to bring his action against the officer instead of the city or county.

Section 4 of the Act entitles the party aggrieved to maintain an action against each and every person engaged or participating in such riot.

Section 5 bars the right of action after three months from the time of the loss.

The Pennsylvania Act of May 31, 1841 (Pamphlet Laws, 416), provides that "in all cases where any dwelling house or other building or property, real or personal, has been or shall be destroyed within the county of Philadelphia in consequence of any mob or riot, it shall be lawful for the person or persons interested in and owning such property to bring suit against said county where said property was situated and being, for the recovery of such damages as he or they shall sustain by reason of the destruction thereof, and the amount which shall be recovered in such action shall be paid out of the county treasury, on warrants drawn by the commissioners thereof, who are hereby required to draw the same as soon as said damages are finally fixed and ascertained.

Under section 3 of the same statute, no person or persons shall be entitled to the benefits of this act, if it shall appear that the destruction of his or their property was caused by his or their illegal or improper conduct, nor unless it be made to appear that he or they, upon the knowledge had of the intention or attempt to destroy his or their property, or to collect a mob for such purpose, and sufficient time intervening, gave notice thereof to a constable, alderman, or justice of the peace of the ward, borough, or township in which said property may be situated, or to the sheriff of the said county, and it shall be the duty of the said sheriff, alderman, constable, or justice of the peace, upon receipt of such notice, to take all legal means to protect said property so attacked or threatened.

In an action brought under the above statute the court held that a property owner could not be in default for want of notice, unless he had knowledge of an intention on the part of the mob to destroy his property, and that there was sufficient time intervening to give the notice contemplated by the act, the object of the notice being to inform the proper officer so that he might protect the property. Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670.

Constitutionality of statutes.

State statutes imposing such liability upon cities and towns and municipal corporations have been declared constitutional and valid both by judicial decision and by legislative action.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1841 was held wise, just, and beneficial, because it was the duty of the county to protect its citizens against lawless violence, and if it did not do this, to make reparation for the injury which they might sustain from such violence. Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright, (Pa.) 116.

Where the proceedings were brought under the thirteenth section of the Pennsylvania Act of June 16th, 1836, giving judgments for injuries, for the destruction of property in the city and county of Philadelphia by mobs or riots, upon the owner's application to the court of sessions or the mayor's court, the act was held constitutional and valid. Re Pennsylvania Hall, 5 Pa. 204.

In Luke v. Brooklyn, 43 Barb. 54, the court held the New York Act of 1855 constitutional.

So in Moody v. Niagara County Supra, 46 Barb. 659, wherein it was contended that the New York Act was in conflict with the provision of the constitution of the state, declaring that "the county shall never be made responsible for the acts of the sheriff," the court held the act complained of, namely, the destruction of the plaintiff's property, was the act of a mob of riotous assemblage, and not the act or default of the sheriff, and therefore the statute was not in conflict with the constitutional provision.

So in Davidson v. New York, 27 How. Pr. 343; Darlington v. New York, 31 N. Y. 164, 86 Am. Dec. 248; Stiles v. New York, 47 Barb. 447; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Brooklyn, 3 Keyes, 44; Rastman v. New York, 5 Robt. 389; Orr v. Brooklyn, 86 N. Y.

bury Case, 37 La. Ann. 651, 55 Am. Rep. 517. As, prior to 1855, municipal corporations were not liable for any acts of violence committed by a mob, it is beyond question that, when the legislature enacted Act No. 51 of 1855,—our jurisprudence then being that no damages could be had for the loss of a human life,—it was not contemplated that such an action as this one could be maintained under that statute. By no possible intendment could "property," in 1855, have been made to include a human life. As, neither by the common law nor by the civil law, could the price of a human life be sued for, and as it has been shown that there is no implied liability on the part of municipal corporations for any acts of violence committed by mobs, it is perfectly clear that if the legislature, in 1855, had intended to innovate in both respects, it would have done so clearly. It is 661, and Wolfe v. Richmond Supra. 11 Abb. Pr. 270, the statute was upheld.

In Hagerstown v. Sehner, 37 Md. 180, the Maryland Statute of 1867, chapter 282, was approved of upon this ground.

So in Louisiana. Folsom v. New Orleans, 28 La. Ann. 293, and Williams v. New Orleans, 28 La. Ann. 507.

The New York Act of 1855 "for compensating parties whose property might be destroyed in consequence of mobs and riots" does not require the presence of three fifths of the members of the legislature elected to each house to make it law, and therefore is not contrary to the constitution. Darlington v. New York, supra.

The policy upon which the act is framed, is to make good at the public expense the loss of those who, without their own fault, were injured in their property by acts of lawless violence, which it is the duty of the government to prevent, and principally to make it the interest of every person liable to contribute to the public expense to discourage lawlessness and violence, and maintain the empire of the laws established to preserve public quiet and social order. Ibid.

Such act is not unconstitutional by reason of the suits instituted thereunder, resulting in requiring contribution from taxpayers, as tending to the taking of property without due process of law, or as taking private property for public use without just compensation. Ibid.

In Eastman v. New York, 5 Robt. 389, 397, the court stated that the case of Baldwin v. New York, 42 Barb. 549, had not so disturbed the foundation of the decision in Darlington v. New York, supra, as to throw the constitutionality of the Laws of 1855, as to render it still an open question, and that if the statute was imperative rendering all property of the corporation subject to the call of the state for any purpose, and the judgment and execution thereon are the mode of reaching it, the court was bound by that decision, and was not at liberty to doubt its correctness.

X. Construction of statutes.

The obligation to make indemnity, created by the statute, has no more element of contract in it, because merged in the judgments of the court, than it had previously. Louisiana v. New Orleans. 109 U. S. 233, 27 L. ed. 936.

The term "contract" is used in the constitution in its ordinary sense, and signifying the agreement of two or more minds after consideration proceeding from one to the other, to do or not to do certain acts, mutual assent to its terms being of its very essence. Ibid.

Mobs and riots are generally of sudden growth, and the legislature could hardly have intended to make the remedy of the property owner practically dependent upon the want of secrecy or celerity on the part of the rioters. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 606.

The statute must receive a reasonable and liberal construction. Schelllein v. Kings County Supra. 43 Barb. 490.

Riots being the mischief to be remedied, the statute is to be construed, if possible, so as to suppress 24 L. R. A.

the mischief. Underhill v. Manchester, 45 N. H. 214.

With respect to the meaning of the words "illegal or improper conduct" as used in the New Hampshire statute, the court gave to both words a distinct and usual meaning. "illegal" meaning something "unlawful, contrary to law," and "improper" meaning "that which is not suitable, unfit, not suited to the character, time, or place." Chadbourn v. New Castle, 45 N. H. 196.

Under the New York Statute of 1855, there is no room for any question of diligence on the part of city authorities. The act is imperative if the party damaged has not been guilty of any lack of diligence on his part, and the failure of a bailie to notify the mayor or sheriff cannot be imputed to the plaintiff, such notification being a matter of good faith, there being no evidence that the plaintiff knew of any threats of, or expected a riot. Eastman v. New York, 5 Robt. 389, 397.

The Statute of 1855, chapter 420, has been construed to mean that if a mob be maddened by the voluntary or unlawful act of the claimant, and the destruction of his property is the result, a good defense exists in favor of the city or county when sued for the injury occasioned by the mob, and that no action would be supported if such destruction or injury was occasioned or in any manner aided, sanctioned, or permitted by the carelessness or negligence of such person. Paladino v. Westchester County Supra. 47 Hun, 337.

In Barley v. New York, 47 Barb. 447, it was held that the plain object of the act was to compensate such persons as should, without their fault, suffer loss by the violence of mobs.

The carrying away of the plaintiff's property by the rioters is a sufficient destruction as to the plaintiff, within the meaning of the statute, plunder as well as wanton injury usually being the work of rioters. Solomon v. Kingston, 24 Hun, 362.

The words "shall have used" as appearing in the statute refer to the time and to some event, and were meant to refer to previous precautions and are used to prevent destruction by a mob. Eastman v. New York, supra.

With respect to the words "carelessness or negligence" as used in the New York statutes, it has been stated that the intention of the legislature was that a party should not recover if he omitted some obvious precaution, or failed to exercise some care, which, if it had been timely bestowed in view of a threatened or apprehended danger, would have averted the calamity. Blodgett v. Syracuse, 36 Barb. 525.

The object and purpose of the statute, in requiring notice of any threat or attempt by a mob to injure property, was for the purpose of protection to the property, to enable the constituted civil or military authorities to meet and overcome rioters, illegal force by organized legal force, and afford protection to persons and property. Newberry v. New York, 1 Sweeny, 399.

The proper construction of the act should be, that if a party is informed of a threat, and has time to notify the sheriff so that he can take legal means to protect the property, the omission also evident that Act No. 51 of 1855 does not provide for terror, or other injuries to feelings, caused by mobs. That act being the only statute of Louisiana mentioning municipal corporations by name with regard to torts, if the city of New Orleans can be held liable in this action, it must be by force of some other law. I understand that all claim that this action is based on the Act of 1855 is abandoned, but it is urged that the city of New Orleans may be held liable under article 2815, Civ. Code La., as amended by Act 71 of 1884, which article now reads: "Every act, whatever, of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it; the right of this action shall survive in case of death in favor of the minor children or widow of the deceased, or either of them, and in default of these, in favor of the surviving father and mother, or either of them, for the space of one year from the death. The survivors above mentioned may also recover the damages sustained by them by the death of the parent or child, or husband, or wife, as the case may be."

In support of the view that the city is liable in the present action under article 2815, Civ. Code, the plaintiff cites cases which she contends were decided against the city by virtue of that article of the Code. The particular cases cited may have been decided under article 2815 of the Civil Code, or they may have been based upon the implied liability of municipal corporations. However this may be, those cases bear but incidentally on the matters in hand.

The solution of the question presented in this case is free from difficulty, and results from making a clear distinction between those powers and duties of the city of New Orleans which are private, and those which are public or governmental. It must be borne in mind that the city of New Orleans is not sued in this action for any commission or omission by its corporate capacity. It is being sued for the neglect of duties of its officers.

"So far as municipal corporations of any class, and however incorporated, exercise powers conferred on them for purposes essentially public,—purposes pertaining to the administration of general laws made to enforce the general policy of the state,—they should be deemed agencies of the state, and not subject to be sued for any act or omission occurring while in the exercise of such power, unless by statute the action be given. In reference to such matters, they should stand as does sovereignty, whose agents they are,—subject to be sued only when the state.

to give the notice is fatal. Sobiellein v. Kings County Supra, 43 Barb. 490.

The provisions of the statute relating to notice do not apply in cases where the city has full notice of the tumultuous assemblage by reason of its existence. Newberry v. New York, supra.

The intention of the legislature could not be made to depend upon an act, which it would be otherwise utterly impossible for the plaintiff to perform. Moody v. Niagara County Supra, 43 Barb. 659.

The word "nuisance" as used in the Ohio Revised Statutes, section 2640, has been held not to include an assemblage of persons engaged in an unlawful act, such as the firing of cannon in the public street, but it refers to something which is fixed or permanent, as a defect in the street. Robinson v. Greenville, 42 Ohio St. 625, 51 Am. Rep. 637.

If the act is rigidly enforced when violated, the effects will be found beneficial. Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright. (Pa.) 116.

The words "person or persons" as used in the Pennsylvania Act of May 81, 1841, include municipal corporations. Kensington Comrs. v. Philadelphia County, 13 Pa. 76; Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, supra; St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright. (Pa.) 121.

With respect to the meaning of the words "illegal or improper conduct" the court declared that, what is improper conduct within the meaning of the act was a nice question, and that the assertion of a legal right, in a legal manner, in pursuit of a legal business, was not such "improper conduct" as would prevent the owner of property destroyed by a mob from recovering its value under the statute. Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670.

XI. Power to enforce judgment.

The plaintiff has no such vested right in the taxing power of the city as to render its diminution by the state to a degree affecting the present collecting of judgments and deprivation of property 24 L. R. A.

within the 14th Amendment of the Constitution, as a party cannot be said to be deprived of his property in a judgment because at the time he is unable to collect it. Louisiana v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 27 L. ed. 936.

Although the taxing power of the city may be limited so as to prevent the receipt of such funds by means of taxation, yet its state legislature may from proper appeal make other provisions for their satisfaction. Ibid.

Judgments though founded upon claims to indemnity for unlawful acts of mobs or riotous assemblages are property, in the sense that they are capable of ownership and may have a pecuniary value; yet it was held that the plaintiff could not be said to be deprived of such property, so long as the judgments continued an existing liability against the city. Ibid.

In Louisiana v. New Orleans, supra, a mandamus was applied for to compel the city to levy taxes and pay a judgment recovered against it, in an action for damages occasioned through riot. The court refused the writ, the state having changed the taxing power of the city, the power to tax being so limited as to postpone the payment of the judgments.

XII. Right of action over.

By section 15 of the New Hampshire Act, chap. 34 of the General Statutes, the town paying moneys under the provisions of the twelfth section of the same act may recover the same in an action on the case of the rioters. The meaning of such section is, that in an action on the case there is a remedy which by section 12 it is liable to indemnify. The remedy depends upon its discharging its liability by payment, and not upon the form of the action by which its liability is enforced.

In Chadbourne v. New Castle, 48 N. H. 196, it was held that all who were engaged in the mob were responsible for the damage done, the statute making the town or city liable in certain cases also.

by statute, declares they may be. In so far, however, as they exercise powers not of this character, voluntarily assumed,—powers intended for the private advantage and benefit of the locality and its inhabitants,—there seems to be no sufficient reason why they should be relieved from that liability to suit and measure of actual damages to which an individual or private corporation exercising the same powers, for purposes essentially private would be liable." 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, verbis Municipal Corporations, p. 1141, and cases there cited.

"Neither the federal nor the state governments are liable for the unauthorized torts of their officers, and municipal corporations are entitled to the same exemptions when they act in a governmental or political capacity. But when the tort is committed in the performance of some municipal or corporate duty, which is private in its nature, the corporation is liable." 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, verbis Public Officers, p. 514, and cases there cited.

Field, in his work on the Law of Damages (page 88, § 37), says: "The true doctrine is that the powers conferred in the sections we have been considering are of a legislative and governmental nature, for a defective execution of which the city cannot be held liable. In discharging these legislative functions, the city acts as a quasi sovereign, and is not responsible for a neglect or nonperformance of its officials or agents."

Citations from authoritative text-writers to the same effect as the citations just made could be multiplied.

Nearly forty years ago, in the case of Stewart v. New Orleans, 9 La. Ann. 461, 61 Am. Dec. 218, the supreme court of Louisiana distinctly recognized the doctrine that a municipal corporation, in the exercise of power which it possesses for public purposes, and which it holds as part of the country, enjoys the exemption of government from responsibility for its own acts, and for the acts of its officers deriving their authority from the sovereign power. The suit was against the city of New Orleans for the value of a slave wrongfully and unjustifiably killed by the police of the city, in a police raid ordered by the chief of police. The supreme court, in reversing the judgment against the city rendered by the lower court, said: "The judgment we think erroneous, and the error results from a failure . . . to make the proper distinction between the liability of a municipal corporation for acts of its officers in the exercise of powers which it possesses for public purposes, and which it holds as part of the government of the country, and those which are conferred upon it for private purposes. Within the sphere of the former, it enjoys the exemption of government from responsibility for its own acts, and the acts of its officers deriving their authority from the sovereign power [citing authorities], whereas in the latter it is answerable for the acts of those who are, in law, its agents [citing authorities]. . . . The inquiry which is next presented is whether the powers under which the officers of the municipality acted were conferred for public purposes. If so, it follows that the city is not liable for the acts of its officers, even though illegal, or of such a character as to subject the officers themselves to liability. The Act of 1805, incorporating the city of New Orleans, provides 'for the appointment of a mayor, recorder, and aldermen, and such subordinate officers, for preserving the peace and well ordering the affairs of the city, as the council shall direct.' Through all the changes of city government, this power has been continued, and the conclusion, therefore, that these powers are governmental, is strengthened by the fact that the Constitutions of 1845 and 1852 both provide that 'the citizens of the city of New Orleans shall have the right of appointing the several public officers necessary for the administration of the police of said city, pursuant to the modes of election which shall be provided by the legislature. . . . art. 128. So that the right of regulating the police of the city of New Orleans does not rest alone upon legislative permission, but is authorized by the constitution itself. Under these sanctions, watchmen are appointed as a necessary branch of the police of the city. Their duties are the preservation of public order and tranquillity, and the city, in appointing them, exercised a governmental function, conferred upon it, in its public or municipal character, for public purposes, exclusively, and is not, therefore, liable for the acts of its officers." Underlining mine.

It is to be specially noted that article 128 of the Constitution of 1845, just cited, or its equivalent, has existed in all the constitutions of this state, except that of 1868. State v. Shakespeare, 41 La. Ann. 178. The present constitution and the city charter of 1862 both recognize the city of New Orleans as one of the political divisions of the state, and as one of the arms of sovereignty for governmental purposes. In the case of Egerton v. Municipality No. 3 of New Orleans, 1 La. Ann. 437, decided in 1846, the supreme court of Louisiana said: "It is a remarkable fact . . . that the people of Louisiana, in convention assembled, have twice considered the local government of this great metropolis as too important to be placed among those subordinate institutions, and have recognized the city of New Orleans, in its corporate capacity, as entitled to peculiar political powers and privileges. The right of the citizens of the city of New Orleans to appoint the several public officers necessary for the administration of the police of said city, . . . and the right of the officers thus appointed to be commissioned as justices of the peace, and to exercise such criminal jurisdiction for the punishment of minor crimes as the legislature may vest in them, are secured and rendered permanent by article 128 of the State Constitution. Those political franchises stand upon the same ground as any other constitutional power, and the city of New Orleans and its officers are, for purposes of police and good order, and for the punishment of minor crimes and offenses, permanent functionaries of the government." Underlining mine.

This decision was rendered under the régime of the Constitution of 1845, and the recognition of the local government of the city of New Orleans in the Constitutions of 1812 and of 1845, which the supreme court said was "a remarkable fact," has since then been emphasized by further recognition in the Constitutions of 1852 and 1879.

The Stewart Case, above cited, was affirmed, and its doctrine declared conclusive, in the case of Lewis v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 190, which was a suit against the city of New Orleans for the value of a slave incarcerated in the parish prison by order of his master, the city deriving a pecuniary profit by receiving from the master a per diem compensation for keeping the slave incarcerated. The slave having fallen sick, and the master not being notified, the action was brought to recover the slave's value from the city, because of the gross negligence of the jailer, the agent of the city. It will be noticed that the legal aspects of the Lewis Case are almost identical with the present case. The supreme court held: "The power of the corporation to erect a police jail, to employ officers to superintend it, and to pass ordinances for its government, is, in effect, a power granted for public purposes, and not private benefit or advantage. . . . According to the principle announced in Stewart v. New Orleans, 9 La. Ann. 461, 61 Am. Dec. 218, and which we consider conclusive upon the subject, the city cannot be held liable in the present case for the nonfeasance or misfeasance of the officers of the police jail." Underlining mine.

The doctrine of the Stewart Case was again affirmed in Bennett v. New Orleans, 14 La. Ann. 120. The court said: "It seems to be a well-settled principle in respect to the jurisdiction of courts that the sovereign cannot be sued without his consent. . . . This exemption from liability on the part of the government has been extended to municipal corporations vested with, and exercising portions of, the sovereign power, for the reason that such corporations are considered the representatives of the government, and that their exemption from suit is necessary to make the prerogative available to the government itself;" citing Stewart Case and other cases.

In the case of Hove v. New Orleans, 13 La. Ann. 432, the supreme court of Louisiana said: "The city is no general warrantor against the acts of individuals. . . . Its police may be applied to for the purpose of preventing injuries, but if such police err in their judgment, or if injuries are occasioned because they are inefficient in the exercise of the powers with which they are vested, the city at large cannot be held responsible for acts of third persons, which, under a more sagacious and efficient police, might possibly have been prevented." Underlining mine.

In the case of New Orleans, M. & O. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 26 La. Ann. 478, the supreme court of Louisiana again recognized the doctrine that a municipal corporation possesses two classes of rights—public and private. In all that relates to the one class, it is merely the agent of the state, and subject to its control,—and that, as to the other class, it is the agent of the inhabitants of the place,—the corporators. The court adopted the language of Judge Dillon, to the effect that municipal corporations possess a double character,—the one, governmental, legislative, or public; the other, in a sense, proprietary or private,—and that the distinction, though sometimes difficult to trace, is highly important, and is frequently referred to, particularly in the cases relating to the implied or common-law liability of municipal corporations for the negligence of their servants, agents, and officers in the execution of corporate duties and powers.

The distinction, which is fully recognized by the supreme court of Louisiana, between the public and the private powers and obligations of municipal corporations, has been just as fully recognized by the highest courts of many of the states. I refer only to a few of the many cases which state the distinction:

The case of Western College of Homeopathic Medicine v. Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 877, was an action against the city of Cleveland for damages caused to property by a mob. There being no statute in Ohio similar to the Louisiana Act No. 51 of 1855, it was attempted to hold the city of Cleveland responsible by reason of its city charter, which provided that: "It shall be the duty of the city council to regulate the police of the city, preserve the peace, prevent disturbances and disorderly assemblages." Underlining mine.

The supreme court of Ohio held that the duty intended was that properly appertaining to an administrative and legislative body acting in the government of a city,—the making regulations, by-laws, and ordinances for the purposes specified, to be enforced by the appointment of officers,—and that neither on general principles, nor from the effect of that enactment, was the city of Cleveland responsible for the destruction of property by a riotous assemblage, or for the neglect of the officers in not preserving the peace, and preventing such destruction. The court said: "It is the duty of the state government to secure to the citizens of the state the peaceful enjoyment of their property, and its protection from wrongful and violent acts. For the proper discharge of this duty, power is delegated in different modes. One of these is the establishment of municipal corporations. Powers and privileges are also conferred upon municipal corporations to be exercised for the benefit of the individuals of whom such corporations are composed, and, in connection with these powers and privileges, duties are sometimes specifically imposed. It is obvious that there is a distinction between those powers delegated to municipal corporations to preserve the peace, and protect persons and property, whether to be exercised by legislation or the appointment of proper officers, and those powers and privileges which are to be exercised for the improvement of the territory comprised within the limits of the corporation, and its adaptation to the purposes of residence and business. As to the first, the municipal corporation represents the state,—discharging duties incumbent on the state. As to the second, the municipal corporation represents the pecuniary and proprietary interests of individuals. As to the first, responsibility for acts done or omitted is governed by the same rule of responsibility which applies to like delegations of power. As to the second, the rules which govern the responsibility of individuals are properly applicable."

A demurrer to the petition was sustained.

The case of Ulrich v. St. Louis, 112 Mo. 188, decided by the supreme court of Missouri, was an action in which the plaintiff alleged that, while incarcerated in the workhouse of St. Louis, he was disabled for life by the negligence of the jailer. A general demurrer having been filed to the petition, the demurrer was sustained by the lower court, and the cause dismissed. The action of the lower court was sustained by the supreme court. In the course of its decision the court said: "The rule of law is well settled in this state that a municipal corporation is not answerable in damages for the negligent acts of its officers in the execution of such powers as are conferred on the corporation for the public good;" citing cases.

The court cited approvingly the language of Judge Dillon, as follows: "The police regulations of a city are not made and enforced in the interest of the city, in its corporate capacity, but in the interest of the public;" citing numerous cases.

In the case of Rusher v. Dallas, 88 Tex. 151, decided by the supreme court of Texas, it was held that a complaint, in a suit against a city, which alleges the arrest of the plaintiff by a city policeman for a supposed violation of a city ordinance, of which violation he was in fact innocent; that the arrest was made without a warrant or an affidavit; that unnecessary violence was used by the policeman; and that the policeman was incompetent, to the knowledge of the city,—states no cause of action. The court said, inter alia: "A distinction is made where the act is done in promotion of the interest of the city, in its special corporate rights, and when done in the interest of the public. Where a city has special powers granted by charter, other than those concerning the public good and government of its citizens, so that its officers' acts thereunder are the acts of agents, and not of public officers, the city may become liable; but not where the act is that of an officer in enforcing ordinances of social government, or a general law of the land."

In Whitfield v. Paris, 15 L. R. A. 783, 84 Tex. 481, decided by the supreme court of Texas, where a policeman appointed by the city to kill dogs negligently and recklessly discharged his gun at a dog, and seriously injured the plaintiff, a demurrer to the petition was sustained, and the action of the lower court affirmed by the supreme court. The court said: "The enactment of the ordinance referred to in the petition [an ordinance directing the killing of dogs by a policeman] was an exercise by the city of its police power. Its purpose was to secure the safety, health, and welfare of the public. The man whose act was complained of was not, therefore, a mere servant or employé, though the petition so denominates him. He occupied the attitude of a policeman engaged in the enforcement of an ordinance of the city. In such a case the maxim, 'respondent superior,' does not apply. Where a city acts as the agent of the state, it becomes the representative of sovereignty. It is not acting in the management of its private or corporate concerns, but in the interest of the public, and as the guardian of the health, peace, convenience, and welfare of the public. Under such circumstances, it is not liable for the acts of its officers or employés engaged in the execution of its ordinances;" citing numerous cases.

In the case of O'Rourke v. Sioux Falls (8. Dak.) 19 L. R. A. 789, a demurrer was sustained to a complaint setting out that plaintiff had suffered great personal injuries by the firing of a cannon in the streets of the city in violation of a city ordinance. The complaint alleged that the city had appointed and continued in office a careless, inefficient, and negligent police force; that, with the full knowledge on the part of the members of the common council that it was to be done, the police officers permitted said cannon to be fired in the street after dark, and at a time when it could not be discovered by travelers on the street. The court said: "There are two kinds of duties imposed upon a municipal corporation, in respect to which there is a clear distinction: One is imposed for governmental purposes, and is discharged in the interest of the public; and the other arises from the grant of some special power, in the exercise of which the municipality acts as a legal individual. In the latter case, the power is not held or exercised by the municipality as or because it is one of the political subdivisions of the state, and for public governmental purposes, but as and because it is, as an individual might be, the grantee of such power for private purposes. In such case the municipality is on the same footing with a private grantee of the same power, and is, like him, liable for an injury caused by the improper use of such power. But where the power is conferred upon the municipality as one of the political divisions of the state, and conferred, not for any benefit to result therefrom to such municipality, but as a means in the exercise of the sovereign power for the benefit of the public, the corporation is not answerable for non-feasance or malfeasance by its public agents." Cases cited. Underlining mine.

Similarly, it has been held that a city is not responsible for the destruction of a building to stop the spread of fire (Correas v. San Francisco, 1 Cal. 452); that the city of New Orleans was not liable for the neglect of firemen in not extinguishing fires (Fule v. New Orleans, 25 La. Ann. 394); that a municipality is not responsible for neglecting to take precautions to prevent the spread of smallpox. Iowa Case; Field, Damages, p. 88, § 87. The cases cited are but a few of the adjudications on the subject, but they are amply sufficient to show that the distinction between the public and private duties and powers of municipal corporations is well established throughout the country.

But four cases have come under my observation in which actions have been brought against municipalities for loss of human life:

Bits v. Austin, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 455, in which the court of civil appeals of Texas held that a Texas statute which allows actual damages for the death of any person through the wrongful act, neglect, or default of "another" allows recovery only against natural persons, and not against corporations; Aitchison v. Twine, 9 Kan. 356; Dale County v. Gunter, 46 Ala. 118; and Luke v. Callhoun County, 52 Ala. 115. The three cases last cited were brought under special statutes distinctly giving a right of action against a municipality or county for loss of life at the hands of a mob.

It is true, as Judge Dillon remarks, that it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a particular case comes under the operation of the governmental, or of the private, powers and duties of a municipal corporation. The difficulty naturally increases as particular cases approach nearer to the line which divides the two sets of powers and obligations. But the instant case presents no difficulty in that respect. It seems to me that it would be impossible to state an instance of public or governmental duty and power which would be plainer or more obvious than that which the instant case presents. I am perfectly clear that the duty, the nonperformance of which is here complained of, was a duty of sovereignty, transferred by the sovereign to the city of New Orleans, and that in its performance the city was merely the representative of the sovereign. I am equally clear that in the exercise of this governmental power the city officers, quoad their acts under that power, are virtually state functionaries, acting for and on behalf of the state. In my judgment, the same exemption as to liability exists in this case in favor of the city as would exist in favor of the state, if state officers, by the nonperformance of duty prescribed by a state law appertaining to the governmental powers and duties of the state, had been guilty of the nonfeasance here complained of.

It may be that there are cases of extreme hardship where no redress can be had because of the malfeasance or nonfeasance of the officers of a municipality in the exercise of its governmental powers. The law of Canute the Dane making the vills responsible for the homicides committed within their limits, and King Alfred's law making the inhabitants of the tithings free pledges to the king for all offenses committed in their districts, may have been wise laws. It may be that every one should have an interest in preventing violence, and maintaining the public peace. But these are considerations which address themselves exclusively to the law-maker. The courts cannot legislate. They can but apply the law as they find it.

To summarize my conclusions:

1. Act No. 51 of 1855, providing that municipal corporations shall be liable for the destruction of "property" by mobs, does not sustain an action for the taking of human life.

2. The obligations of the city of New Orleans are of two kinds: The first consists of public or governmental duties; the second, of private or proprietary duties. As to the former the city is the representative of the sovereign, and enjoys the exemption of sovereignty from liability to suit. As to the latter, the city may be sued for tort, or on contract, as a private corporation might be sued.

3. The duty of the city, upon the nonperformance of which this action is founded, is a public, governmental duty.

Therefore, the exception of no cause of action must be sustained, and the cause dismissed.

The privilege of acquiring tide lands given to a certain class of persons by the Act of March 26, 1890, is not a vested right, but by subsequent statute may be taken away from one who has not availed himself of the privilege, but merely continued in possession of the adjoining lands, as he was when the privilege was created.

In this case the state, by its law of March 26, 1890, section 11, said that the improver or the upland owner, as the case might be, "shall have the right, for sixty days following the final appraisal of the tide lands, to purchase all or any part of the tide lands in front of the lands so owned," or the lands covered by his improvement.

Plaintiff has done nothing, he has paid nothing, he has suffered nothing. The state has made a proposal to him and he has not even accepted it by filing his application to purchase, describing his lands by metes and bounds, as he might have done at any time since March 26, 1890. There is no consideration moving to the state from him, and no agreement on his part to be bound under the law.

The law of March 26, 1890, is a mere tender, that can be withdrawn at any time before execution. The right given to remain upon the land is not a grant, but a mere license, and can be revoked without notice, by the legislature.

their contract rights were, severally, asserted by the parties concerned and fully sustained by the courts, not an element of contract can be found, in any or either of them, that is not found ingrained in the relations established between this respondent and the state of Washington, by the Act of March 26, 1890. In each case, as in the case at bar, the contract set up had its origin in an act of the legislature. In each case the state promised certain things conditioned upon the other party doing certain other things. In no one of the cases was there any contemporaneous promise or agreement by the party asserting a contract, to do or perform anything whatever. The party asserting a contract went ahead and did that which the requirements specified by the other party contemplated, or entered upon their performance and then asserted his or their contract to the agreed equivalent, and in each case was sustained in such claim.

Dunbar, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, claiming right to purchase certain tide lands under the Act of March 26, 1890, brought his action against the defendant, W. T. Forrest, commissioner of public lands, to restrain him from entering into a contract with one Eugene Sample, who had made application under the Act of March 9, 1893, entitled, "An act prescribing the ways in which waterways for the uses of navigation may be excavated by private contract; providing for liens upon tide and shore lands belonging to the state; granting rights of way across lands belonging to the state," etc. The complaint set up the necessary qualifications of the plaintiff under the Act of March 26, 1890. Defendant demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant, resting upon his demurrer, refused to plead further. Judgment was awarded the plaintiff, and defendant appeals to this court.

The sole question to be determined is, Does the Law of March 26, 1890, entitled, "An act for the appraising and disposing of the tide and shore lands belonging to the state of Washington," constitute a contract between the state and the class of privileged persons mentioned in said act which the legislature cannot annul or change by a subsequent enactment? Or, in other words, did the said class of privileged persons obtain any vested rights in the tide lands of the state by reason of said enactment, and is the said Act of March 9, 1893, an impairment of the obligation of a contract between the state and the said privileged class of persons. It has been the uniform holding of this court that the ownership of the tide and shore lands is in the state of Washington, and the power to deal conclusively with them is in the state, subject only to the power of the federal government to prevent the obstruction, impairment or injurious modification of navigable waters. See Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. 236, 13 L. R. A. 632, and all subsequent cases on that subject. The attorneys for both appellant and respondent have prepared elaborate and painstaking briefs in this case, but it seems plain to us that the respondent obtained no vested rights whatever under the Act of March 26, 1890; that no contract whatever was entered into between the state and the respondent, but that his right to purchase under the conditions named in the act was simply a privilege which he had a right to exercise only while the law remained in force. We do not think that the cases cited by respondent in any manner sustain his contention. Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 8 L. ed. 162, is a long and exceedingly interesting case. It is true that the court there decided that when a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested in that contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest those rights. This doctrine, we take it, will not be disputed anywhere. But in that case there was an actual grant of lands made by the legislature. The court stated that the lands in controversy vested absolutely in the grantees; that the grant, when issued, conveyed an estate in fee simple to the grantee, clothed with all the solemnities which the law can bestow. The court also held that the grant in that case was a contract executed, and that the fact that the legislature which had passed the prior act had been stimulated to do so by and through corrupt means would not justify a subsequent legislature in destroying vested rights which had grown up under the prior law, and which involved innocent purchasers. There is nothing in that case, we think, that in any way sustains the contention of respondent. In New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 29 L. ed. 525, it was decided that a legislative grant of an exclusive right to supply water to a municipality and its inhabitants through pipes and mains laid in the public streets, and upon the condition of the performance of the service by the grantee, is a grant of a franchise, and vests in the grantee in consideration of the performance of a public service, and after performance by the grantee, is a contract protected by the constitution of the United States against state legislation to impair it. It will be seen that this was an executed contract, and that the decision was based upon the fact that the grantee had performed his part of the contract. St. Tammany Water Works Co. v. New Orleans Water Works Co. 120 U. S. 64, 80 L. ed. 563, is the same kind of a case, and the decision is based upon the principle announced in New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Rivers, supra. People v. Board of State Auditors, 9 Mich. 326, was where, under an act to encourage the manufacture of salt in the state of Michigan, approved February 15, 1859, a bounty of ten cents per barrel had been offered to manufacturers, and afterwards, viz., on March 15, 1861, the law had been changed. It was held, on application for mandamus, that the manufacturers were entitled to the bounty on a certain number of barrels of salt which had been manufactured before the passage of the Act of March 15, 1861. We hardly see how the law could have been construed in any other way, the only defense to the action being that the claim had not been presented until after the enactment of the new law. Montgomery v. Kesson, 16 Cal. 189, is a case brought under the grant of swamp lands. The court there held that the grant was a grant upon condition precedent. The grant was to certain individuals, on condition of certain drainage ditches and canals being constructed; but the case specially recites that the said grantees have, pursuant to said act, commenced the construction of said canals provided for by the said act. "It is a contract," says the court, "by which the state grants certain lands upon condition of work to be performed, the grant to take effect when the work is done. It is a contract by which valuable rights may be acquired absolutely upon the performance of the acts specified as the consideration moving to the state. The grantees, as appears from the evidence in the record, and as found by the referee, entered upon the performance of those acts in the fall of 1857. They then employed an engineer, and surveyed the line of the proposed canals, and in February following commenced the work of excavating one of the canals, and continued the same without cessation until June, 1858. They thus brought themselves within the terms of the first section, providing for the commencement of 'the canals or some one of them,' within one year after the passage of the act." Under this statement of facts the court holds that, by part performance of the contract, the grantees had acquired rights with which the legislature could not interfere by subsequent enactment. But the case at bar is altogether different. The respondent has done nothing. It is true that he has remained in possession of the lands and of the improvements, but he was in possession at the time of the passage of the law. He has made no application to purchase the lands. He has made no payments. It is not even known by the state that he desires to avail himself of the privilege which he had under the Law of March 26, 1890, to purchase. He has entered into no contract with the state, and could not be bound to the performance of any contract. He has made no agreement to bind himself or to do anything whatever in the premises. No action for specific performance would lie against him. There is no mutuality whatever and no other element of a contract between the respondent and the state. The ordinarily accepted definition of a contract is an agreement between two or more parties to do or not to do a particular thing. This case does not fall within this or any other definition of a contract.

It would be unfortunate indeed if the tide lands of the state were to be tied up, awaiting for an indefinite time the movement of a class of persons who, under the first law that was passed in relation to them, were privileged to purchase them under conditions expressed, and that the state should not be allowed to change the conditions of its proposals at any time before the proposals were accepted by those in whose interest the law was enacted. Such a theory has never been sustained by the law in relation to lands of any character. On the contrary, it has been held in Frisbie v. Whitney, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 187, 19 L. ed. 668, that occupation and improvement on the public lands, with a view to pre-emption, do not confer a vested right in the lands so occupied; and such a vested right under the pre-emption laws is only obtained when the purchase money has been paid, and the receipt of the proper land officer given, to the purchaser; that, until this is done, it is within the legal and constitutional competency of congress to withdraw the land from entry or sale, though this may defeat the imperfect right of the settler. And, adopting the opinion of Attorney-General Cushing, the court says: "Persons who go upon the public land with a view to cultivate now, and to purchase hereafter, possess no rights against the United States except such as the acts of congress confer; and these acts do not confer on the pre-emptor in posse any right or claim to be treated as the present proprietor of the land in relation to the government. . . . A mere entry upon land, with continued occupancy and improvement thereof, gives no vested interest in it. It may, however, give, under our national land system, a privilege of pre-emption. But this is only a privilege conferred on the settler to purchase land in preference to others. His settlement protects him from intrusion or purchase by others, but confers no right against the government." This, we think, is plainly analogous to the laws governing the sale of tide lands. A privilege was conferred upon the respondent by the Law of March 26, 1890. That privilege was accorded him in preference to others to purchase the tide lands and he would have been protected under the laws then in force against the intrusion or purchase by any other person, but no right was conferred upon him against the state. The case of Frisbie v. Whitney, supra, goes very far beyond the necessary holding in this case to reverse the judgment, for there it appears that something had been done by the applicant. The court says: "The argument is urged with much zeal that, because complainant did all that was in the power of any one to do towards perfecting his claim he should not be held responsible for what could not be done. To this we reply, as we did in the case of Rector v. Ashley, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 142, 18 L. ed. 738, that the rights of a claimant are to be measured by the acts of congress, and not by what he may or may not be able to do, and if a sound construction of these acts shows that he had acquired no vested interest in the land, then, as his rights are created by the statutes, they must be governed by their provisions, whether they are hard or lenient." The same doctrine obtains in Butchings v. Low, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 77, 21 L. ed. 83. There it was held that a party by mere settlement upon lands of the United States, with a declared intention to obtain a title to the same, under the pre-emption laws, does not thereby acquire such a vested interest in the premises as to deprive congress of the power to devise it by a grant to another party; that the power of regulation and disposition over the lands of the United States, conferred upon congress by the constitution, only ceases under the pre-emption laws when all the preliminary acts prescribed by those laws for the acquisition of the title, including payment of the price of the land, have been performed by the settler; that the legislation thus adopted for the benefit of settlers was not intended to deprive congress of the power to make any other disposition of the lands before they are offered for sale, or to appropriate them to any public use. In Campbell v. Wade, 132 U. S. 84, 33 L. ed. 240, it was held that the statutes of the state of Texas providing for the sale of a portion of the vacant and unappropriated public lands of the state did not appear to confer upon a person making application under them for survey of a part of said lands, and paying the fees for filing and recording the same, a vested interest in such lands which could not be impaired by the subsequent withdrawal of them from sale under the provisions of the later statute; and the doctrine of Frisbie v. Whitney and Hutchings v. Low was reaffirmed. It seems to us that under all authority, as well as on principles of sound public policy, it must be decided that the respondent obtained no vested rights under the Act of March 26, 1890, and that the Act of March 9, 1893, should not be construed as an impairment of any contract between the state and the parties who are privileged to purchase under the provisions of the act.

All the other questions raised in the brief are decided against the contention of respondent.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court, with instructions to sustain appellant's demurrer to respondent's complaint.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

Dooly BLOCK et al., Respts.,
v.

SALT LAKE RAPID TRANSIT CO., Appt.

(9 Utah, 81.)

1. The grantees of lots under the town site act of congress have the right and privilege to have a street on which the lots abut forever kept open.
2. The rights of abutting owners to use a street as a means of access to their lots and for light and air is the same where the fee of the street is held by a city in trust for the use of the public as where the fee is owned by the abutting owners.
3. The legislature in delegating power over streets to municipal corporations cannot authorize any action which will materially injure the property of abutters in the right of access to their property, and to light and air.
4. If the construction of an additional track for a street railway company would be an unnecessary obstruction to and interference with the ordinary use of the street, and the track privileges of an existing railroad company are sufficient for the business of two or more companies, they should all be obliged to use them in common.
5. An injunction to prevent the laying of an additional track for a street railroad in a street may be granted to abutters, where the track would constitute an unnecessary interference to travel, and an especial injury to the property rights of abutters.
6. Findings of fact in a chancery case are conclusive in the appellate court, unless they are so manifestly erroneous as to demonstrate some oversight or mistake.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of Salt Lake County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin defendant from laying street railway tracks in the street in front of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams & Van Cott and C. B. Jack for appellant.

Messrs. Bennett, Marshall & Bradley for respondents.

Bartch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondents are the owners of certain lots situate in Salt Lake City, and abutting on Second South street, between Main and Second West streets. Two of these lots, one on the north, the other on the south, side of Second South street, are one block west of Main street, are business property, and at the time of the trial of the cause business blocks were being erected thereon. The complaint, in substance, charges that the plaintiffs were respectively the owners of that portion of the street which lies between the center line thereof and the front line of the said lots, subject only to the ordinary use of the public for the purposes of travel; that the plaintiffs are entitled to the free and unobstructed use

NOTE.—The above case is in line with a marked tendency manifest in the later cases to abolish the distinction formerly maintained as to the rights of abutting owners when the fee of the highway was in them and when it was in the public. of the street as a means of access to the said premises; that by authority of Salt Lake City the Salt Lake City Railroad Company constructed on that street a double-track railroad, with wires, poles, and other appurtenances necessary to operate the same with electric power; that the same was being so operated, and afforded all necessary means and convenience to persons who might have occasion to travel on street railroads; that telegraph and telephone lines, and wires and poles for electric light, had been constructed on the street and that by reason of the several uses with which it had thus been burdened the ordinary use thereof for public travel and ingress and egress to the several premises had become impeded and embarrassed; that on the 6th day of May, 1890, and after the said street had been burdened as aforesaid, Salt Lake City, by its council, granted the defendant herein authority to construct and operate, by electric power, a street railroad on said street from First East to Seventh West street; that because of the obstructions already existing thereon, and because another railroad was not necessary for public convenience, the resolution granting the franchise to the defendant was unreasonable and void; that, in pursuance of the authority thus granted, the defendant commenced the construction of a railroad, and threatened to complete the same unless restrained; and that another railroad constructed thereon with its equipments and operation, in addition to the already burdened condition of the street, would greatly depreciate the value of the plaintiff's property, and injure its convenient use and enjoyment. The defendant, in its cross-complaint, in substance alleges that it owns and operates various lines of street railroads in the city and remote parts thereof, and in densely populated localities in the eastern portion of the city; that for public convenience it should have a line through the business portion of the city, to connect with railway depots and other parts of the city lying west of Main street; that defendant had no franchise connecting its eastern lines with the western portion of the city through the business part thereof, except the one on Second South street; and that in the granting of franchises the city has denied the right to parallel existing lines except in this instance. The trial court, in substance, found the above allegations of the plaintiffs and defendant to be true, and, among other things, found as facts that the plaintiffs are the owners of equitable easements in fee of rights of access, ingress, and egress to their respective lots in front thereof in the street, and entitled to the free and unobstructed use of that portion of said street as a means of access, such easements extending along the street from the first north and south street east of said lots to the first north and south street west of such lots, the same being subject to the ordinary use of the street by the public; that the fee of the street is in Salt Lake City, in trust for street uses proper; that prior to the granting of said franchise by the city there were constructed and in operation on that street a double-track street railroad, telegraph and telephone lines, wires and poles for electric lighting, and the street had already become greatly obstructed, and access to plaintiff's property impeded and embarrassed; that because of the obstructions already existing upon the street the resolution attempting to grant the franchise to the defendant was unreasonable and void; that the two tracks in operation on said street were sufficient to satisfy the demands of public convenience, and there was no necessity for a third track; that its construction would greatly depreciate the value of plaintiffs' property, interfere with its convenient use and enjoyment, and they would thereby suffer irreparable damage; "that Salt Lake City, in granting the franchise to defendant, did not act within its lawful authority, nor exercise reasonable discretion for the best interests or convenience of the public; that the two tracks were constructed and are being operated in front of said lots by the Salt Lake City Railroad Company, and are sufficient to permit the passage of all street-cars necessary for public convenience, and between the third track, proposed to be constructed, and the sidewalk there would not remain sufficient space for the ordinary traffic of the street, free from unreasonable obstructions; that the defendant has electric street-car lines in operation in the eastern and western portions of said city, but has no other connecting line or franchise except the one on said Second South street passing through the business portion of the city, or reaching the depots of the several steam railroads, such connecting line being of great importance to the defendant, and necessary for the public travel; that the defendant company and the Salt Lake City Railroad Company can operate both of their railways together by means of the two tracks of the last-mentioned company now on that street, which tracks afford sufficient privileges for all the cars operated, or necessary to be operated, by both companies, for public travel and convenience; and that the construction and maintenance of a third track would be an unnecessary obstruction and interference with the ordinary use of the street, and the means of access to plaintiffs' premises would be unreasonably and materially abridged and injured. Upon this state of facts the trial court granted an injunction perpetually restraining the defendant from constructing and operating a third track on said Second South street. The defendant moved the court for a new trial upon the following grounds: First. "Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the court and decree in said case, and that the same were against law." Second. "Errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant." From the order overruling this motion the defendant appealed to this court.

This leads to the inquiry as to whether or not the construction and operation of the third track upon that street by the defendant involves the taking of property of the plaintiffs, and as to whether the city council of Salt Lake City exceeded its limits of discretion and authority in granting the franchise to defendant. The plaintiffs contend that they are the owners in fee of the lots above mentioned abutting on Second South street, and, as such abutting owners, they are entitled to so much of the bed of the street as lies immediately in front of the lots and to the center of the street, on which the proposed third track is to be built, subject only to the ordinary use of the same for the purposes of public travel, and that they are entitled to the use of said street, free from unreasonable obstructions, as a means of access, light, and air to their premises. The defendant maintains that the fee of said street is vested in the corporation of Salt Lake City, and that plaintiffs have no property therein, but are only entitled to the use thereof in common with the people of the city. The plaintiffs admit that the fee is in the city, in trust, however, for street uses proper, and subject to the equitable easements in fee of abutters. The lots and street in question are a part of a larger tract entered under section 2887 (U. S. Rev. Stat.), which provided that the corporate authorities might enter any portion of the public lands settled upon and occupied as a town site, "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests." Plaintiffs' lots were represented on the original plat of Salt Lake City as fronting Second South street, which was platted in said plat, and when they were purchased under the forms prescribed by the town site act the grantees secured the right and privilege to have the street forever kept open. When land is settled upon and occupied as a town site, and lots are sold, the right of way over the streets in front of such lots is an appurtenance of necessity, and it requires no special grant in the deed. Ashby v. Hall, 119 U. S. 526, 80 L. ed. 469; Salisbury v. Andrews, 128 Mass. 336.

The rights of access, light, and air constitute the principal values of such property, and it must be presumed that when lots are sold the grantees purchase them with a view to the advantages and benefits which attach to them because of these easements. The right of the grantee to their use is precisely the same as his right to the property itself. Such privileges are easements in fee,—incorporeal hereditaments,—and form a part of the estate in the lots. They attach at the time the land is platted and the lots are sold, and will remain a perpetual incumbrance upon the land burdened with them. It follows that, when land is platted by the owner of the soil, and lots sold, bounded by a street designated and marked on the plat, the grantee acquires a right to the street in front of the premises as a means of access. 1 Hare, Const. Law, 376; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 114; Story v. New York Elec. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Wyman v. New York, 11 Wend. 487; Child v. Chappell, 9 N. Y. 246; Schulte v. North Pacific Transp. Co. 50 Cal. 592; Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113.

Nor does it matter, in this case, that the fee is in the city in trust for the use of the public, instead of in the abutting owner in trust for street uses. Equally in both cases the abutting owners are entitled to the use of the street as a means of access to their lots, and for light and air. If the fee is in the city, the rights of the abutter are in the nature of equitable easements in fee; if in the abutter, they are in their nature legal. In either case the abutters have the right to have the street kept open and not obstructed so as to interfere with their easements, and materially diminish the value of their property. When the lots of plaintiffs were sold under the town site act, above mentioned, it was, in effect, agreed with the grantees that they were entitled to the use of the street as a means of ingress, egress, light, and air. These rights were inducements to purchasers, became a part of the purchase, are appurtenances to the land which cannot be so embarrassed or abridged as to materially interfere with its proper use and enjoyment, and they are, in effect, property of which the owners cannot be deprived without due compensation. By implication, at least, the grantees also assumed additional burdens, for they must contribute of their own funds for the expense of sewer, gas, and water connections, and as well towards the cost of sidewalks, paving, and sprinkling in front of their lots. These are expenditures which devolve upon them as abutting owners, and, in addition to the relation of their lots to the street give them a special interest in the street in front of their premises, distinct from that of the public at large. Assuming such burdens, they may of right make any and all proper uses of the street, subject to proper and reasonable municipal control and police regulations. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 115; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 556a, 556b; McQuaid v. Portland & V. R. Co. 18 Or. 237; Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 88; Story v. New York Elec. R. Co. supra.

The right of municipalities to grant franchises to private corporations for the construction and operation of street railways, when empowered by the legislature so to do, is not now, it seems, an open question, although streets were originally not designed for that purpose, but were mostly confined to the right of public travel in the ordinary modes. Enlightened public policy, advanced civilization, and a desire to subserve public interest, have induced courts to become more lax in the enforcement of strict technical rules and principles in this regard, and it appears now to be well settled by judicial authority that a reasonable portion of a street may be devoted for the purposes of a street railway, and that such is a proper use of the street.

Counsel for appellant contend that, subject to special constitutional restrictions, the legislature has plenary power over all public ways and streets. If this position be tenable, then, in the absence of special constitutional restrictions, the legislature may authorize municipalities to devote the entire width of a street to railroad uses, regardless of the property rights of abutting owners, without compensation for injury to their property. This theory does not appear to be sustained by the authorities. The legislature may delegate power over streets to municipalities, but in doing so it must recognize the property rights of private individuals. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (vol. 2, § 656a), speaking of the nature of streets, and legislative control, says: "Public streets, squares, and commons, unless there be some special restriction when the same are dedicated or acquired, are for the public use, and the use is none the less for the public at large, as distinguished from the municipality, because they are situate within the limits of the latter, and because the legislature may have given the supervision, control, and regulation of them to the local authorities. The legislature of the state represents the public at large, and has, in the absence of special constitutional restraint, and subject (according to the weight of more recent judicial opinion) to the property rights and easements of abutting owners, full and paramount authority over all public ways and public places." It will be observed that the learned author distinctly recognizes "the property rights and easements of abutting owners," and, subject to these, the legislature "has full and paramount authority over all public ways and public places." Up to within a comparatively recent date, the current of judicial opinion drew a distinction between cases where the fee was in the abutting owner, subject to street uses proper, and those where the fee was in the municipality in trust for the use of the public. In the latter class of cases it was uniformly held that the power of the legislature to authorize the construction of a railroad on the street of a city was paramount, and that it could delegate such power to the local authorities. Of the exercise of this power the abutting owner could not complain, and had no right to compensation for injury to his easement caused by the appropriation of the street to such purposes. In the former class of cases he was entitled to compensation for the injury sustained by such appropriation. The case of Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 489, 16 Am. Rep. 624, supports this view. Mr. Justice Scott, in deciding the case, said: "A distinction has been taken where the municipality granting the right to lay the track owns the fee in the streets, and where the fee remains in the abutting owner, and it seems to us that it rests on sound principle, and is supported by the highest authority." That case was decided in January, 1878, and such, it must be conceded, was the weight of authority at that time. Then the cases turned upon the question whether the fee was in the public or in the abutter, in many of them without close inquiry as to the exact limitation of the fee; and it was almost universally held that if the fee was in the abutter, the legislature could not authorize a private corporation to construct a railroad on a public street without compensation to the abutter, and likewise it was almost universally held that, if the fee was in the public, the legislature could authorize the street to be used for such purpose without compensation to him. Since then the whole subject has undergone deliberate reconsideration, and the weight of recent judicial decision seems to abrogate the distinction and treat the easements of abutting owners as property rights forming part of the estate in the property, except in cases where the public owns the absolute fee of the street 34 L. R. A.

and the fee is not limited to street uses proper. In such cases the tendency is still to hold that the legislature, in the absence of special constitutional restraint, may authorize a railroad company to use the street of a city for its roadbed without compensation to the abutter. It might be observed, however, that even in this class of cases there seems to be no just or satisfactory reason why such a use of a street, which is specially beneficial to the grantee of the franchise, and causes a special injury to the abutter, should be within the absolute control of the legislature, without regard to the property rights of the abutting owner. Speaking of the nature of public streets and of the rights of the abutter and of the public, Judge Dillon (Mun. Corp. § 656a), observes: "The full conception of the true nature of a public street in a city, as respects the rights of the public on the one hand and the rights of the adjoining owner on the other, has been slowly evolved from experience. It has been only at a recent period in our legal history that these two distinct rights have, separately and in their relations to each other, come to be understood and defined with precision. The injustice to the abutting owner arising from the exercise of unrestrained legislative power over streets in cities was such that the abutter necessarily sought legal redress, and the discussion thence ensuing led to a more careful ascertainment of the nature of streets, and of the rights of the adjoining owner in respect thereof. It was seen that he had, in common with the rest of the public, a right of passage. But it was also further seen that he had rights not shared by the public at large, special and peculiar to himself, and which arose out of the very relation of his lot to the street in front of it; and that these rights, whether the bare fee of the street was in the lot owner or in the city, were rights of property, and, as such, ought to be, and were, sacred from legislative invasion as his right to the lot itself." In support of this view of the question he cites, among numerous other cases, Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. supra, which is the leading recent case in New York on this subject. In this case Justice Danforth, after an elaborate and exhaustive review of the authorities, concludes: "In whatever way, therefore, we view the plaintiff's case, the result is the same,—a right of property in the street, with which, until properly appropriated and compensation made, the defendant cannot interfere." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 704; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268; Florida Southern R. Co. v. Brown, 28 Fla. 104; Mahady v. Bushwick R. Co. 91 N. Y. 148, 48 Am. Rep. 661; Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Reinhackle, 15 Neb. 279; Cincinnati & S. G. A. R. Co. v. Cummins, 14 Ohio St. 523; New York Elev. R. Co. v. Fifth Nat. Bank of New York, 185 U. S. 493, 34 L. ed. 282; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 273, 19 L. ed. 74; Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 66 Miss. 279, 4 L. R. A. 789.

In this case the learned court found that the fee of Second South street is in Salt Lake City, in trust for street uses proper; and of this appellant does not complain. Therefore, under the law as applied to this class of cases, plaintiffs have property rights in the street in front of their lots, and the street is not subject to the absolute control of the legislature, nor can the legislature confer such control upon the city council. While the legislature can authorize municipal authorities to permit private corporations to construct and operate street-railway lines upon the street, the authority thus conferred must be exercised within the limits of reasonable discretion, and not so as to materially injure the property of abutters. And this leads to a consideration of the power exercised in this case. Did the city council, in granting the franchise, act within the scope of its authority, and with a reasonable exercise of discretion? Section 840, 1 Comp. Laws Utah, 1888, authorizes Salt Lake City as follows: "To exclusively control, regulate, repair, amend, and clear the streets" etc., "and open, widen, straighten, or vacate streets," etc., "and prevent the incumbering of the streets in any manner, and protect the same from any encroachment and injury." If "to exclusively control the streets" were taken alone and construed literally, it might confer plenary power, and then, if this were not subjected to judicial control, the abutting owners could have no redress, though the injury to their property, caused by acts of the city council, might be very great, but it is also provided to "prevent incumbering of the streets in any manner, and to protect the same from any encroachment and injury;" and this is just what respondents ask for in this case. It is apparent from this section that the legislature intended to confer no power that would injuriously affect the property rights of abutting owners. Subdivision 5, § 889, Id., referring to the powers of Salt Lake City, provides: "To direct and control the location of railroad tracks and depot grounds within the city, and regulate or prohibit the use of locomotive engines thereon, and may require the cars to be used within the inhabited portions thereof to be drawn or propelled by other power than that of steam." This is the statute law of this territory, relied on by counsel for appellant, as applicable to this case. Construed in the light of reason and justice, these enactments do not authorize the city council to grant a railroad franchise if the construction of the road will injure and materially depreciate the value of the property of abutters. When the railroad company has obtained, under the law of eminent domain or otherwise, in cases where the streets are already burdened to the extent that natural justice will allow, a right of way, then the council has the power "to direct and control" the location of the tracks.

According to the evidence, as appears from the record in this case, Second South street is one of the principal business streets running east and west, and at the date of the granting of the franchise to the defendant and of the trial of the cause there were in operation upon that street two railroad tracks, which were located in the center of the street, with a line of poles between them. There were also many electric light, telegraph, and telephone poles placed in line on each side of the street about four feet from the sidewalk, and on these poles were stretched numerous electric wires. The two tracks in operation were constructed with T rails, which project several inches above the surface of the street, and render the crossing of the tracks with vehicles difficult and dangerous, the street not being paved. The appellant proposed to construct its track in a similar way on the north side of the present tracks, and to erect additional poles, which would still further obstruct the ordinary travel, and render the respondents' property less accessible for business purposes. The tracks already upon said street afford ample facilities to run all the cars necessary for public convenience; and the construction of the third track would be a serious impediment to the ordinary mode of travel, as it would not leave sufficient space between the outside rails and the gutter for vehicles to pass each other with safety. Where the track privileges of one company on a city street are sufficient for the business of two or more companies, they should all be required to use them in common. The construction of an additional track, under the circumstances of this case, would be an unnecessary obstruction to and interference with the ordinary use of the street, and a special injury to the property rights of the abutters, and on proper application a court of chancery may grant injunctive relief. In such a case an abutting owner need not stand by and see his property injured without having any means of redress. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 661; Utine v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 54 Am. Rep. 661, 53 Am. Rep. 123; Ogden City R. Co. v. Ogden City, 7 Utah, 207; Pond v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 112 N. Y. 186; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. supra.

Counsel for appellant insist that the several findings of fact to the effect that the construction of the third track would be an unreasonable obstruction of the street, and that the granting of the franchise for that purpose by the city council was unlawful, and an unreasonable exercise of discretion, are not justified by the evidence. There appears to be some conflict in the evidence on this point, but, the learned judge having heard the evidence, and having had the opportunity to observe the manner and bearing of the witnesses while testifying, this court will not disturb the conclusions reached, especially since the record shows them to be fair and logical deductions from the testimony. Where a case is tried in a court sitting as a court of chancery, the findings of fact are conclusive in the appellate court, unless they are so manifestly erroneous as to demonstrate some oversight or mistake. Wells v. Wells, 7 Utah, 68; Ullman v. McCormick, 19 Colo. 553; Doe v. Vallejo, 29 Cal. 386; Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 567; Coolidge v. Smith, 129 Mass. 554.

The record reveals no material error committed during the conduct of the trial, and we are of the opinion that the act of the city council of Salt Lake City granting the franchise to the appellant was unlawful, as being an unreasonable exercise of discretion, and is therefore of no avail to it.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Isaac J. BEAR et al., Trustees of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, at Salem, Michigan,

v.

1. The constitution of a church recognized and acquiesced in as the organic law of the church for more than fifty years must be held to have been regularly adopted.
2. A new constitution of a church, making some changes on the subject of infant baptism, the washing of feet and secret societies, and adding a provision for lay delegation and the declaration of a belief in "depravity," "justification," "regeneration" and "adoption," "sanctification," and endless "punishment," made by the general conference of a church which had no authority to change the constitution, is illegal, although these matters had been previously included in the discipline of the church, which the general conference had power to change, excepting where it would change the confession of faith.
3. The decision of a general conference, which is the highest tribunal of a church, that a new constitution and confession of faith have become the fundamental belief and constitution of the society, is not binding upon the courts where it is clearly shown that the fundamental law of the church, requiring a request by two thirds of the whole society, before a change in the constitution can be made, has not been complied with, but that one general conference had appointed a commission to prepare a new constitution and submit it to a vote of the church and a succeeding general conference declared the constitution adopted although the affirmative vote of the church, while more than two thirds of the members voting, was much less than two thirds of the whole society.
4. Members of a church who adhere to the old constitution and confession of faith although constituting a small minority, are entitled to the church property where the majority by revolutionary action have adopted a new constitution and refuse longer to submit to the organic law of the association.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Allegan County which granted an injunction restraining them from interfering with the property belonging to the society of the United Brethren in Christ in Salem, Allegan County, Michigan. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Taggart, Wolcott & Ganson, with Messrs. H. H. Pope and C. R. Wilkes, for appellants:

The constitution of 1841 was the valid, organic law of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

Lamb v. Cain, 14 L. R. A. 518, 129 Ind. 486.

In Philomath College v. Wyatt, decided by the supreme court of Oregon, October 5, 1892, the court, in passing upon this question, whether the constitution of 1841 was organic law, says: The Church of the United Brethren in Christ is a voluntary unincorporated religious society. The validity and binding effect of the constitution . . . of a voluntary association, as respects its members, rests upon assent actual or implied—

Article 4 of the constitution of 1841 reads: "There shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society."

Neither the word "request" nor the sentence of which it is a part is of doubtful meaning, and so subject to any rule of practical construction.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 70.

In the change of statutes by addition of words or sentences, the lawmaker is presumed to have some object in view.

Strong v. Daniels, 8 Mich. 470.

As a jurisdictional step, preceding amendment, that can be acted upon by general conference, the framers of this constitution intended to, and did, require that such amendment be sought ("requested") by two thirds of the "whole society."

This "request" of two thirds of the "whole society" must be obtained before legal action or amendment is made.

If notice were required of an amendment, notice must be given.

Rottmann v. Hartling, 22 Neb. 875.

The whole object of the constitutional provision is evaded and perverted, if by the adoption of a certain method of securing a request those not requesting are to be counted as requesting, when they decline so to do.

To call a thing by a wrong name does not change its nature.

Burt v. Rattle, 81 Ohio St. 130.

To "request" is one thing; to "elect" to "vote," is an entirely different matter.

Where the constitution of a corporation provides the assent of a certain number necessary to do business, such assent must be obtained.

Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 89, 15 Am. Rep. 563.

Braden v. Stumph, 16 Lea, 581, involved the construction of a constitutional provision prohibiting a division of the county, "without the consent of two thirds of the qualified voters in such part taken off." The court cited Bouldin v. Lockhart, 1 Lea, 195; Stuart v. Blair, 8 Baxt. 141; Combs v. Stumple, 11 Lea, 26, and said under these decisions: "Positive approval by actual vote, and no mere tacit acquiescence with the results of election by those not voting," was sufficient.

See also Hawkins v. Carroll County Suprs. 50 Miss. 735; State v. Timms, 54 Wis. 318; Harshman v. Bates County, 93 U. S. 569, 23 L. ed. 747; Cass County v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 860, 24 L. ed. 416.

Under a statute requiring "a majority of the legal voters" to be favorable to the opening of establishments for the sale of refreshments on Sunday before they could be opened, the court thought it took a majority of all legal voters, not simply those voting.

State v. Winkelmeier, 35 Mo. 103. So also State v. Sutterfield, 54 Mo. 891.

Where a law provided that the taxable inhabitants by a "majority vote," may raise money for railroad purposes, it was held to mean all of the taxable inhabitants, not a majority of those voting.

Under these decisions, in general or special elections, those voting are sufficient to elect or adopt that voted for, whether an official or a scheme of taxation. The doctrine of acquiescence is not accepted, however, by several of the cases.

There is a difference between an election had by such a society as that represented by the United Brethren in Christ, and by a county or township municipality or other election than those which we have pointed out.

The term "members of the society" or "two thirds the whole society," is much more definite, certain, and clear than "a majority of the electors," of any city or township.

No authority existed in general conference to call an election as such, and such action is implicitly prohibited by the constitution.

People v. Palmer, 91 Mich. 283.

Hochreiter's App., 98 Pa. 482, holds strictly to the binding force of a church constitution in its provisions for amendment.

When a conveyance is made to a society by name, for church purposes, the purposes and uses to which church property is put under the rules, doctrines, and fundamental law of such society or church are the purposes referred to, and such is the legal presumption. The authorities are ample holding the name sufficient to carry the creed into a trust.

A court of equity will enforce a trust as against a religious corporation or society, where such society is using the property for another and different purpose than that to which it was devoted.

Civil courts will not revise the decisions of churches or religious associations, upon ecclesiastical matters relating to church membership, management, or rules; but they will interfere with such associations when rights of property are involved.

Philomath College v. Wyatt, (Or.) Oct. 5, 1892, in its reasoning and argument is far more satisfactory than that of Lamb v. Cain, 14 L. R. A. 518, 129 Ind. 486. See also Mount Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, 13 L. R. A. 198, 83 Iowa, 139.

We find no case of last resort except Lamb v. Cain, supra, where the adjudication or action of a church tribunal has been held an excuse for a civil tribunal making a decree justifying an abandonment of the constitution of such society, and that, where property rights were involved, the court could not compel parties to live up to such compact, if they would enjoy and control such property.

Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 686; Harmon v. Dreher, 1 Speers, Eq. 87, and Dutch Church of Albany v. Bradford, 8 Cow. 456, do not so hold, but only contain dicta from which it may be claimed such conclusion should be reached.

There are many cases holding ecclesiastical decisions binding when they involve only church rules and practices, and such is probably the general rule, and including these are cases where the right of removal or expulsion of pastor, church member, or church official is involved and property interests or rights are not directly litigated.

But see O'Hara v. Stack, supra.

To the same effect where such right is alone involved, but holding that civil courts can intervene where property rights are directly involved in the suit, are Hochreiter's App. 98 Pa. 482; Chase v. Cheney, supra. See note to same in 10 Am. L. Reg. by Chief Justice Fuller, of the United States Supreme Court; Atty-Gen. v. Geerlings, 55 Mich. 567; *Bird v. There are many cases and authorities holding that action by a society or its tribunals, in violation of church constitution, are invalid, and that the branch of church adhering to the original constitution, not lawfully amended, is the church. Among these are—

McGrath, J., delivered the following opinion:

I agree with my Brother Grant that the constitution of 1841 was a valid instrument, and as such was binding upon the society. It had been acquiesced in, recognized, and accepted as the fundamental law of the society for nearly fifty years. Can there be any doubt upon this record that the majority has proceeded in utter disregard of the plain provisions of that constitution, and must the constitution-abiding members of this society be ousted from the possession of property held and occupied by them, and devoted to uses contemplated thereby? This is the issue. One of the objects of the constitution, as expressed by that instrument, is to define the powers and the business of the general conference. By that instrument that body is delegated certain powers, subject to the limitations and restrictions therein prescribed. The general conference is given power to make or repeal any rule of discipline, but it is expressly provided that no rule shall be passed "to change or do away with the confession of faith as it now stands," or that will infringe upon the rights of any as relates to the mode of baptism, the sacrament of the Lord's supper, or the washing of feet, or that will deprive local preachers of their votes at annual conferences; and it is expressly provided that "there shall be no connection with secret combinations," and that "there shall be no alteration in the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society." The question to be determined is not whether the action taken is or is not included within the scope of general powers conferred, or whether the authority may or may not be fairly implied, or whether the power is one which does or does not belong to or inhere in a body of 24 L. R. A.

this character. Those questions are settled by the contract itself.

At a session of the general conference held in 1885 the bishops' address contained the following: "We need not to say to your honorable body that the subject of secret societies has become a most perplexing one to our Zion. This is well known to you all. Also, it is expected of you by the people whom you represent that under the blessing of God you will put this subject to rest, and bring peace to the church by wise regulations. To this end we recommend: First. In that it is admitted that our present constitution has not been as yet submitted to a vote of the whole society, you determine whether the whole subject under consideration is or is not yet in the hands of the general conference. Second. Should you determine that it is in your hands, then transfer the whole subject from the realm of constitutional law to the field of legislative enactment, which would be to expunge the whole question from the constitution, and bring it into the field of legislative enactment, to be handled as the church, through her representatives, may determine from time to time. Third. That you may limit the prohibitory feature of your enactment to combinations, secret and open, to which the church believes a Christian cannot belong. Fourth. Should you decide that this constitutional question is beyond your control, and in the hands of the whole society, then submit the above propositions, properly formulated, to a vote of the whole church, and let a two-thirds vote of those voting be the authoritative voice of the church on the subject."

In the report of the committee raised in 1885 the following occurs: "First. We find that the present constitution of the church was never submitted to the suffrage of the members and ministry of the church for ratification, either by popular vote or by conventional approval, though it purports to be the constitution of the 'members' of the denomination. Second. We find by reference to the records that throughout most of its history it has been the subject of question and differences of opinion as to its legality and binding force as an organic law. Third. We find also that the clause found in article 11, § 4, which says, 'No rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away with the confession of faith as it now stands,' and article 4, which says, 'There shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution unless by request of two thirds of the whole society,'—are in their language and apparent meaning so far reaching as to render them extraordinary and impracticable as articles of constitutional law. Fourth. From the facts and reasons thus indicated, we conclude that the constitution has acquired its force only by the partial and silent assent of the church, and that the general conference has a right to institute measures looking to the amendment, modification, or change of the constitution at any time when it is believed that a majority of our people favor a modification thereof. Fifth. It is the sense and belief of your committee that the constitution as it stands is not in harmony with the present wishes of our people, as has been indicated in discussions, petitions, and elections during the past year. Sixth. For these reasons, and for the purpose of finally settling all questions of dispute and matters of disturbance to the peace and harmony of the church, so far as the confession of faith and the constitution are concerned, your committee would recommend the adoption of the following papers, namely: 'Whereas, our confession of faith is silent or ambiguous upon some of the cardinal doctrines of the Bible, as held and believed by our church; and whereas, it is desirable and needful to so amend and approve our present constitution as to adapt its provisions more fully to the wants and conditions of the church in this and in future time: Therefore . . . the duties and powers of this commission shall be to consider our present confession of faith and constitution, and prepare such a form of belief, and such amended fundamental rules for the government of this church in the future, as will, in their judgment, be best adapted to secure its growth and efficiency in the work of evangelizing the world: provided, (1) that this commission shall preserve unchanged in substance the present confession of faith so far as it is clear; (2) that it shall also retain the present itinerant plan; (3) it shall keep sacred the general usages and distinctive principles of the church on all great moral reforms as sustained by the word of God, in so far as the province of their work may touch them.

Resolved, that when, according to the foregoing provisions, the result of the vote of the church shows that two thirds of all the votes cast have been given in approval of the proposed confession of faith and constitution, it shall be the duty of the bishops to publish and proclaim said result through the official organs of the church, whereupon the confession of faith and constitution thus ratified and adopted shall become the fundamental belief and organic law of the church.'

In accordance with the action of the conference, the bishops published a letter, addressed to the church, on the work of the commission, in which the following occurs: "In the confession of faith three things were effected: First, some verbal changes and reconstruction of sentences for the sake of grammatical accuracy and definiteness of expression; second, a systematic arrangement of our present confession of faith, under distinct articles; third, the addition of five new articles, namely, of justification, of regeneration and adoption, of sanctification, of the Christian Sabbath, and of a future state. These changes secure correct grammatical construction, systematic arrangement, clearness of expression, and a fuller and more comprehensive view of the doctrines of the scriptures. We believe the utility of these changes is so apparent that they will be acceptable to you, and will receive your indorsement." In the address of the bishops at the session of 1889, the following occurs: "It is sadly known throughout the church that there has been for a time a growing friction along the line of what has been known as the organic law of the church. Two antagonistic views have obtained and found ample advocacy in the past. The one is that, we have a valid constitution of absolute and unquestioned force, binding on all the members of the church, and also so bounding, restricting, and limiting the action of the general conference itself that it cannot legislate along certain lines, nor adopt certain measures, well defined in the limiting terms of the constitution, without being guilty of usurpation and revolution. The other view is that the general conference, being a constitutional body, has judicial powers, is capable of judicial action, and hence, being the highest authority known in the jurisprudence of the church, may by right adjudicate questions of dispute, interpret and construe law, as well as devise and formulate plans for the furtherance of its benevolent designs and its missions of mercy among men. It is furthermore held that the restrictions which have been supposed to form an impassable barrier to the authority of the general conference are so far reaching in their demands, and so ambiguous in their meaning, as to render them utterly untenable in a day of advanced thought and of expanding measures. It has been in a measure demonstrated that a feature of absolute immutability has been impressed on her constitution, so that its amendment, according to its own terms, is an utter impossibility. This absolutism in our system, this inflexibility of provision for amendment, is being regarded, in the light of recent experience, as exceedingly unfortunate."

The new confession of faith contains thirteen articles. The changes made are given below. The words in parentheses were in the old confession, but have been stricken from the new. The words in italics were not in the old, but have been added to the new.

"Article 1. We believe that this triune God created the heavens and the earth, and all that is therein, visible and invisible (and, furthermore, sustains, governs, protects, and supports the same); that he sustains, protects, and governs these with gracious regard for the welfare of man, to the glory of his name."

"Art. 8. We believe in Jesus Christ; that he is very God and man; that he became incarnate by the power of the Holy Ghost (in the Virgin Mary), and was born of the Virgin Mary; that he is savior and mediator of the whole human race, if they, with full faith in him, accept the grace proffered in Jesus; that this Jesus suffered and died, . . . and will come again at the last day, to judge the (living) quick and the dead.

"Art. 4. We believe in the Holy Ghost; that he is equal in being with the Father and the Son; that he convinces the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; that he comforts the faithful, and guides them into all truth.

"Art. 5. We believe that the Holy Bible, Old and New Testaments, is the word of God; that it (reveals) contains the only true way to our salvation; that every true Christian is bound to acknowledge and receive it (with the influence), by the help of the spirit of God, as the only rule and guide (in faith and practice, and that, without faith in Jesus Christ, true repentance, forgiveness of sins, and following after Christ, no one can be a true Christian. We also believe that what is contained in the holy scriptures, to wit, the fall in Adam and redemption through Jesus Christ, shall be preached throughout the world).

"Art. 6. We believe in a holy Christian church (the communion of saints, the resurrection of the body, and life everlasting), composed of true believers, in which the Word of God is preached by men divinely called, and the ordinances are duly administered; that this divine institution is for the maintenance of worship for the edification of believers, and the conversion of the world to Christ. We believe in the resurrection of the dead, the future general judgment; and an eternal state of rewards, in which the righteous dwell in endless life, and the wicked in endless punishment.

"Art. 7. We believe that the (ordinance) sacraments, baptism (and the remembrance of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ), and the Lord's supper, are to be (used in the church) in use and (should be) practiced by all (Christians) Christian societies (and that it is incumbent on all the children of God particularly to practice them), but the (manner in which they ought) modes of baptism, and the manner of observing the Lord's supper, are always to be left to the judgment and understanding of every individual. Also the baptism of children shall be left to the judgment of believing parents. The example of the washing of feet is to be left to the judgment of each one, to practice or not, (but it is not becoming of any of our preachers or members to traduce any of their brethren whose judgment and understanding in these respects is different from their own, either in public or in private. Whosoever shall make himself guilty in this respect, shall be considered a traducer of his brethren, and shall be answerable for the same).

"Art. 8. We believe that man is fallen from original righteousness, and, apart from the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, is not only entirely destitute of holiness, but is inclined to evil, and only evil, and that continually; and that, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of heaven.

"Art. 9. We believe that penitent sinners are justified before God, only by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and not by works; yet that good works in Christ are acceptable to God, and spring out of a true and living faith.

"Art. 10. We believe that regeneration is the renewal of the heart of man after the image of God, through the word, by the act of the Holy Ghost, by which the believer receives the spirit of adoption, and is enabled to serve God with the will and the affections.

"Art. 11. We believe that sanctification is the work of God's grace, through the word and the spirit, by which those who have been born again are separated in their acts, words, and thoughts from sin, and are enabled to live unto God, and to follow holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

"Art. 12. We believe that the Christian Sabbath is divinely appointed; that it is commemorative of our Lord's resurrection from the grave, and it is an emblem of our eternal rest; that it is essential to the welfare of the civil community, and to the permanence and growth of the Christian church, and that it should be reverently observed as a day of holy rest, and of social and public worship."

The old constitution provided that the general conference "shall consist of elders, elected by the members in every conference district throughout the society." The new constitution provides that the general conference "shall consist of elders and laymen elected in each conference district throughout the church. The number and ratio of elders and laymen, and the mode of their election, shall be determined by the general conference." The new constitution further provides that "the ministerial and lay delegates shall deliberate and vote together as one body; but the general conference shall have power to provide for a vote by separate orders, whenever it deems it best to do so; and in such cases the concurrent vote of both orders shall be necessary to complete an action." Section 10 of article 1 provides that "the general conference may, two thirds of the members elected thereto concurring, propose changes in or additions to the confession of faith: provided, that the concurrence of three fourths of the annual conferences shall be necessary to their final ratification." Section 1 of article 8 is as follows: "We declare that all secret combinations which infringe upon the rights of those outside their organization, and whose principles and practices are injurious to the Christian character of their members, are contrary to the word of God, and that Christians ought to have no connection with them. The general conference shall have power to enact such rules of discipline with respect to such combination as in its judgment it may deem proper." Section 1 of article 5 provides that amendments may be proposed by any general conference, two thirds of the members elected thereto concurring, which amendments shall be submitted to a vote of the membership, and a majority of all the votes cast shall be necessary to final ratification.

It is idle to say that there has been no change in the confession of faith. It will not be contended that the questions in respect to which either the confession of faith of the constitution of 1841 were silent or ambiguous, or in respect to which the additions, changes, or modifications were made by the commission, were in any sense new, or had their origin in the commission. These subjects had been discussed at the various conferences since the adoption of the constitution of 1841. The changes involved matters upon which eminent divines have differed, and which have been the subject of controversy for centuries; matters concerning which wide differences of opinion existed in the several conferences. The subjects of infant baptism, of the washing of feet, of natural, hereditary, and total depravity, of a lay delegation, and of secret combinations, had been frequently discussed. In 1853 a resolution defining natural, hereditary, and total depravity had been adopted by a vote of 28 to 19. A secret combination had been defined as "one whose initiatory or bond of union is a secret." In view of the multiplicity of existing sects, all declaring a belief in the same scriptures, but differing in interpretation, how can it be claimed that there was no change in the confession of faith? Can it be said that articles may be added to a confession of faith, declaring a belief in "depravity," "justification," "regeneration and adoption," "sanctification," and "endless punishment," and that the confession has not been changed by the additions? It is no answer to say that in the revision matter was simply transferred from discipline to confession, for the confession was the paramount law. The general conference had the power to formulate rules of discipline, but it was restricted to rules which should not change the confession. If rules had been adopted which pertained to the confession of faith, and had the effect to change, add to, or vary the creed, they were illegally adopted, were without binding force, and had no place in either discipline or creed. The proponents of change had constantly been met with the point of order that such change was prohibited by the constitution, and as constantly by the ruling that the point of order was well taken. The record, including the proceedings of the conference, will be searched in vain for any determination by the general conference, or any committee thereof, or by the commission, that these modifications or alterations or additions to the confession of faith were immaterial, and did not add to or vary or change the confession. Indeed, an examination of the proceedings, of the report of the committee of 1885, and of the address of the bishops, leads inevitably to the conclusion that these changes were regarded and construed as material; and the constitution of 1841 as prohibiting their enactment. As early as 1845, a resolution was adopted by a vote of 15 to 8 declaring "that, in view of the constitution, this general conference has no right to revise, alter, or amend the confession of faith as it now stands." The commission of 1885 originated in a desire to settle disputed and vexed questions. The vote creating the commission stood 78 to 42. The utmost that can be said for the new confession and constitution is that these questions have been settled in accordance with the views of the proponents of change, and that the views of the opponents are no longer supported by the written articles. Nor has the highest court of judicatory of this society undertaken at any time to give to the clause of the constitution providing that the concurrence of two thirds of the whole society was necessary to the amendment any other meaning than that which its language clearly conveys. Indeed, it is evident from an examination of the proceedings of the general conference, from the report of the committee of 1885, and from the language of the bishops, that this article was understood, regarded, and interpreted to mean that the affirmative concurrence of two thirds of the whole society was necessary to amend the constitution. At a session of 1878 a motion was made that this clause be so interpreted as to mean two thirds of all that vote, but the motion was laid on the table. The following resolution was then passed: "Resolved, that the explicit rendering of article 4 of the constitution be submitted to the board of bishops, and that they be requested to publish the same in the Religious Telescope." It does not appear by the journals that the bishops ever reported, but by the record it appears that the matter was discussed by the bishops, but no conclusion was reached. A motion was made in 1849 to "expunge" the constitution, on the ground of illegality: but there were but two votes in the affirmative. It remained for the bishops, in 1885, to cut the knot. They recommended one of two courses, viz., that the constitution as a whole be disregarded, or to submit the new constitution to vote, and "let a two-thirds vote of those voting be the authoritative voice of the church." The bishops did not assume to interpret the constitutional provision in question but suggested an edict declaring the two-thirds vote of those voting to be the authoritative voice of the church. The commission did not undertake an interpretation, but found that the objectionable clauses "are in their language and apparent meaning so far reaching as to render them extraordinary and impracticable as articles of constitutional law." They further concluded that the constitution had acquired its force only by the partial and silent assent of the church, and that the conference had the right to institute measures looking to its amendment at any time when it is believed that a majority favor such amendment. A minority report was presented, but the majority report prevailed by a vote of 78 to 42. The bishops, in their address in 1889, use this significant language: "Certainly a church constitution should have some possible method of procedure by which it could be amended. That those who gave us the constitution intended to put it practically beyond the possibility of alteration or modification has never been insisted upon; and yet the church found itself in this very attitude when it came to meet a growing demand for more pious and equitable measures, arising from the exigencies of the times." This language is entirely inconsistent with any other interpretation of this constitutional provision than that insisted upon by the defendants. The constitution, as proposed in 1887, provided that "if, at any time after the passage of this constitution, it should be contemplated either to alter or amend the same, it shall be the privilege of any member in the society to publish such contemplation at least three months before the election of delegates to the general conference." This was changed, before adoption, so as to make it necessary for two thirds of the whole society to request a change before it could be granted. The purpose of this provision was not to take away from the general conference all power to act, but to prevent action until the request was made. Any amendment suggested would be subjected to the scrutiny of the conference. The request did not affect the amendment, but affirmative action by the conference on the request was necessary.

It was entirely competent for the members of this society to associate together under this compact; to formulate a summary of their distinctive beliefs; to exclude therefrom all disputed questions; to regard certain matters as nonessentials, and to leave certain others to individual judgment; that as to these questions the articles should be silent; to protect the exercise of that judgment from criticism; and to surround the creed so formulated with such safeguards as they deemed proper and requisite. The creed so formulated was the basis of their association. To promulgate that creed, and protect themselves in certain observances, was the purpose of the society. To secure it from innovation was the object of the constitutional provision. They recognized the tenacity with which each member adhered to matters of belief as expressed, and the right to the exercise of individual judgment as to matters upon which no expression was given. The creed was agreed to, not only by reason of what it expressed, but also because of what it omitted; by reason as well of its concessions as of its requirements. They recognized the possibility of development and of agreement upon questions upon which no agreement was reached, and the right to change, but agreed that such development should be evidenced by the affirmative concurrence of two thirds of the whole society. It was not alone matters of administration and government that they aimed for protection in, but matters of belief; the underlying principles of the association; the thought which the society was formed to advance. They formulated and declared the church polity, and by the fundamental law prohibited a change of that polity unless in accordance with express provision made in the constitution itself. The relations between the members of this association is one of contract, and the confession of faith and constitution constitute the terms of the agreement, which is binding upon all. Hyde v. Woods, 2 Sawy. 655, 94 U. S. 528, 24 L. ed. 264; White v. Brownell, 2 Daly, 329; Ebbinghausen v. Worth Club, 4 Abb. N. C. 800, 801, note; Leach v. Harris, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 571; Venable v. Ebenezer Baptist Church of Atchison, 25 Kan. 177; State v. Williams, 75 N. C. 184; Innes v. Wylie, 1 Car. & K. 262; Prockett v. Schaefer, 11 Phila. 166; Brine v. Board of Trade, 2 Am. L. Rec. 368. In White v. Brownell, Van Vorst, J., says: "As this association is not organized in pursuance of any statute, nor the terms of membership fixed by the principle of the common law, it follows that the agreement which the members made among themselves on the subject must establish and determine the rights of the parties on the subject. The constitution of the association and its laws, agreed upon by the members, contain all the stipulations of the parties, and is the law which should govern. The members have established a law for themselves. The very existence of this body depends upon the faithful observance of its organic law by all its members. The court must regard the constitution and laws of this board as the contract by which all the members are bound. The court cannot make any other contract for the parties than they have solemnly made for themselves." An amendment of the constitution of a societly must be adopted in accordance with the provisions of the constitution in force at the time of such adoption respecting such amendment; otherwise, it is invalid. Hochreiter's App. 98 Pa. 479; Rottmann v. Bartling, 22 Neb. 875; State v. Swift, 69 Ind. 505; Leite v. Foraker, 46 Ohio St. 677, 6 L. R. A. 422.

It is urged, however, that the judgments of ecclesiastical tribunals in matters of faith and discipline, and the general polity of the church, are binding upon civil courts. In the present case there has been no judicial determination of any matter of faith, or discipline, or general polity adverse to defendants. As already suggested, there has been no adjudication that the confession of faith has not been changed. There has been no attempted interpretation or construction of the constitutional provision in question, other than that insisted upon by the defendants; indeed, the "apparent meaning" of that provision has at all times been recognized. The edict adopted by the conference before the vote was had betrays the construction given to this provision. The conference openly and notoriously disregarded this plain and express provision of a contract binding as well upon conference as individuals. The action taken cannot be raised to the plane of judicial action. It was a breach of compact, and revolutionary. Even those voting in the affirmative cannot be presumed to have intended to violate the fundamental law requiring an affirmative expression from two thirds of the whole society, or to give any other construction to the provision in question than that for which the defendants contend. The constitution negated the authority to amend in any other manner than that indicated. Can it be insisted that less than two thirds of the society, acting in a legislative capacity, could not amend, but that a less number could accomplish the same result, under the guise of an adjudication, without semblance of authority? The constitution relegated the subject-matter to the society,—to the legislative power. This is not a case of the excommunication of a member who has submitted himself to the authority of an organization having power, either express or implied, to deal with that question. Here we have an express limitation of power. The only authority to which the membership of this society have submitted themselves with respect to the matter in question is the affirmative expression of two thirds of the whole society. Church judicatories cannot usurp legislative powers. The creation of judicial tribunals and their investment with authority is one of the functions of the sovereign power.

But it is insisted that the decision of the conference that the new constitution and confession of faith had become the fundamental belief and constitution of the society is binding upon this court. The question here involved is one of ownership of property. These proceedings are instituted to recover possession and control of that property. In this class of cases the conclusive effect of church authority, acting within the scope of its powers, is fully recognized by all the cases, and it is as well settled that civil courts will not review the decisions of ecclesiastical judicatories upon the merits; but the proposition that the judgments of church judicatories as to their own powers or jurisdiction, or the lawfulness of their methods, is conclusive, is not sustained by reason or the weight of authority. In Chase v. Cheney, 58 Ill. 509, 11 Am. Rep. 95, it was expressly held that civil courts will interfere with churches or religious associations when rights of property or civil rights are involved. It was held, however, that, where there is no other right involved than a clerical office, the decision of an ecclesiastical court as to its own jurisdiction under the canons of the society is conclusive. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666, involved the powers of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church. The constitution of that body provides that "to the general assembly also belongs the power of deciding all controversies respecting doctrine and discipline; of reproofing, warning, or hearing testimony against any error in doctrine or immorality in practice, in any church, presbytery, or synod; . . . superintending the concerns of the whole church; . . . of suppressing schismatical contentions and disputations; and, in general, of recommending and attempting reformation of manners, and the promotion of charity, truth, and holiness, through all the churches under their care." In all of the cases in which any question as to the authority of the general assembly under this constitutional provision has been raised, it has been held that the authority was practically unlimited. State v. Farria, 45 Mo. 188. Mr. Justice Miller concedes that the doctrine of the English courts is opposed to the proposition announced by him. The English cases are collated and considered by Mr. Justice Fuller in a note to Chase v. Cheney (Ill.) 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 813. In the cases cited by Mr. Justice Miller, the question of the power, authority, and jurisdiction of the tribunals whose acts were under consideration are fully considered and discussed, and the respect paid to those tribunals is predicated upon authority conferred. In Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Mon. 481, the court discusses at length the general and unlimited powers of the conference, and says: "There seems to be due from the tribunals of the civil government to those of the church at least so much respect as to require that the acts done by the latter in the name of the church should be deemed valid under its law, and the dependent right should be determined accordingly until those acts were reversed by the church, or at least until they are conclusively demonstrated to be against its law." In Harmon v. Dreher, 1 Speers, Eq. 87, Dreher had been declared no longer a minister of the society. The court says: "That the synod was armed with judicial authority for trying and determining cases against delinquent ministers and churches appears from the constitution itself, which is the rule for all who have accepted of it, and which expressly provides for such procedure." Shannon v. Frost, 8 B. Mon. 257, arose out of a controversy in a Baptist society, which had no constitution and acknowledged no ecclesiastical authority, the voice of the majority of the congregation being of necessity the voice of the church.

In Den v. Bolton, 13 N. J. L. 236, the court says: "The sentence of suspension appears to have been a judgment of a competent court within its jurisdiction, having authority over the party and the subject, liable to an appeal to a higher tribunal by any one aggrieved, from which, however, no appeal was taken, and to which, therefore, we are bound, sitting in another judicatory, to give respect and effect. The jurisdiction of the class in such case is, I think, fully sustained by the constitution. Here are, then, the sentences of a competent tribunal, in the exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction, deposing the elders and deacons, as well as the ministers, from their respective offices." In Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 28 Ill. 456, it was held that, after individuals or organized bodies have entered into a contract or agreement, it requires the assent of the contracting parties to abrogate the agreement, and no reason is provided on this principle why a church which, by compact, has become a portion of the presbytery, should have the voluntary right to withdraw from the organization without mutual consent. In State v. Farria, 45 Mo. 188, it was expressly held that the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church possessed unlimited jurisdiction in relation to the matter in dispute. In German Reformed Church v. Com., 3 Pa. 283, Siebert was excommunicated by the consistory. The articles gave him a right to appeal to the classis, and from thence to the synod. He did not avail himself of either, and the case is put upon the ground that, until final adjudication by the church judicatories, the relator was without remedy by mandamus. The court says: "Whatever is concluded in such [final] judicatory by a majority of votes is valid and binding unless it can be shown to be contrary to the word of God and the constitution of the church." In McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9, the court finds that "the act of the synod is binding upon the congregation composing it as members so far as the act is in accordance with its own laws;" that "in none of these matters has the synod transcended its usual authority." They say: "We might have determined this case by saying that there is nothing in the plaintiff's evidence that says that the action complained of, judged by the constitution and usages of the seceder church, was brought about by any excess of authority on the part of the presbyteries and synod; but we have preferred to treat the case as if the burden of proof was on the defendants, and show affirmatively that the proceeding is in harmony with the authority usually admitted to belong to those bodies." In Schnorr's App., 67 Pa. 188, it was held that, in church organizations, those who adhere to the regular order of the church, local and general, though a minority, are the church congregation. The title to the church property of the divided congregation is in that part of it which is acting in harmony with its own law, and the ecclesiastical laws, usages, customs, and principles which were accepted among them before the dispute began are the standards for determining which party is right. Mr. Justice Sharswood, in that case, says: "If the opinion of Lowrie, Ch. J., in McGinnis v. Watson, may seem to controvert any of these positions, and to hold that a congregation may change a material part of its principles or practices without forfeiting its property, on the ground that to deny this 'would be imposing a law upon all churches that is contrary to the very nature of all intellectual and spiritual life,' and because the guaranty of freedom to religion forbids us to understand the rule in this way, I ask leave most respectfully to enter against it may dissent and protest. I do so the more fully because it was entirely extrajudicial to any question in the case. Courts, which have the supervision and control of all corporations and unincorporated societies or associations must be guided by surer and clearer principles than those to be derived from the nature of intellectual and spiritual life. The guaranty of religious freedom has nothing to do with the property. It does not guarantee freedom to steal churches. It secures to individuals the right of withdrawing, forming a new society, with such creed and government as they please raising from their own means another fund, and building another house of worship; but it does not confer upon them the right of taking the property consecrated to other uses by those who may now be sleeping in their graves. The law of intellectual and spiritual life is not the higher law, but must yield to the law of the land." In Kerr's App., 89 Pa. 97, the court held that the resolution adopted by the church synod was ultra vires; that a decree of the church judicatory is binding only where it is affirmatively shown that it has acted within the scope of its authority, and has observed its own organic forms and rules.

In a note to Gartin v. Penick (Ky.) 9 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 210, 221, Mr. Redfield says: "We do not understand that any such presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of these church judicatories exists, as in the case of the superior court of general jurisdiction in the state or nation; but, on the contrary, everything requisite to create the jurisdiction must be proved affirmatively by any who claim the benefit of their action, as in the case of courts of limited and summary powers within the state, or of all foreign courts, as church courts surely may be regarded. But, when this is shown, we suppose the judgment of church courts and assemblies are as conclusive as those of any other tribunal. It is like the case of a reference or arbitration. . . . But, as we have before said, the mere decision of a court of summary jurisdiction, or of an arbitration, or a foreign court is not even prima facie evidence of its binding obligations upon the parties. Something more must be shown, because the law does not pronounce in favor of the jurisdiction or of the regularity of the proceedings. These must be shown before any decision becomes obligatory. The case of an arbitration will well illustrate the whole subject. The submission must be shown, or, in the case of an ecclesiastical court, that the person and the subject-matter come within the range of its control." Mr. Redfield further discusses the question in a note to Chase v. Cheney (Ill.) 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 808, and to the same case is appended a note by Mr. Fuller, where the whole subject is ably and exhaustively discussed. Mr. Fuller says: "There can be no question, we apprehend, that an ecclesiastical court must be considered one of special and limited jurisdiction. . . . If such a court be a domestic one, whose judgments can only appear by its record, the jurisdiction of the court, both in regard to the subject-matter and the parties, must appear upon the record, and unless it do so appear, the judgment cannot be upheld. It must be further conceded, in regard to ecclesiastical courts in this country, that they must, as to civil tribunals of the state or nation, stand upon the same basis as foreign courts." It has been expressly held by this court that the provision of the Federal Constitution that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the records and judicial proceedings of every other state does not preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of courts; and if, in fact, the subject-matter of a suit was not within the jurisdiction of the state from which the court derives its authority, its judgment is a nullity, and may be so treated everywhere. People v. Danell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260; Wright v. Wright, 24 Mich. 180; McKwan v. Zimmer, 88 Mich. 765, 81 Am. Rep. 333. In Connitt v. Reformed Prot. Dutch Church of New Prospect, 54 N. Y. 551, the classis had dissolved a pastoral relation. An appeal was taken to the particular synod, and then to the general synod, where the decision was affirmed. The court expressly finds that the classis had jurisdiction to make the decision, and dissents from the view expressed in Chase v. Cheney and Watson v. Jones,—that the decision of an ecclesiastical tribunal as to its own jurisdiction is conclusive upon the civil courts. In Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 430, the court, after discussing the powers conferred upon the yearly meeting by the constitution and usages of the society, finds that "the yearly meeting has a final and controlling jurisdiction in all matters of faith and religious duty, of administration and discipline, as well of manners and conduct, of all Quakers within its limits." In Watson v. Avery, 2 Bash. 332, 349, Mr. Justice Hardin, speaking for the court, says: "If it be true, as insisted for the appellees, that the inferior courts and people of the church are bound to accept as final and conclusive the assembly's own construction of its powers and submit to its edicts as obligatory, without inquiring whether they transcend the barriers of the constitution or not, the will of the assembly and not the constitution, becomes the fundamental law of the church. But the constitution, having been adopted as the supreme law of the church, must be supreme alike over the assembly and people. If it is not, and only binding on the latter, the supreme judicatory is at once a government of despotic and unlimited powers. But we hold that the assembly, like other courts, is limited in its authority by the law under which it acts; and, when rights of property which are secured to congregations and individuals by the organic law of the church are violated by unconstitutional acts of the higher courts, the parties thus aggrieved are entitled to relief in the civil courts, as in ordinary cases of injury resulting from the violation of a contract or the fundamental law of a voluntary association." See also Gartin v. Penick, supra; Associate Reformed Church Trustees in Newburgh v. Theological Seminary Trustees at Princeton, 4 N. J. Eq. 77; State v. Trinity Church in Trenton, 45 N. J. L. 280; Rottmann v. Bartling, supra; Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 603; Green v. African M. E. Soc., 1 Serg. & R. 254; Runkel v. Winemiller, 4 Harr. & McH. 429, 1 Am. Dec. 411; Brocius v. Reuter, 1 Harr. & J. 551, 2 Am. Dec. 534; Thompson v. Catholic Cong. Soc. in Rahobotha, 7 Pick. 160; Harrison v. Hoyle, 24 Ohio St. 254.

The edicts and declarations of the conference contravened the organic law of the society, and were ultra vires. It has been frequently determined that the title to church property of a divided congregation is in that part of it which is acting in harmony with its own law, and the ecclesiastical laws, usages, customs, and principles which were accepted among them before the dispute began are the standard for determining which faction is right. McGinnis v. Watson, Schnorr's App. and Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, supra. Mr. Justice Strong, in his valuable work on the Relations of Civil Law to Church Polity (pages 45, 59), says: "Cases sometimes arise in civil courts in which it becomes necessary to determine which part of a divided church is entitled to the church property. . . .

In such a case, . . . courts of law will inquire which party, or which division, adheres to the form of church government, or acknowledges the church connection designated in the conveyance, and adjudge the right to that party. . . . That property the civil courts will adjudge to the members, however few in numbers they may be. . . .

This rule . . . necessitates an inquiry into the constitution and discipline of the church . . . to enable the court to discover which of the contending parties adheres to the order. . . . Civil courts will not permit the diversion of a trust. . . .

When property is held, charged with a trust for the use of a church receiving and maintaining certain religious doctrines, it occasionally happens that its members depart from the faith, and embrace other and contrary doctrines, while still claiming to hold the church property. In such a case, if the property can be retained by them, it is diverted from the use to which it was first settled. . . .

Such a perversion of the civil law will not allow. It will interpose its strongest arm to arrest it. . . . Courts of law will institute all inquiries necessary to determine who were the real beneficiaries intended, and prevent the diversion of the property to any other uses; and in so doing they will, if necessary, investigate the doctrines held, or the religious belief of the members, . . .

to identify the persons for whose use the grant or gift was originally intended." The defendants are in possession. They adhere to the old constitution and confession of faith. Neither has been lawfully changed. The adherents of the new constitution refused longer to submit to the organic law of the association, and have in effect formed a new society. When the conference trampled upon the compact, its jurisdiction ceased to be legitimate. The right to the property does not depend upon numbers, nor upon the fact that the members of the conference whose conduct was revolutionary were able, by force of numbers, to hold the opera house in which the conference convened, and force those who insisted upon the integrity of the fundamental law to acquiesce or depart. The question is, Which of the two factions adheres to the confession of faith and constitution in force when the dispute began,—Which remains loyal to the compact of association? The inquiry is not, Who went out of the opera house? but, Who remained in the church, subject to its organic law?

Grant, J., delivered the following opinion:

Complainants claim in their bill that they constitute the legal board of trustees of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ at Salem; that the defendants, who are in possession of the house of worship and other church property, claim to be the legal trustees, exclude them from the possession and use thereof,—and they pray that defendants may be enjoined from interfering with them in the possession, use, and enjoyment thereof. Although the church originated nearly a century and a half ago, it appears to have had no written confession of faith until 1815, when its general conference, held in Pennsylvania, adopted one. This confession of faith was recognized and adhered to as containing the fundamental doctrine of the church until 1839, when the defendants claim that it was changed. The church had no written constitution until 1837, when a general conference held at Germantown, Ohio, formulated and unanimously adopted one. The members of that conference doubted their authority to adopt a constitution, and therefore the conference issued a circular to give notice to the church throughout the Union that "we intend to present a memorial to the next general conference, praying them to ratify the constitution now adopted." The conference met quadrennially, and when it assembled in 1841, it appears to have entirely ignored the constitution of 1837, and the validity of its adoption, and adopted another, which is one of the subjects of this controversy. The regularity of the adoption of this constitution was early questioned by some members of the church. It is too late, however, to now question it, since it was recognized and treated as the organic law of the church for nearly fifty years. This constitution recognized the confession of faith as it then stood, and provided that "no rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away with it." One section provided, "There shall be no connection with secret combinations." Article 4 provided, "There shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society." It provided for a general conference, to consist of the bishops, and of elders elected by the members of every conference district throughout the society. All ecclesiastical power to make or repeal any rule of discipline was vested in this conference. The discipline, which was early adopted, made it the duty of the general conference "to examine the administration of each annual conference, whether it has strictly observed the rules and preserved the moral and doctrinal principles of the discipline in all its transactions." At the general conference of 1885, the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, by the general conference of the United Brethren in Christ here assembled, that the general conference of our church is, and is hereby declared to be, the highest judicial authority of our church." It is conclusively established by this record that the general conference is the highest judicatory of the church, and is intrusted with the general supervision of its affairs both temporal and spiritual. In all matters, therefore, in which it has jurisdiction, its judgments are binding upon the church, its clergy, and its members, and will not be reviewed by the civil courts.

Disputes arose in the church as to certain articles of the constitution, and as to the meaning of certain portions of the confession of faith, and as early as 1869 the division of sentiment was clearly defined, and those who favored a change in the constitution became known as "Liberals," and those opposed as "Radicals." In 1885 the bishops, in their address to the general conference, called attention to these matters, and a committee was appointed to consider them, and make a report thereof to the conference. This committee made the following report:

"To the General Conference: Your committee to which was referred the confession of faith, constitution, and section 8 of chapter 10 of the discipline, beg leave to report that we have given these subjects much and most prayerful attention, and now submit the result of our deliberations:

"First. We find that the present constitution of the church was never submitted to the suffrage of the members and ministry of the church for ratification, either by popular vote or by conventional approval, though it purports to be the constitution of the members of the denomination.

"Second. We find, by reference to the records, that throughout most of its history it has been the subject of question and differences of opinion as to its legality and binding force as an organic law.

"Third. We find also, that the clause found in article 2, § 4, which says, 'No rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away with the confession of faith, as it now stands,' and article 4, which says, 'there shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society,' are, in their language and apparent meaning, so far reaching as to render them extraordinary, and impracticable as articles of constitutional law.

"Fourth. From the facts and reasons thus indicated, we conclude that the constitution has acquired its force only by the partial and silent assent of the church, and that the general conference has a right to institute measures looking to the amendment, modification, or change of the constitution at any time when it is believed that a majority of our people favor a modification thereof.

"Fifth. It is the sense and belief of your committee that the constitution, as it stands, is not in harmony with the present wishes of our people, as has been indicated in discussions, petitions, and elections during the past year.

"Sixth. For these reasons, and for the purpose of finally settling all questions of dispute and matters of disturbance to the peace and harmony of the church, so far as the confession of faith and the constitution are concerned, your committee would recommend the adoption of the following paper, namely:

"Church Commission. Whereas, our confession of faith is silent or ambiguous upon some of the cardinal doctrines of the Bible, as held and believed by our church; and, whereas, it is desirable and needful to so amend and improve our present constitution as to adapt its provisions more fully to the wants and conditions of the church in this and future time; therefore, resolved, by the delegates of the annual conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in general conference assembled, that a church commission, composed of twenty-seven persons, and consisting of the bishops of the church, and ministers and laymen appointed and elected by this body, an equal number from each bishop's district,—provided, that the Pacific district shall have two members besides its bishop,—be and is hereby authorized and established. The duties and powers of this commission shall be to consider our present confession of faith and constitution, and prepare such a form of belief, and such amended fundamental rules for the government of this church in the future, as will, in their judgment, be best adapted to secure its growth and efficiency in the work of evangelizing the world: provided (1) that this commission shall preserve unchanged, in substance, the present confession of faith, so far as it is clear; (2) that it shall also retain the present itinerant plan; (3) it shall keep sacred the general usages and distinctive principles of the church on all great moral reforms, as sustained by the word of God, in so far as the province of their work may touch them: provided, further, that in the final adoption, as a whole, of a confession of faith and constitution, for submission to the church by the commission, a majority vote of all the members composing the commission shall be necessary. Resolved, that this commission shall meet at such time and place as the board of bishops may appoint, and is expected to complete its work by January 1, 1886. The commission shall also adopt, and cause to be executed, a plan by which the proposed confession of faith and constitution may receive the largest possible attention and expression of approval or disapproval by our people, including all necessary regulations for taking, counting, and reporting the vote. Resolved, that when, according to the foregoing provisions, the result of the vote of the church shows that two thirds of all the votes cast have been given in approval of the proposed confession of faith and constitution, it shall be the duty of the bishops to publish and proclaim said result through the official organs of the church, whereupon, the confession of faith and constitution, thus ratified and adopted, shall become the fundamental belief and organic law of this church: provided, further, that the adoption of the constitution as aforesaid shall in no wise affect any legislation of this general conference for the coming quadrennium."

The committee presented a supplementary report recommending the adoption of the following law in reference to secret combinations: "A secret combination, in the sense of the constitution, is a secret league or confederation of persons holding principles and laws at variance with the word of God, and infringing upon the natural, social, political, or religious rights of those outside its pale. Any member or minister of our church found in connection with such combinations shall be dealt with as in other cases of disobedience to the order and discipline of the church in case of members, as found on page 23 of discipline, in answer to the third question of section 3, chapter 4, and in case of ministers, as found in chapter 6, § 13, p. 65." These reports were signed by 11 of the committee.

Two members filed the following minority report: "(1) The constitution we now have in the discipline, and have had for forty-four years, is the constitution of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and every member legally received into the church, for years, has consented to be governed by the same. It was declared legal, also, by the general conference of 1849, and to it our legislation has conformed, and under its directions our officers have been elected, and the general conference formed according to its provisions. (2) This constitution makes no provision for the general conference to alter or change it without first securing the consent of the members of the church by a two-thirds vote, as required in article 4 of the constitution, and to take any other method would not be legal. (3) It is our view that this question as to the constitution should be determined before we revise section 3 of chapter x."

After a long discussion, the conference adopted the majority report by a vote of 78 to 42, and the supplementary report by a vote of 76 to 38. The commission was duly appointed, entered upon its work, and prepared what is termed a "Revised Confession of Faith," and the "Amended Constitution." It also prepared a plan of submission, by which the confession of faith, as a whole, was to be submitted to a vote of the church. Ballots were to be written or printed in the following form: "Confession of Faith,"— after which were to be written or printed "Yes" or "No," according to the wish of the voter. The amended constitution was to be submitted as a whole to the vote of the church, with the exceptions that the clauses as to lay delegation and secret combinations were to be submitted separately. The vote was to be taken during the month of November, 1888. The publishing agent at Dayton, Ohio, was to furnish each presiding elder, the three months before the time of voting, the necessary number of tickets and return blanks. The pastor, leaders, and stewards of each society were to constitute the local board of tellers. Any member incapacitated, by age or affliction, to attend the meetings, and any minister absent on his charge, might send their ballots with his name signed on the back thereof. The local boards of tellers were to make returns to the general board of tellers, which was provided by the commission. The election was fixed to take place at the same time as the election of delegates to the quadrennial conference of 1889. The commission, upon the completion of its work, in 1885, caused the proposed revised confession of faith and the amended constitution to be published in their church papers. Many thousands of copies were published in pamphlet form, and circulated among its members. The matter was thoroughly discussed both in the press and the pulpit of the church. Every means possible appears to have been taken to enlighten the members upon the issues involved. There was evidently no lack of knowledge or information on the part of the clergy and the members of the church as to when and how the vote was to be taken. There is no doubt but that the matter entered largely into the election of delegates to the general conference, and that they were elected to a considerable extent at least in accordance with the view they entertained upon this subject. Charges of unfairness in the preparation and distribution of the ballots were made against those who were charged with the performance of this duty. These charges relate mainly to the form of the ballot, and to the failure to send ballots to all the presiding elders. While the conduct of the parties so charged is subject to some just criticism, still, we do not think it resulted in depriving any member of his vote. The Michigan conference resolved not to vote upon any proposition submitted. Four conventions were held in different parts of the country by those who were opposed to the adoption of the articles, and they recommended their members not to vote, but to present their views to the general conference by petition. The interest in the subject was general, and the bishops and clergy evidently spared no effort to impress their views upon the members of their several charges. But, in the view we take, it is unnecessary to now determine the questions arising upon the manner in which the vote was taken. The total vote on the confession of faith was 54,880, the majority for it being 47,760. The total vote upon the amended constitution was 54,344, and the majority for it being 47,036. The total vote on lay delegation was 54,459, the majority for it being 43,191. The total vote on secret combinations was 54,292, the majority for it being 39,696. The total vote for delegates to this conference was between 58,000 and 59,000.

The commission made due report of their action and of the vote cast to the general conference, which assembled May 9, and continued in session till May 22, 1889. The conference referred this report to a special committee of seven to examine it, and determine whether the commission had acted in compliance with the instruction of the general conference, and whether the vote had been orderly and regular, and to recommend such action as it might deem proper to be taken in the premises. Two reports were made by this committee,—a majority report, signed by five, and a minority report, signed by two. The minority report objected to the regularity of the proceedings, and recommended the conference to submit such amendments of the constitution to the vote of the people as it might deem wise and prudent, which should be regarded as a petition for such proposed changes. Protests against the adoption of the proposed changes were presented, signed by 16,282. On May 13, 1889, the bishops issued a proclamation announcing that the revised confession of faith and the amended constitution had been adopted by the required two-thirds vote of the church. After a long and able discussion by the members of the conference, the new articles were declared adopted by the emphatic vote of 110 to 20. Upon the issuance of the above proclamation by the bishops, 15 of the 20 withdrew from the conference, met at another place, and solemnly proclaimed that they were the church of the United Brethren in Christ, and that the majority of the general conference had formed a new church. They therefore proceeded to elect bishops and to do business as though they were the regular, authorized, and legally constituted general conference of the church. The regular conference, after declaring the amended constitution adopted, proceeded with its business as the regularly organized body of the church. Complainants derive their authority from the latter body; the defendants, from the former. The defendants took possession of the property, and refused to the complainants any use thereof. The property in question was deeded to, and belongs to, the United Brethren in Christ; and the sole question is, Which of these contending parties represents the church, as trustees of the property in controversy? We have stated above the history of this unfortunate controversy, which has found its way from the ecclesiastical into the civil courts of several of the states, so far as we deem it necessary to an understanding and determination of the present suit.

1. It is contended on the part of the defendants that the revised confession of faith is a radical change from the old, and that by its adoption the faith and doctrine upon which the church was founded have been subverted and overthrown; that the members who constituted the majority of the conference became heretics to the true faith,—placed themselves outside the pale of the church; that the conference no longer represented the church; and that the small minority which withdrew, and those who follow them, have kept the true faith, and are in fact the church. If this contention be sustained, it follows that the minority is entitled to the possession of the church property. It is the settled law of this country that the judgments of the judicial tribunals of church organizations upon matters of faith, discipline, and the general polity and tenets of the church, are binding upon the civil courts. Connitt v. Reformed Prot. Dutch Church of New Prospect, 54 N. Y. 551; Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 456; Müller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 548; Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666; Lamb v. Cain, 129 Ind. 486, 14 L. R. A. 518; Schweiker v. Hussar, 146 Ill. 399. The rule and the reason therefor are ably stated in Watson v. Jones, as follows: "In this class of cases, we think the rule of action which should govern the civil courts, founded in a broad and sound view of the relations of church and state under our system of laws, and supported by a preponderating weight of judicial authority, is that whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law, have been decided by the highest of these church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final, and as binding on them, in their application to the case before them. In this country the full and free right to entertain any religious belief, to practice any religious principle, and to teach any religious doctrine, which does not violate the laws of morality and property, and which does not infringe personal rights, is conceded to all. The law knows no heresy, and is committed to the support of no dogma, the establishment of no sect. The right to organize voluntary religious associations, to assist in the expression and dissemination of any religious doctrine, and to create tribunals for the decision of controverted questions of faith within the association, and for the ecclesiastical government of all the individual members, congregations, and officers within the general association, is unquestioned. All who unite themselves to such a body do so with an implied consent to this government, and are bound to submit to it. But it would be a vain consent, and would lead to the total subversion of such religious bodies, if any one aggrieved by one of their decisions could appeal to the secular courts, and have them reversed. It is of the essence of these religious unions, and of their right to establish tribunals for the decision of questions arising among themselves, that those decisions should be binding in all cases of ecclesiastical cognizance, subject only to such appeals as the organism itself provides for. Nor do we see that justice would be likely to be promoted by submitting those decisions to review in the ordinary judicial tribunals. Each of these large and influential bodies (to mention no others, let reference be had to the Protestant Episcopal, the Methodist Episcopal, and the Presbyterian Churches) has a body of constitutional and ecclesiastical law of its own, to be found in their written organic laws, their books of discipline, in their collections of precedents, in their usage and customs, which, as to each, constitute a system of ecclesiastical law and religious faith that tasks the ablest minds to become familiar with. It is not to be supposed that the judges of the civil courts can be as competent in the ecclesiastical law and religious faith of all these bodies as the ablest men in each are in reference to their own. It would therefore be an appeal from the more learned tribunal in the law, which should decide the case, to one which is less so." There can be no exception to this rule, except in a case where, even in the minds of laymen, no doubt can exist, and it is clear beyond controversy, that the fundamental principles of the church have been destroyed by the one party, and been adhered to by the other. In the present case the intention on the part of the so-called "Liberals" to adhere to the substance of the old confession of faith is manifest. The conference of 1885 resolved to make no departure in substance therefrom, and so instructed the commission in its work of revision. In the discussion which took place in the conference of 1889, the radicals do not appear to have attacked the confession of faith, as reported from the commission. One member of the conference, towards the close of the debate, said: "Is it not marvelous that not a brother on the other side of the house, from Brother Barnaby to Bishop Wright, has said a word against the work of the commission itself? They have not said anything against the confession of faith, as it has been formulated and presented to us. They do not say that it is any different from the old one, or that there is any heresy in it. . . . It corresponds with the old. It expresses it better, and in a more beautiful and orderly form, than the old one did. It also brings in some doctrines that were scattered through the discipline in various forms, and they are put in a new arrangement." The truth of this statement does not appear to have been questioned by any member of the opposition. Leading bishops of the church, and theologians of other churches, have testified that in their judgment there is no difference in meaning and substance between the two. It is moreover established by the evidence that the same doctrines which were taught before have been taught in the churches controlled by the liberals since the conference in 1889. That conference, composed of the bishops and learned divines of the church and being its highest judicial tribunal, and having the clear jurisdiction over the subject, has decided the question. What sense or reason is there in holding that the decisions of this ecclesiastical court upon a pure question of religious faith and doctrine may be viewed and overruled by a court composed exclusively of laymen? The churches of this country have wisely left the decision of these questions to their own tribunals, and the civil courts have wisely accepted them as binding and final. But it is insisted that property rights are involved, and that, therefore, the civil court must examine and determine the question. We cannot assent to this contention. In these controversies, personal or property rights are usually involved. The one is as dear as the other. When a minister is charged with preaching heresy, both his personal and property rights are involved. In all such cases, when the issue depends upon whether the faith of the church has been subverted, the decision of the church judicatory which has jurisdiction of the question is conclusive. Civil courts will not interfere in these controversies, even in cases where rights of property are involved, except in the case of a clear and palpable violation of trust. No such violation has been established in this case on account of the adoption of the revised confession of faith, the validity of which has been established by the highest judicial authority of the church.

3. It is next contended by the defendants that the proceedings for amending the constitution were irregular and void, mainly for the reason that no request was made therefor by "two thirds of the whole society" as provided by the constitution; and that, even if the preliminary measures to secure the vote were legal, still the constitution failed of adoption, because two thirds of the members of the church did not vote for it. We do not think the question here involved depends upon the determination of the validity of the adoption of the amended constitution. If it be admitted that the amended constitution was not adopted, it does not follow that the minority of less than one eighth, which seceded from the conference, and their followers, constitute the true church, and are entitled to the possession of its temporalities, and the entire church property, aggregating in value about five millions of dollars. Clear, indeed, must be the case which will result in setting aside the cardinal principle which lies at the foundation of free government, in church as well as in state, viz., the right of the majority to rule. If ecclesiastical bodies, in their legislative capacity, commit unconstitutional acts, these acts may be set aside by the courts, and they be compelled to observe and act under the constitution legally adopted for their guidance. This is the rule in municipal government, and is equally applicable to church government. There is no more reason in holding that church officers, when acting illegally, do thereby cease to represent their church, and to constitute its legislative, executive, or judicial body, than there would be in holding that municipal officers, when so acting, thereby cease to be such officers, or to constitute the legal authority of the municipality. Both may be impeached or deposed, but, until they are, they are de facto and de jure officers of the organization which elected them. Courts may, by their decrees, keep such officers within constitutional limits, but will not declare them outside the pale of the church, and turn the organization over to the minority, because the majority has committed an error in determining that a law has been properly enacted, or its constitution regularly adopted. The conference of 1885, which proposed the amendments, was a constitutional body, regularly elected. So, also, was the conference of 1889, which ratified them. As already shown, there has been no departure from the religious principles upon which the church was founded, and its faith is still the same. It is important, we think, in this connection, to note wherein the old and amended constitution agree and wherein they differ. Both declare that the general conference shall enact no rule or ordinance which shall change or destroy the confession of faith, or the itinerant plan, or which shall deprive local preachers of votes in the annual conferences. Both hold the right of appeal inviolate, declare against human slavery, provide for the same conferences, the same methods of electing bishops; and the amended constitution makes no change whatever in the officers of the church, in their rights and duties, or in the general form of government. The clauses in regard to the ownership of church property are identical in language. The main changes are in the provision for lay delegation in the general conference, and in the amendment in regard to "secret combinations." The amended article on this subject reads as follows: "We declare that all secret combinations which infringe upon the rights of those outside their organization, and whose principles and practices are injurious to the Christian character of their members, are contrary to the Word of God, and that Christians ought to have no connection with them. The general conference shall have power to enact such rules of discipline with respect to such combinations as in its judgment it may deem proper." Evidently this article on secret combinations is the chief one which has caused the dissensions and divisions in this church. We are not concerned, however, in interpreting the meaning of this article in the old constitution; nor in determining wherein, if at all, it differs from the one in the amended constitution. It is not now essential. Both the conferences of 1885 and 1889 acted in entire good faith, and in the belief that their proceedings were constitutional. They have been sustained by the courts of last resort of several of the states, and by the learned circuit judge who, in the present case, wrote an able and exhaustive opinion. Schlichter v. Keiter, 156 Pa. 119, 23 L. R. A. 161; Lamb v. Cain, supra. Grant that the action of the conference was illegal in declaring the amendments adopted, it is, indeed, a startling proposition that by this act the conference destroyed its identity, ceased to represent the church, seceded from it, and thereby became a new and different church. The proposition finds no principle in law, equity, or good sense upon which to stand. The 15 who left the regularly constituted conference became the seceders, and not those who remained in it. If the defendants are right in their contention, it would follow that, if the conference had been a unit in declaring the amended constitution adopted, in which event its action would have been no more blinding than now, the members of any local church might have seized the church property, on the ground that they were the sole representatives of the true church, and that all the others were heretics. The minority in this case have mistaken their remedy. They should have pursued a legal and orderly course, which was clearly open to them. They should have protested, and, failing in this, have applied to the proper courts to determine the validity of the proceedings to adopt the amended constitution; and, if such course found them void, they would hold the old constitution in force, and compel the officers of the church to recognize and act under it. This proposition seems to us so clear that we deem further argument unnecessary.

This disposition of the case renders it unnecessary to enter upon the discussion and adjudication of the regularity of the proceedings. It follows that the complainants derive their authority from the regularly organized conference, that they are the representatives and trustees of the church, and as such are entitled to the use and possession of the property. Decree should be affirmed, with costs.

Lydia PATTERSON, Pff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

A married woman may make herself chargeable with the value of services

NOTE.—Liability of wife and husband for legal services to her in a divorce suit.

I. Husband's liability.

1. Doctrine of.
2. Necessaries.
3. Husband not liable.

II. Liability of the wife.

1. In general.
2. Wife's promise to pay.
  - a. Prior promise.
  - b. Subsequent promises.
  - c. Under state statutes.
3. English decisions.

I. Husband's liability.

Upon the question of the husband's liability for the costs and expenses of the wife in divorce proceedings, the courts cannot be said to be unanimous. In some cases where he is held liable, his responsibility is placed upon the ground of an implied promise arising out of the wife's power to bind the husband as his agent, and upon the ground that such expenses are necessities.

The husband, however, has been relieved from liability upon these doctrines in some states, and it will also be found that his liability has been denied where the proceedings have been instituted by the wife without lawful or reasonable cause, and also in cases where she has ample estate.

1. Doctrine of.

The liability of the husband for the contracts of his wife is imposed by reason of his assent thereto, rendered upon her employment to secure a divorce from her husband, although the suit is discontinued.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon defendant's alleged promise to pay for certain services rendered to her by plaintiff as an attorney at law. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. John D. Conely, for plaintiff in error:

or approval of them, or because the law of marriage has imposed upon him the duty of supplying her with necessities during the marriage, until she has relinquished or forfeited a right to claim them by her own voluntary act, misconduct, or crime. Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417.

Upon these principles it must rest. Ray v. Adden, 50 N. H. 82, 9 Am. Rep. 175.

The wife's authority, where it exists, arises from the relation, if not as an incident essential to its preservation, certainly as a consequence of its continued existence, and not as a power reserved for its destruction. Morrison v. Holt, 42 N. H. 478, 80 Am. Dec. 120.

It has been held, however, that according to common-law principles, he is liable to the legal adviser whom his wife may employ in prosecuting such a suit. Williams v. Monroe, 18 B. Mon. 514.

The legal mind must, in the end, rest upon his implied promise as the only just ground of a jurisdiction, which is almost everywhere exercised. Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 166, 18 Am. Rep. 27.

The obligation to support implies the right of protection from the wrongs of all persons, and the necessary means to enforce such remedies as the laws provide, and where the husband violates the law and his sacred obligations towards his wife, he should afford her facilities for vindicating her rights in a court of justice. Newman v. Newman, 69 Ill. 167.

Inasmuch as ordinarily, the husband possesses and controls their joint earnings, and the wife, without pecuniary means, would be utterly powerless in a litigation with the husband, the law, from a sense of propriety and justice, implies a promise of the husband to pay the fees of the attorneys, necessary to the protection of the interests of the wife. Porter v. Briggs, supra.

Upon such implied liability the attorney is entitled to recover for his services when he acts in good faith, without collusion or oppression, and where the suit is not the mere vindication of a right. Preston v. Johnson, 65 Iowa, 286.

In actions for divorce, the husband is liable to the wife's attorney for reasonable fees earned in conducting the litigation in behalf of the wife, and it cannot be considered an open question. Clyde v. Peavy, 74 Iowa, 47. In this case the wife employed counsel, and, in connection with such employment, authorized him to engage an assistant counsel if he was of opinion that one was necessary.

The suit brought by the wife must, however, be reasonable and justifiable. McCurley v. Stockbridge, 62 Md. 422, 50 Am. Rep. 229.

And such fees must be reasonable and necessary. Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 166, 18 Am. Rep. 27.

The amount allowed always depends largely upon the circumstances of the case, and the pecuniary resources of the parties. McCurley v. Stockbridge, supra.

In Porter v. Briggs, supra, the husband was held liable for the services of an attorney in divorce proceedings instituted by the husband, in which the wife was found innocent.

Where a nonsuit was granted in the court below, upon the ground that the husband could not be chargeable for the services of an attorney in bringing a suit against him without his consent, on appeal the court held that although this was undoubtedly true as a general principle, yet such a 24 L. R. A.

suit by a wife for a divorce must be excepted from its operation owing to the necessity of the case. Sprayberry v. Merk, 80 Ga. 81, 76 Am. Dec. 687.

In such a case, the wife is sui juris, having a clear right to institute and conduct that kind of a suit independently of her husband's consent, and such right is practically denied to her, if she can command no means of paying the necessary agents to conduct the suit, and therefore she may charge the common funds of herself and husband in his hands. Sprayberry v. Merk, supra, where the action was amicably settled before trial.

Yet only with the real value of such services as she may procure, and not with the price which she may fix on them by her contract. Sprayberry v. Merk, supra.

In case of a divorce a mensa et thoro it has been held that her attorney may sue the husband except where the cruelty complained of was not actual, but only statutory, cruelty. Peck v. Marling, 23 W. Va. 708.

Where, however, the basis of such divorce was cruelty or inhuman treatment, or a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt on her part, whether she has a separate estate or not, and whether he has much, or little or no property, in a contract only implied from the fact that the services were rendered by her attorney she can never be sued by him for his fees, the husband being responsible, and the law implying that he was looked to by the attorney for payment. Ibid.

His liability arises out of the incidental power of the court to provide for enabling the wife to prosecute or defend the suit, whenever a proper case shall be presented. Thompson v. Thompson, 3 Head, 527.

All the powers of the court on the subject of divorce are given by statute, and the court is not authorized either to decree temporary alimony or award costs. Wing v. Hurlbut, 15 Vt. 607, 40 Am. Dec. 695.

During the pendency of an action for divorce, the court has power to require the husband to pay such sums for the support of the wife, and to enable her to carry on the action, as in its discretion might be deemed necessary and proper under section 2361 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin. Clarke v. Burke, 65 Wis. 359, 56 Am. Rep. 631.

Upon the construction of this statute, however, the attorneys would not be entitled as a matter of right, but only in the sound discretion of the court, it being competent for the court to refuse the costs of prosecuting such an action. Clarke v. Burke, supra.

It has been stated that upon general principles, independent of statute, the husband, whether the plaintiff or defendant, is obliged to pay the expenses incurred by the wife in prosecuting or defending a divorce, and that he certainly is obliged to pay where she has established her claim to it. Melzer v. Melzer, 1 Para. Sci. Eq. Cas. 78. To the same effect, Graves v. Cole, 19 Pa. 171.

The husband has been held liable for the wife's attorney's fees in proceedings unsuccessfully prosecuted by the husband against the wife for divorce, upon the ground that she was a common drunkard. Conant v. Burnham, 183 Mass. 503, 43 Am. Rep. 532.

The wife's attorneys were allowed to recover against the administrator of the deceased hus-

A husband was liable at the common law for the services of a solicitor in divorce proceedings brought by the wife upon the ground of cruel treatment, the husband not being absent from the realm and being of abundant means.

band's estate, the divorce suit pending at the time of his death, the court stating that in that state it had never been otherwise than that the husband had been required to pay reasonable counsel fees, for services rendered the wife in suits for divorce. McCurley v. Stockbridge, 62 Md. 422, 50 Am. Rep. 329.

So the husband has been held liable in an action before a justice of the peace for services rendered the wife in divorce proceedings, prosecuted by the husband, in which the wife made an application to the court for alimony pendente lite and counsel's fees, but before the same were decreed the husband withdrew his action. Gossett v. Patten, 23 Kan. 340.

In Preston v. Johnson, 65 Iowa, 285, where the husband was sued for the wife's attorney's fees, the following question was certified for determination by the court. "In an action at law against a husband, and on an implied promise to pay for professional services rendered for his wife, in an action by her for divorce, does the necessity for such services, or the implied promise therefrom by the husband to pay for same arise when the verified allegations of the wife with sufficient corroborated testimony entitle the wife to a divorce, or to establish such necessity for professional services on an implied promise to pay for the same by the husband, as to require that the truth of the allegations, sufficient to entitle the wife to a decree, must be established by a preponderance of the testimony?" The court held that under the facts as stated in the question, the necessity arose; and further that the attorney was not bound to establish the divorce of the wife before recovery, the proceeds being commenced in good faith upon a verified statement of facts, which if true, would entitle the plaintiff to a divorce; and in such a case it matters not that the suit is dismissed.

The 32d section of the Revised Statutes of Kentucky, p. 207 (chapter on Costs) provides that in suits for alimony and divorce the husband shall pay the costs of each party, unless it appears that the wife is in fault and has ample estate to pay the same.

The above provision has been applied to all cases for divorce and alimony without exception. Ballard v. Caperton, 2 Met. (Ky.) 412.

There must be a concurrence of the two conditions, in order to exempt the husband from the liability thus imposed. Ibid.

And they must be made to appear in the cause, and though it may be made to appear that the wife is in fault, yet if it be not also made to appear that she has ample estate to pay the costs the husband is bound to pay them. Ibid.

So if she has the estate and is not at fault, the husband is liable. Ibid.

In all such cases, the husband is bound to pay the costs of each party, including the reasonable compensation to the attorneys of the wife, no matter what the result of the suit may be, or by what cause it may have been terminated, unless the two conditions mentioned in the statute appear. Ibid.

And it is not necessary, under the statute, that the suit should be brought regularly to a hearing and be terminated by judgment. Ibid.

So the death of the wife before trial will not avoid the husband's liability. Ibid.

Such fees being fixable and ascertainable by the court, even after the wife's death. Ibid.

Yet, in Kentucky the husband is only liable under the above section of the revised statutes. Williams v. Monroe, 18 B. Mon. 514.

It has been held, however, that the effect of the provision of the statute was not to entitle the wife to a judgment against the husband for her costs in the classes of cases mentioned. Nikirk v. Nikirk, 3 Met. (Ky.) 432.

In Nikirk v. Nikirk, supra, it was held, upon the construction of the above statute, that as the law exempts the wife from liability to the officers of the court for their costs, the object of the statute was to give to the latter a right to look to the husband, who was required "to pay the costs of each party" except in the two cases which it provides for.

The principles established in Ballard v. Caperton, supra, were approved of in Meyer v. Meyer, 3 Met. (Ky.) 238, and in Williams v. Monroe, supra, the doctrine was said to be well settled, that the husband will be chargeable for the expenses thus rendered necessary by his own misconduct toward the wife.

2. Necessaries.

Counsel's fees have been looked upon and considered in the light of necessities, for which the husband would be liable, as upon an implied contract, in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Wisconsin, while the contrary has been held in Alabama, Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, and West Virginia.

The decisions upholding the husband's liability as for necessities do so upon the ground that such fees are an absolute necessity for the relief of the wife, and make the liability dependent upon the necessity of the case.

The cases holding the contrary doctrine look upon such fees as a matter of favor and privilege, and not of necessity, and refuse them upon the ground that it was not meant to provide for the future condition of the wife as a single woman, or as the wife of another.

They further hold that the wife, in such a case, could not be considered as acting as the agent of the husband under his authority.

The duty of providing necessities for the wife is strictly marital and is imposed by the common law in reference only to a state of coverture and not of divorce. Clarke v. Burke, 55 Wis. 359, 55 Am. Rep. 631.

By that law a valid contract of marriage was and is indissoluble, and therefore by it the husband could never have been placed under obligations to provide for the expenses of its dissolution. Such an event was a legal impossibility. Ibid.

Necessaries are to be provided by a husband for his wife to sustain her as his wife, and not to provide for her future condition as a single woman, or perhaps as the wife of another man. Ibid.; Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 423.

To dissolve the bonds of matrimony between husband and wife on her request, or to resist the husband's petition for that purpose, can only be considered as necessary for her safety or preservation, so as to enable her to procure professional assistance therefor on his credit and at his costs. Wing v. Hurlburt, 15 Vt. 607, 40 Am. Dec. 665.

In Conant v. Burnham, 133 Mass. 503, 43 Am. Rep. 532, the defense was put upon the broad ground

It may be that after a chancery court has made an allowance the common-law remedy is suspended while the chancery suit is pending.

Crittenden v. Schermerhorn, 89 Mich. 661, 88 Am. Rep. 440.

But a husband was liable even when the di-vorice proceeding was in the ecclesiastical court. Suit in a common-law court against the husband by a proctor for his services in the ecclesiastical court was sustained.

Ottaway v. Hamilton, supra.

The husband is liable notwithstanding the proceedings were discontinued by the wife.

that such services were not necessities but the court held that legal services did not fall within such universal and general exclusion of the term "necessaries," there being times when such services were absolutely essential for the relief of the wife's physical or mental distress.

They have been deemed necessities, where the conduct of the husband has rendered them necessary for the personal protection and safety of the wife. Morrison v. Holt, 42 N. H. 478, 80 Am. Dec. 120.

Her authority is implied, because of the marital relation, and depends upon the necessity of the expenditures for her support or protection as wife. Ibid.

In Warner v. Heiden, 28 Wis. 517, 9 Am. Rep. 518, the husband was sued for legal services rendered to the wife, in an action commenced by him in which he was defeated. The court held the husband liable upon the ground that such services were necessities; and further that inasmuch as the husband was present during a part of the time that the services were rendered, he was liable upon an implied promise to pay.

But in Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227, 255, it was held that counsel's fees in a divorce suit were not necessities, and that the law would imply no contract by the husband to pay for the same.

It cannot be said that divorces, to the extent allowed by law, are matters of necessity, but rather matters of privilege and favor. Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417.

They are not regarded in law as necessities, for furnishing which an implied contract arises against the husband. Cooke v. Newell, 40 Conn. 586.

Necessaries are to be provided by a husband for his wife to sustain her as his wife, and not to provide for her future condition as a single woman, or perhaps as the wife of another man. Shelton v. Pendleton, supra.

The duty of providing necessities for the wife is strictly marital, and is imposed by the common law, in reference only to a state of coverture, and not of divorce. Ibid.

The same conclusions were arrived at in Dow v. Eyster, 79 Ill. 254.

In Johnson v. Williams, 3 G. Greene, 97, 54 Am. Dec. 491, where it was contended that they were necessities, according to the technical legal meaning of the word, the court held that recovery could not lie upon that ground, the wife not binding the husband as his agent, not acting under his authority with his concurrence, express or implied, and that the husband was not liable as for necessities; neither was he liable upon the wife's authority to employ counsel as his agent in the absence of proof that she had authority, or his concurrence in her acts.

If she sues for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, though she succeed in her suit, her attorney cannot sue for his fees in such suit, as necessities furnished to the wife, the obtaining such a divorce because of his misconduct rendering it distasteful and offensive for her to live with him as a wife, being a very different thing from food and raiment, or protection of her person from his cruelty. Peck v. Marling, 22 W. Va. 708.

The obtaining of such a divorce by a wife from her husband for any of the reasons mentioned in the West Virginia statute cannot be regarded as necessary in the only sense in which that word is used, when the wife is authorized by law, without her husband's consent, or even against his protest, to charge him with necessities. Ibid.

It can hardly be well conceived how the common dissolution of a marriage can be necessary for the protection of a woman as a wife. Ibid.

But where a wife has employed an attorney to obtain a divorce from her husband for actual cruelty, and there is reasonable apprehension of violence when the suit is brought, or the apprehension of violence is established by her success in such suit, she may charge her husband without his concurrence, with her attorney's fees, and the attorney may sue the husband therefor, the fees being regarded as necessities to her actual protection, in the same manner as such fees are considered necessities, when her husband is bound over to keep the peace. Ibid.

In Langbein v. Schneider, 27 Abb. N. C. 228, the husband was sued to recover for advice given, and professional services rendered to the wife, relative to the institution of an action by her against the defendant for a separation, where, before the service of the papers, the parties became reconciled. The court held that there was no doubt that it was well settled law that the wife had an implied agency to bind her husband for her necessities, when he fails to supply them, and relying upon the English cases and two Georgia cases, held the husband liable.

3. Husband not liable.

The right of action against the husband for such services rendered for the wife has been denied in many cases where her attorney has been allowed to recover for services rendered to the wife, in prosecutions against the husband for breach of the peace, or for the purpose of protecting her from personal violence. Clarke v. Burke, 65 Wis. 350, 58 Am. Rep. 631.

There is no right to such expenses at common law. Ibid.

Such costs and expenses could only have been had in a divorce action, if at all. Ibid.

Upon this theory, the right of action at law against the husband, in favor of attorneys who have rendered services for the wife, in actions of divorce, has frequently been denied. Ibid.

It is not the policy of the law to imply from the marital relation any authority in the wife to bind the husband for the expenses of such proceedings. Morrison v. Holt, 42 N. H. 478, 80 Am. Dec. 120.

By the common law, a valid contract of marriage was and is indissoluble, and the refore by it the husband could never have been placed under obligation to provide for the expenses of a dissolution, such an event being a legal impossibility. Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417.

A wife, in that capacity, can no more bind her husband by her acts, than a third person can do so although an agency or assent may be, and often is more readily presumed from the acts and conditions of a wife than in ordinary cases. Ibid.

An action at law cannot be maintained by a solicitor prosecuting or defending an action for divorce for the wife against a husband. Dow v. Eyster, 79 Ill. 254.

If, under the settled practice of the court, the husband has not been held bound by any application from the statute, to furnish directly to the wife the means to procure a divorce, he cannot be compelled to do so indirectly by any inference from the same statute. Morrison v. Holt, supra.

Neither will the subsequent husband of the wife be liable for such costs, as it is not a personal debt of hers. Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 524, 43 Am. Rep. 780.

And the husband's liability is not increased by reason of the fact that the wife's petition contains a claim for the custody of the minor children. Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417.

In Cooke v. Newell, 40 Conn. 598, the court looked upon the case of Shelton v. Pendleton, supra, as having settled the law in Connecticut.

In the above case, the suit was prosecuted by the husband against the wife, and was successfully defended by her attorneys. Cooke v. Newell, supra.

The proper practice is to apply to the court for its order upon the husband, for an allowance for counsel's fees and alimony. Ibid.

An attorney cannot maintain an action against the husband, but must apply to the court in which the proceedings were had, for an allowance for his services as part of the costs of the action in the divorce suit. Williams v. Monroe, 13 B. Mon. 514.

The reason is, that it is never necessary for her safety as wife to obtain divorce from him, and when divorced absolutely, he is no longer under a duty to provide for her support and protection. Ibid.

Where the services are unnecessary, or where the wife is able to pay for them, or where an allowance has been made for them, and probably where the wife is in the wrong, such an action cannot be maintained. Gossett v. Patten, 23 Kan. 340.

The husband is not liable, upon general principles of law, where the suit is without any just or reasonable foundation, and where the cause is prompted by motives of malice or oppression towards the husband. Thompson v. Thompson, 8 Head. 527.

Neither is he liable where the verdict of a jury demonstrates the fact that the husband is without blame, the suit by the wife without foundation, the proceedings not being meritorious. Newman v. Newman, 69 Ill. 157.

Nor where the wife, as actor, has voluntarily and understandingly dismissed her suit; more especially where the ground of dismissal is, the probability that the suit was unadvisably instituted and cannot be maintained. Thompson v. Thompson, supra.

When the wife is plaintiff in such a case, and has either discontinued it or been defeated, and judgment been rendered against her, neither she nor her attorneys can have any claim upon him for the costs or expenses of her fruitless, and probably causeless, prosecution. Phillips v. Simmons, 11 Abb. Pr. 237, 20 How. Pr. 342.

So where the action for divorce was dismissed without prejudice, the court held that the husband was not liable. Ray v. Adden, 60 N. H. 82, 9 Am. Rep. 173.

In the above case the court stated that it never was understood that counsel should recover his services against the husband in such a case, else the courts would not have been making orders of allowances to the wife to enable her to make her defense. Ibid.

The same conclusion was reached where the parties to a divorce suit condoned each other's of-

The rule at the common law was that the wife might seek protection from cruelty, and the fair and reasonable charges for solicitor's fees be recovered by the solicitor against the husband.

fenses, voluntarily abandoned the action, and asked that the same be dismissed, even though the court had adjudged and decreed the defendant to pay the same. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 176.

In such a case the attorneys had but to gather up their briefs and retire, and the court should at once dismiss the case and make no further order. Ibid.

After the divorce proceedings have been amicably arranged between the parties, the wife's attorney has no power to procure an order against the husband for the payment of fees, such order being only obtainable during the pendency of the proceedings. McCulloch v. Murphy, 45 Ill. 256.

Where the wife's attorney sued for professional services in prosecuting a libel for divorce, which was dismissed, the parties going together again, it was held that the husband was not liable. Morrison v. Holt, 43 N. H. 473, 30 Am. Dec. 120.

In such a case it is not sufficient for the plaintiffs, in order to charge the defendant, merely to show that his misconduct occasioned the proceedings, but it must be shown that they were necessary for the personal protection and safety of the wife. Ibid.

Where the wife employed four counsel, it was held that they were not necessary, one competent counsel, or one professional firm, being sufficient, and that the attorneys in such case must look to their client alone for their fees. Dugan v. Dugan, 1 Duv. 239.

In Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417, the plaintiffs, the attorneys for the wife, in successful divorce proceedings against the husband, sued the latter for their fees, and as there was no request or assent by the defendant to their employment, the court held the claim unsustainable.

Where it was sought to charge the husband for counsel fees, in a justice's court, for the purpose of enabling the wife to prosecute her suit, it was held that such action would not lie, as it was an incident to the wife's right to temporary alimony, which was only cognizable by a justice of the superior court. Glenn v. Hill, 50 Ga. 94.

And where the wife filed a bill which was answered with a denial and by way of cross-bill, the proceedings finally terminating in the husband's favor, it was held that the court had no power to require the husband to pay the same. Newman v. Newman, 69 Ill. 167.

Again, where the husband was sued for professional services of the wife in a suit for divorce, brought by her against the husband, in which the court decreed a payment of alimony, and of a certain amount for counsel fees, with which order the husband complied and the divorce was granted, the court held that the court's action in that respect was final and conclusive, and that the husband having acted up to the order, was not liable for a subsequent action brought for the recovery of the fees. Dow v. Eyster, 79 Ill. 254.

In Sherwin v. Mahen, 78 Iowa, 467, the question was whether an attorney, who in good faith renders professional services for the wife in a divorce proceeding against her husband, could recover against the husband upon an implied promise to pay, and the court held, the grounds of complaint not being true and the action unnecessary for the protection of the wife, that the husband was not liable for the fees and advances made by the attorneys.

The wife was not liable at the common law. Wilson v. Burr, 25 Wend. 886; Cook v. Walton, 38 Ind. 228; Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 624, 43 Am. Rep. 780; Whipple v. Giles, 55 N. H. 139.

The only statute that has any bearing is How. Anno. Stat., § 6297, which provides that

It was contended in that case that the rule as announced in Johnson v. Williams, 3 G. Greene, 97, 54 Am. Dec. 491, was overruled in Porter v. Briggs, 38 Iowa, 166, 18 Am. Rep. 27, but the court held that the very language of the case was decisive of the question, and that it was not overruled, and reference to the opinion in the latter case was not in conflict with the court's conclusion therein announced, while the reasons upon which it was based might be admitted to conflict with the court's views.

In the above case, the court held that the case of Clyde v. Peavy, 74 Iowa, 47, did not controvert the rule of a general liability of the husband for fees in such cases, the point of dispute therein being that the plaintiff was not employed by the wife, and that if he rendered services it was as assistant counsel, and that the assistance was unnecessary. Ibid.

In a suit brought to recover counsel fees against the husband, whose suit against the wife was dismissed, the court held the husband was not liable, having made no promise, except such as might be implied from the facts. McCullough v. Robinson, 2 Ind. 630.

Where, after the pendency for nearly two years of a suit for divorce by the wife, she dismissed her petition "without prejudice" and subsequently the court, upon motion, made a peremptory order upon the husband for payment of her attorney's fees, the court held that the husband could not be made liable for such costs, and that the court erred in making such order, the wife being in fault and having an estate ample for the payment of the same. Dugan v. Dugan, 1 Duv. 289.

In Coffin v. Dunham, 8 Cush. 404, 54 Am. Dec. 799, the court refused to compel the husband to pay the wife's counsel fees in a divorce suit, stating that the action was without precedent, and contrary to the practice and course of decisions in that state.

Where, subsequent to a divorce the wife petitioned the court for alimony, and an amicable settlement was arrived at between the parties without the intervention of counsel, the court held that the wife's counsel had no equitable right to interfere upon the ground that such settlement defrauded him of his right to expenses. Gregory v. Gregory, 32 N. J. Eq. 424.

In the above case, the husband in a letter to the wife requesting an amicable arrangement in the matter, closed by saying, "My father always said 'Steer clear of the lawyers.' I repeat it to you," and his advice seemed to have had the desired effect.

Where the wife's action was abandoned the parties becoming reconciled, the court held there was no possible ground for maintaining the action, as the wife could not be considered the agent of the husband with authority to commence an action against him, perhaps without cause, and afterwards discontinue it and thereby make him liable for her attorney's fees. Phillips v. Simmons, 11 Abb. Pr. 267, 20 How. Pr. 342.

In Wing v. Hurlburt, 15 Vt. 607, 40 Am. Dec. 605, it was sought to recover the wife's costs and attorney's fees in defending the husband's petition in divorce, and in prosecuting a cross-petition against him the court held that the husband was not liable.

If, however, the divorce was obtained by the 24 L. R. A.

actions may be brought against a married woman in relation to her sole property.

The bill in this case asked for permanent alimony. This is in no sense separate property. "It is not an estate nor separate property of the wife. It is an allowance for the nourishment of the wife, resting in discretion wife by reason of desertion or abandonment, the husband cannot be made liable for the fees. Peck v. Marling, 22 W. Va. 708.

In Clarke v. Burke, 65 Wis. 359, 56 Am. Rep. 631, an action was brought against the husband to recover fees in a suit brought by the wife against the husband for divorce. The court stated that if the attorney could recover, it was because he had a valid claim against the husband as a matter of right, there being no express promise or agreement on the husband's part to pay for the services rendered, and there was no claim that the wife had any express authority to bind her husband to make such payment.

II. Liability of the wife.

1. In general.

As to the liability of the wife, the authorities are not unanimous, some have held that if credit is given to the wife she alone is liable, others base her responsibility in a decree a vinculo matrimonii upon her implied promise, and the same has been held in a decree a mensa et thoro where they lived apart owing to abandonment and desertion.

Some cases hold such service chargeable against her separate estate, and enforceable in equity, while in others she is held relieved by reason of her common-law disability.

It is well settled, and for good reasons, that if the credit be in fact given to the wife alone, the presumption of the contract obligatory upon the husband, expressed or implied, is repelled, and in such a case the plaintiffs must be considered as relying upon the honor of the wife, or as having acted gratuitously. Shelton v. Pendleton, supra.

In such cases the presumption repels no assent or authority by the husband to their employment, and they are employed by the wife for her sole purpose in opposition to her husband's interest, and credit was given in reality to the wife alone. Ibid.

When the attorney is employed by the wife to obtain a divorce, she living separate and apart from her husband, the husband not being liable for the costs in a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, the wife is liable upon her implied promise to pay, the services being rendered at her request and for her benefit. Peck v. Marling, 22 W. Va. 708.

If the wife obtained a divorce a mensa et thoro, while living separate and apart from her husband, and the basis of the suit was abandonment and desertion, she would be as liable to such a suit, as she would be if the divorce sought was one a vinculo matrimonii, no matter whether she had or had not a separate estate, and whether the contract was express or implied. Ibid.

With a reasonable compensation for the services of the attorney, a married woman may charge her separate estate. Viser v. Bertrand, 14 Ark. 267.

In regard to her separate estate, the wife may have rights independent of and adverse to those of her husband, which will be protected, and her liabilities in respect to such estate will be enforced in equity. Ibid.

To deny her the power of binding her estate for the retainer of competent professional aid, so far as from being an advantage, it would disarm her in a contest already unequal, and require her to come into court defenseless save as an object of sympathy. Ibid.

In Lamy v. Catron (N. M.) Jan. 21, 1890, it was held variable and revocable." It is essentially temporary, conditional and dependent.

Guenther v. Jacobs, 44 Wis. 854.

It remains subject to the continuing authority of the court over it, to be exercised from time to time.

Ibid.; How. Anno. Stat. § 6248.

It is not separate property.

Guenther v. Jacobs, supra; Romaine v. Chauncey, 14 L. R. A. 712, 129 N. Y. 566.

that where the wife had ample estate of her own, she might charge it with the necessary counsel's fees to enable her to either prosecute or defend a divorce action to which she was a party, and that where she had done so in the employment of a solicitor, the court had power in the divorce proceedings, as an incident thereto, to decree such necessary fees against her separate estate as an allowance to the solicitor, so far as such fees were actually necessary, being limited to the fair value of the services rendered.

At common law a married woman is wholly incapable of making any contract whatsoever, which will bind her personally, or create against her a personal debt or obligation. Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 624, 43 Am. Rep. 780.

In Musick v. Dodson, supra, the plaintiff brought action against the wife to recover his fees in successfully prosecuting a divorce suit against the husband, and the court held she was not liable.

The failure to render such judgment where the divorce is not granted does not operate to the prejudice of the wife, as she cannot be held liable for any of the costs of the proceedings. Nikirk v. Nikirk, 8 Met. (Ky.) 432.

A married woman retaining counsel in a suit for divorce is not liable in an action for his fees. Wilson v. Burr, 25 Wend. 886.

It is no longer the subject of dispute that while a wife may employ attorneys to prosecute or defend her in an action for divorce, she is not able to bind herself, or her property, to pay for the services of such attorney. McCabe v. Britton, 79 Ind. 224.

If, however, credit has been given to the husband, the attorney cannot recover against the wife upon her contract. Peck v. Marling, 23 W. Va. 708.

2. Wife's promise to pay.

a. Prior promise.

The question, whether or not a married woman can bind herself by a simple contract, to pay a lawyer's fees in a suit for divorce against her husband, must depend upon whether or not there is a sufficient consideration upon which to base the promise to pay, and if there is not such a consideration, a promise is a mere nudum pactum, by which she is not bound. Peck v. Marling, 23 W. Va. 708.

The wife is liable upon her express promise upon which credit was given solely to her. Ibid.

Such a promise will bind her when made before the dissolution of the marriage, if at the time it was made she lived separate and apart from her husband, such a promise being binding upon her in a court of law, as though it were made while she was a feme sole. Ibid.

And though her husband might be responsible for her attorney's fees, if the divorce suit was one a mensa et thoro based upon his cruelty, still she might be bound, if when living separate and apart from her husband she employed the attorney to bring such suit, and expressly promised to pay his fees, so that she alone was looked to by him for payment. Ibid.

If however the wife has given a written guarantee for such costs, she would be liable even though her husband might still be looked to, the fact that the services were rendered at her instance and for her benefit being a sufficient consideration. Ibid.

In Cook v. Walton, 38 Ind. 228, the wife's action against her husband for divorce was refused and the attorney brought suit for his service against 24 L. R. A.

the wife. The court held that she was not liable during the marriage, and that the divorce act did not in terms, or by any fair implication, relieve a married woman from the disability of coverture, so far as to enable her to make a contract that would bind her personally in relation to a suit by her for a divorce, even though she might bring that action in her own name.

So where the wife, as defendant, promised to pay the fees of an assistant attorney out of the alimony awarded her by the court, it was held that such promise had no binding effect, neither could it be made a lien on her judgment. McCabe v. Britton, 79 Ind. 224.

b. Subsequent promise.

Upon the question of the effect of a subsequent promise of the wife to pay such fees the authorities are divided.

It has been held that professional services in divorce proceedings may be recovered against a married woman, where there is an express promise to pay made by her after the decree dissolving the marriage. Viser v. Bertrand, 14 Ark. 267; Peck v. Marling, 23 W. Va. 708.

The previous services being for her benefit and at her request, constituting a moral obligation sufficient to uphold the promise made after removal of the disability. Wilson v. Burr, 25 Wend. 886.

The contrary has, however, been held to be the case in Missouri and Indiana.

Such a promise being a mere moral obligation and not a good consideration, there being no original liability or obligation to pay. Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 624, 43 Am. Rep. 780.

If the wife could not, during the existence of marital relations with her husband, bind herself personally, then as a matter of course there could not be any consideration for the promise made by her, after the divorce was obtained, to pay for such services, and the subsequent promise would be nudum pactum. Ibid.

In Putnam v. Tennyson, 50 Ind. 456, the wife sued the defendants, her attorneys, to recover money collected and received by them for alimony in a suit in which she was divorced from her husband, and which upon demand they refused to pay, claiming that she owed them for services in such proceedings, and insisting upon her promise to pay made subsequent to the divorce. The court held, the indebtedness accruing during her coverture, that the contract was void and that the promise made after divorce to pay the amount was without consideration and invalid, but such subsequent promise if founded on a further consideration would be valid.

In the above case Chief Justice Pettit dissented from so much of the opinion as held that a married woman who employs an attorney to bring and prosecute a suit for divorce, and who renders services and accomplishes the end, was not liable for the costs, because she was a married woman, upon the ground that she was authorized by law to bring and prosecute her suit, and that she could not do so without resorting to the employment of an attorney as a necessary means, and for the value of his services she must be liable. Putnam v. Tennyson, supra.

c. Under state statutes.

The question as to the wife's liability for such fees under the statutes of the different states does not seem to have arisen in many states.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is an attorney at law, and recovered in the court below for professional services rendered to the defendant, who is a married woman. A portion of the services related to the separate estate of the woman, who is shown in the record to have had considerable property in her own right. Included in the bill of particulars was a charge of $100 for

In Whipple v. Giles, 55 N. H. 120, it was held that the General Statutes of New Hampshire, chap. 164, § 13, giving the wife power to sue and be sued in her own name, upon contracts relating to her separate property, did not apply, either in terms or by implication, to contracts outside of such property, and the court therefore dismissed a suit brought by an attorney to recover fees in a libel, instituted by her against her husband for divorce.

So in New York the statute allowing the suit in her name (2 Rev. Stat. 144, § 39), does not remove the common-law inability of a feme covert to contract. Wilson v. Burr, 25 Wend. 386.

Under sections 12 and 15 of chapter 66 of the Code of West Virginia, however, the incapacity of a married woman to make a contract binding on her in a court of law is entirely removed when she makes such contract while living separate and apart from her husband; and when living separate and apart from her husband she has the same capacity to make a contract, which shall be binding on her in a court of law, as she would have if she were a feme sole, and if work and labor is done for her at her request by a third person, a court of law will imply a promise by her to pay a reasonable compensation therefor in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, and in respect of which she could be made liable at law. Peok v. Marling, 22 W. Va. 708.

3. English decisions.

In Shepherd v. Mackoul, 3 Campb. 323, it was said that the husband's liability depended upon the necessity of the proceedings taken by the wife, and that if such proceedings were uncalled for, the wife could not make him liable for the expenses incurred thereby.

To entitle a solicitor to recover the costs from the husband, or to prove for them against the husband's estate, he must, in the absence of actual success, be able to show that he made proper investigation and inquiry into all the circumstances of the case before he commenced the proceedings. Re Hooper, Baylis v. Watkins, 33 L. J. N. S. Ch. 300, 10 Jur. N. S. 114, 9 L. T. N. S. 741, 12 Week. Rep. 324.

In the above case, it was questioned whether previous inquiries and the existence of reasonable grounds, would entitle the attorney to recover from the husband if the wife failed in the suit. Ibid.

The case of Ottaway v. Hamilton, L. R. 8 C. P. Div. 393, 47 L. J. C. P. 725, 88 L. T. N. S. 925, 26 Week. Rep. 783, decided that a solicitor, employed by a wife to take proceedings against her husband to obtain divorce, might sue the husband for "extra costs" that is, costs reasonably incurred by him beyond the costs taxed and allowed by the court, as between party and party.

In Brown v. Ackroyd, 5 Ell. & Bl. 819, 25 L. J. Q. B. 193, 2 Jur. N. S. 233, the wife, from reasonable apprehension of personal violence, left her husband's house and for the purpose of protecting herself sued for divorce a mensa et thoro. It was held that the law gave her authority to pledge her husband's credit for the expenses of the prosecution, the question as to the husband's liability being, whether at the commencement of the proceedings, there was such reasonable ground for anticipating ill treatment as to make the divorce necessary for the wife's protection.

Where there has been cruelty, a divorce a mensa et thoro may be necessary for the protection of the wife, and as she has no means of her own she will lose this protection, unless she can pledge her husband's credit. Brown v. Ackroyd, supra.

In Williams v. Fowler, McClell. & Y. 263, it was held that an action on the case would lie against the husband for the reasonable costs of proceedings at law or in equity, instituted by an attorney against him on behalf of the wife, who had been forced to leave the house by extreme ill-treatment, the parties having agreed to a separation, and the husband having tendered the attorney the rent of a cottage occupied by the wife, and undertaken to pay the costs if reasonable.

Where, pending proceedings for divorce by the wife against the husband, an amicable arrangement was arrived at, the wife's attorneys were held entitled to recover their costs against the husband. Stocken v. Patrick, 29 L. T. N. S. 507.

In Butler v. Butler, L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 32, where the queen's proctor intervened, it was held that the husband would not be ordered to give security for the wife's costs incidental to such proceeding.

The legal expenses incurred by a deserted wife preliminary and incidental to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights were held necessities for which the husband was liable, and for which she could recover, either against him or against his executors, upon the implied authority. Wilson v. Ford, L. R. 8 Exch. 68, 37 L. J. Exch. 60, 17 L. T. N. S. 605, 16 Week. Rep. 432.

In Wilson v. Ford, supra, the wife's attorney was also allowed to charge the husband with his fees, with respect to advice given the wife concerning a verbal promise of a settlement, made at the time of marriage, as to the best means of dealing with tradesmen who had supplied her with necessities, and with the landlord who was threatening to distrain for rent.

In Rice v. Shepherd, 12 C. B. N. S. 332, 6 L. T. N. S. 432, it was held that the husband was liable to an action at the suit of the wife's attorneys, for costs necessarily incurred by her in filing a petition for judicial separation, on the ground of cruelty, although the petition was not proved with, and the course prescribed by the practice of the divorce court for obtaining the wife's costs has not been pursued, such costs coming under the description of a necessary, and the English divorce acts did not take away the right of action at common law.

The common-law right of such an attorney to sue the husband as for necessities supplied to the wife is not limited to the statutory rights and remedies for costs given to the wife under the English divorce acts. Ottaway v. Hamilton, L. R. 8 C. P. Div. 393, 47 L. J. C. P. 725, 88 L. T. N. S. 925, 26 Week. Rep. 783.

The cost of a suit justifiably instituted by a married woman against her husband for a divorce, or a judicial separation, are necessities for which she may pledge her husband's credit. Stocken v. Patrick, 29 L. T. N. S. 507.

Suits for divorce, or any reference to a marriage settlement, are not the necessary means of preservation and safety, and professional charges in such cases do not come within the principles of Shepherd v. Mackoul, 3 Campb. 323, and cannot be deemed necessities.

In Re Hooper, Baylis v. Watkins, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 300, 10 Jur. N. S. 114, 9 L. T. N. S. 741, 12 Week. Rep. 324, it was held that the costs of a solicitor, employed by a married woman in proceedings on the wife's behalf, against the husband for a decree of judicial separation, are not necessities for which the husband is liable, unless there was great probability of ultimate success.

retainer and services in a divorce suit brought by defendant against her husband. This proceeding was not carried through to a determination, but was discontinued by Mrs. Patterson before a decree. Substantially the only question presented by the record is whether a married woman may, in this state, make herself chargeable with the value of services rendered upon her employment to secure a divorce from her husband. It is contended by the defendant that the husband is liable for such services, and that the wife is not. The authorities are not uniform upon the question, but we think the weight of authority negatives such liability on the part of the husband. See Schouler, Husb. & Wife, § 106, and cases cited in note. In some of the states the liability of the husband is asserted. Sprayberry v. Merk, 30 Ga. 81, 76 Am. Dec. 637; Porter v. Briggs, 88 Iowa, 166, 18 Am. Rep. 27; Langbein v. Schneider, 27 Abb. N. C. 228; and in these jurisdictions it is held that the wife is not competent to charge herself with such expenses. Musick v. Dodson, 76 Mo. 624, 43 Am. Rep. 780; Cook v. Walton, 38 Ind. 238; Whipple v. Giles, 55 N. H. 189. See, however, dissenting opinion of Pettit, Ch. J., in Putnam v. Tennyson, 50 Ind. 461. We think the cases which deny the husband's liability are more consonant with the holdings of this court that one who supplies the wife with goods apparently suitable to her situation in life does so at his peril, and can only recover if the husband has failed to supply necessities. Clark v. Cox, 82 Mich. 204. Is the wife competent to contract for such services? The wife may exhibit her bill for divorce in her own name. 2 How. Anno. Stat. § 6283. And in section 6285 it is provided that "in every suit brought, either for a divorce or for a separation, the court may in its discretion require the husband to pay any sums necessary to enable the wife to carry on or defend the suit during its pendency, and it may decree costs against either party and award execution for the same, or it may direct such costs to be paid out of any property sequestered or in the power of the court, or in the hands of a receiver." The statute clearly indicates that such proceedings are to be maintained at the cost of the wife, unless the court shall relieve her of such cost by an order for expense money to be paid by her husband. Ross v. Ross, 47 Mich. 185. It has also been held in this state that a married woman is competent to assert her rights either as plaintiff or defendant, and where a suit is brought against her as defendant, is bound to do so. Wilson v. Coolidge, 43 Mich. 112.

It would seem to follow logically that, having the power to bring suit, and being in such suit responsible for costs, she must be held competent to contract for the services of an attorney to represent her rights. We think the right to contract for such services is necessarily incident to and included in her right to bring the suit. In this view, there was no error committed to the prejudice of the defendant, and the judgment should be affirmed with costs.

The other Justices concurred.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

SAN ANTONIO & ARANSAS PASS R. CO., Plff. in Err.,

Fanny LONG et al.

(.....Tex.....)

1. The nature of the aid furnished by the one for whose wrongful killing a recovery is sought to the plaintiff in the action need not be set out in the complaint.
2. A witness cannot give an opinion as to the probability of continued aid from a parent to a child as a basis for damages for the wrongful killing of the parent.

NOTE.—There are many authorities holding that the damages to be recovered for the wrongful killing of another must be proportionate to the loss sustained, see note to Morgan v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal.) 17 L. R. A. 71, and the logical conclusion would be that if the pecuniary value of the continuance of the life to plaintiff was in the aid furnished toward living expenses, no loss could be shown if a considerable sum was received by plaintiff as legatee or distributee of decedent.

The application of such conclusion which is made in the above case is, however, somewhat novel. If the recovery is based on loss of probable future accumulations, as in the case of Howard v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (C. C. D. Vt.) 6 L. R. A. 75, the present receipts because of the death would not, however, be of such material importance.

3. A recovery for the death of another cannot be had by one who receives from the estate of the deceased property greater in value than all the prospective benefits that would have accrued to him had death not ensued, where the statute creating the right of action gives damages only for the pecuniary loss, and provides that each beneficiary of the class of relatives specified shall recover separately for his own special injury.
4. The will of the deceased may be put in evidence to show that the plaintiff has sustained no loss by the death of the testator, where the action is based on a statute allowing a recovery for the pecuniary loss sustained by such death.
5. An instruction that recovery can be had only for the loss of such pecuniary benefits as would have resulted "from the mental or bodily labor" of the deceased is wrong, where the prospective benefits were from the income of the property of the person killed.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fourth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Bexar County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's mother. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Houston Bros. for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Denman & Franklin, for defendants in error:

The demurrer and exceptions to plaintiffs' petition were properly overruled as the allegations therein show that by the death of plaintiffs' mother they suffered pecuniary loss.

The court did not err in refusing to permit the will of the deceased to be introduced, as the same was immaterial to any issue in the case.

Defendant cannot set off, either in offset or in diminution of damages resulting from its tort the values of the devise or inheritance from the deceased to plaintiffs. Such a defense is opposed to public policy. Besides, the undisputed evidence showed that deceased managed her property, reinvested her income, collected her rents, and was a careful business woman, and that she devoted her surplus income to support of plaintiffs, and they, therefore, suffered a pecuniary loss, by these gifts, and an increase of the deceased's property by her labors being cut off by her death. This caused them a direct pecuniary loss not compensated for by an inheritance of the property owned by their mother when killed by defendant. This loss they were authorized to consider by the charge of the court, but could not consider under the special charges asked.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in the trial court (the defendants in error in this court) are the sons and daughters of Mrs. M. C. Long. They brought this suit, under the statute, to recover damages for injuries resulting to them from the death of their mother, which was alleged to have been caused by negligence of the defendant, the San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railway Company. The petition alleged that the youngest of plaintiffs was twenty-four years old on the day of the accident which resulted in Mrs. Long's death. The allegations of the petition with reference to the damages were as follows: "Plaintiffs aver that said M. C. Long, during her lifetime, aided in the support and maintenance of each one of plaintiffs, cared for them in time of sickness, and at other times, and that her house was their home whenever they desired to make it such, and that each had every reasonable expectation that if said M. C. Long had lived she would have continued to aid and assist in the support and maintenance of each of them, as aforesaid; and they aver that by her death each of them has been deprived of her motherly care and assistance, and her said support and maintenance, all in their damage in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000)." These allegations were specially excepted to, substantially upon the ground that they were vague and indefinite. The court overruled the exceptions, and we think there was no error in that ruling. It is contended that the petition should have averred specially the nature of the aid extended by Mrs. Long, in her lifetime, to each of the plaintiffs. The fact that the deceased, during her life, contributed to the support of her children, is evidence to be considered by the jury in determining the pecuniary loss sustained by them by reason of her death; and it may be that in a case like this, in which the children are all adults, and no longer abide under the parental roof, some evidence of a like character or effect is necessary in order to justify a recovery of damages. Such facts are not in themselves substantive facts which justify a judgment, and, being mere matters of evidence, are not required to be pleaded either in detail, or with any great degree of particularity.

The following answer of Fannie Long, one of plaintiffs, was permitted to be read from her deposition, over the objection of the defendants: "Said M. C. Long did aid in the support of all her said children. Her house was a home for any and all of them whenever they desired to make it so. Fannie Long, Emma Long, and Edward Long lived with her, when not absent from home. She also furnished Emma Long money for her support, and to pay for medicine and medical attention when needed. She also aided in the support of said Florence Bartow by remitting money to her at different times. She aided Arthur Long the same way. She also aided Edward Long with money, and also assisted him in the support of his children, by giving them presents of clothes, etc. She was a woman of simple tastes and habits, and was always ready to aid her children with her means whenever they needed aid." The answer was properly admitted. It was an issue in the case whether or not plaintiffs had suffered any pecuniary loss from the death of their mother. The testimony tended, in a general and somewhat imperfect way, to support the plaintiffs' case upon that issue, and therefore it was not irrelevant. It was the defendants' right to have more specific answers upon cross-examination, and the record shows that they availed themselves of this right. We are also of opinion that there was no error in admitting the testimony of Fannie Long to the effect that her mother had an income from the rents of property and interest on loans, and that she devoted it to the support of herself and children.

The plaintiffs were also allowed to read in evidence to the jury the following question and answer from the deposition of the same witness: "If you say that she (meaning M. C. Long) did aid in the support of her children, please state whether they had any expectations that she would continue such support during her life. If yea, state the facts, if any, upon which such expectations were based." Answer: "Each of said children had the expectation that said M. C. Long would continue to aid them, if she had lived. This expectation is based upon the fact that she was a kind and affectionate mother, and had aided them during her life." So much of the question is sought to elicit the opinion of the witness, and so much of the answer as gave that opinion should have been excluded. The case comes within neither of the well-defined exceptions to the rule that the opinion of a witness is not admissible. The witness should have been confined to a statement of the facts, and the jury should have been left to draw their own conclusion.

The only witness who testified as to the family relations of the plaintiffs and the deceased, and as to the facts affecting the amount of damages, was Miss. Fannie Long. In addition to the portions of her testimony which have already been set out, she deposed, in substance, that the deceased left surviving her neither father nor mother, and that the plaintiffs (two sons and four daughters) were her only children; the deceased mother, at the time of her death, had property amounting in value to $18,500; and that the income of her property was about $1,850. All of this except about $250, which was used in her own support, she devoted to the assistance of her children. She was cross-examined on that subject, but was unable to give either the date or amount of any donation, or the amount in the aggregate, that any one received in any one year. One received remittances of money, the children of another were given clothing, and others occasionally lived with her at her expense. All the children were of full age at the time of their mother's death. Three of them only resided permanently with her. Such was the substance of the testimony upon the question of damages. Such being the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs upon the question of the amount of damages, the defendant offered in evidence the will of Mrs. M. C. Long, duly probated, in which she devised and bequeathed all of her estate to her four daughters. To the reading of the will in evidence, the plaintiffs objected, and their objection was sustained, and the evidence excluded. This action of the court raises the serious question in this case, and it is one which is of first impression in this court. In an action for injuries resulting in death, can the defendant show, for the purpose of reducing the damages, that the plaintiffs have received, by devise or descent, property from the estate of the deceased? If such evidence be admissible in any case of like character, it was certainly admissible in this case. The authorities are not numerous, and the expressions of the courts are in an apparent conflict upon the question. Among the cases relied upon in support of the negative is that of Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 18 L. ed. 591. The defendant asked the court to charge the jury "that if the persons for whose benefit this action is brought have received, in consequence of the death of said Barron, and out of his estate inherited by them from him, a pecuniary benefit greater than the amount of damages which could, under any circumstances, be recovered in this action, then as a matter of law, they have, by the death of said Barron, sustained no actual injury for which compensation can be recovered in this action." Upon error to the Supreme Court of the United States, that court held, in effect, that the charge was properly refused. The trial court had, however, charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "In this case the next of kin are the parties who are interested in the life of the deceased. They were interested in the further accumulations which he might have added to his estate, and which might hereafter descend to them. The jury have the right, in estimating the pecuniary injury, to take into consideration all the circumstances attending the death of Barron,—the relations between him and his next of kin, the amount of his property, the character of his business, the prospective increase of wealth likely to accrue to a man of his age, with the business and means which he had. There is a possibility, in chances of business, that Barron's estate might have decreased, rather than increased, and this possibility the jury may consider. The jury may also take into consideration that he might have married, and his property descended in another channel. And there may be other circumstances which might affect the question of pecuniary loss, which it is difficult for the court to particularize, but which will occur to you. The intention of the statute was to give a compensation which the widow, if any, or the next of kin, might sustain by the death of the party, and the jury are to determine, as men of experience and observation, from the proof, what that loss is." It is apparent, we think, that evidence had been admitted of property received by inheritances by the beneficiaries from the estate of the deceased, and the case cannot be considered as a decision upon the question of the admissibility of such evidence. The court do not even discuss the charges given and refused, but in course of their opinion says, in a general way: "The statute in respect to this measure of damages seems to have been enacted upon the idea that as a general fact the personal assets of the deceased would take the direction given them by law, and hence the amount recovered is to be distributed to the wife and next of kin in proportion provided for in the distribution of personal property left by a person dying intestate. If the person injured had survived, and recovered, he would have added so much to his personal estate, which the law, on his death, if intestate, would have passed to his wife and next of kin. In case of death by the injury the equivalent is given by a suit in the name of his representative." The suit was brought under the statute of Illinois which made the widow and next of kin the beneficiaries of the recovery, and directed that the amount recovered should be divided among them "in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate." The court seems to proceed—in part, at least—upon the theory that the damage which the statute is intended to compensate is the loss which accrues to the widow and next of kin of the deceased, as distributees of his estate, by reason of his premature death; such loss being the difference between what the deceased actually left and what he would have left, had not his life been cut short by the wrong of the defendant. That difference would seem to be his probable future savings, had he lived. The proportion in which the recovery is to be distributed tends to indicate that this was the leading consideration in providing the right of action; for if the loss of any individual benefits, capable of pecuniary estimation, which would probably have accrued to any beneficiary during the life of the deceased, was to be compensated, it would seem that the statute would have provided that such beneficiary should recover such compensation for himself alone. It must, however, be conceded that the decision of some of the courts upon similar statutes recognize the rights of minor children, at least, to recover for the loss of individual pecuniary benefits which would probably have inured to them by the continuance of the life of their parent. Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 471, 29 N. Y. 253, 86 Am. Dec. 297; Terry v. Jewett, 78 N. Y. 838.

Under the statutes of New York, the recovery is for the benefit of the next of kin, and is to be there also apportioned as under the statute of descent and distribution. It is worthy of remark that under such a statute the recovery may go to remote collateral kindred, who have no interest whatever in the life of their relative, except the prospective shares they may receive, as distributees of his estate, upon his dying intestate. Where such is the loss to be recompensed, it is no answer to the plaintiff's demand to say to him that he has not been damaged, because he has received a pecuniary benefit from the death of the deceased. His ground of complaint is not that he has been deprived of receiving anything, but that the amount which has come to him is less than it would have been if the life of the deceased had been prolonged.

There would seem to be an important difference between statutes which give the right of action to the next of kin, as such, and the statute of this state which undertakes to confer compensation upon the husband or wife and the children and parents of the deceased only, and which requires that the jury shall determine separately the amount to be recovered by each of the beneficiaries. Where the right of action is given for the benefit of the next of kin, and the sum recovered is to be apportioned as under the statute of descent and distribution, it would seem that the leading purpose is to give compensation for some loss suffered by them all in common; that is to say, the damage which has accrued to them, as next of kin, by reason of the loss of a prospective increase in the amount of the estate to be distributed. Our statute excludes from its benefits the collateral kindred, and its leading purpose seems to be to compensate only such near relatives of the deceased as may be dependent upon him for support, or other aid of pecuniary value, or such as may have been the recipients of such aid or support. It may be that, in statutes of the one class, special injury to one beneficiary may be considered and compensated, though it is difficult to see why the recovery for such loss should be distributed in a fixed proportion among all; and it may be, also, that under our statute the loss of a prospective increase of inheritance may be an element of damages. But, under the latter, each beneficiary recovers for his own special injury. The damages must be actual, and for loss of a pecuniary nature. Nothing is given by way of solace. Under such a law, we cannot see how it can be maintained that one has been damaged by the death when he has received from the estate of the deceased property exceeding in value all the prospective benefits which would have accrued to him, had the death not ensued. Let us suppose that a wealthy son contributes to his aged parent a fixed sum, say $100, annually, and that, from the wrongful act of another he dies, leaving such parent, by his will, a legacy of $10,000. Can it be reasonably asserted that the parent has suffered any pecuniary loss by the death of the son? But we need not go outside of this case for an illustration. If there was any great disparity in the aid extended by Mrs. Long in her lifetime to each of her children, the evidence does not disclose it. By her will she left her property, amounting to nearly $20,000 in value, to her daughters, and gave her sons nothing. If her sons shared equally in her bounty with her daughters during her life, can it be said that their loss is no greater than that of the daughters? It seems to us absurd to say so. It will not do to say, as some of the courts have said, that to permit a defendant, in a case of this character, to show that the plaintiff had received a pecuniary benefit resulting from the death of the deceased, would enable a wrongdoer to protect himself against the consequences of his wrong. Except for willful misconduct or gross negligence, exemplary damages are not allowed by the statute. In other cases, actual damages only are given, and the recovery is free from any element whatever of a penal nature. The argument is a legitimate application of the principle that a wrongdoer cannot take advantage of his own wrong. Its main support rests upon a sentiment,—a consideration which should not be resorted to in order to change the provisions of the written law. The statute is intended, in case of mere ordinary negligence, to give compensation for a pecuniary loss; and the question is, What is the amount of its loss, if any? This is a practical question, and it should, in every such case, be tried and determined in a reasonable and practical manner.

The English statute known as "Lord Campbell's Act," upon which most, if not all, of the statutes of a like character in this country have been modeled, is, in respect to the beneficiaries, very nearly the same as the statute in this state. The action is for the benefit of "the husband, wife, parent and child" of the deceased, and the jury are to apportion the damages among the beneficiaries. The only substantial difference is that Lord Campbell's act provides that under the term "parents" shall be included "grandparents." In an action brought under that act, Lord Campbell himself, who presided at the trial, instructed the jury that in assessing the damages they should take into consideration the amount received by the beneficiaries on an accident insurance policy held by the deceased. Hicks v. Newport, A. & H. R. Co. cited in note to Pym v. Great Northern R. Co. 4 Best & S. 408. Speaking of this case, Baron Bramwell, in Braddurn v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 10 Exch. 1, says: "As to the case of Hicks v. Newport, A. & H. R. Co. that was an action under Lord Campbell's Act, and the ruling is quite correct. The statute has laid down no rule as to the mode of calculating the damages to be given in respect of the right of action which it created. The rule was first laid down by this court, and that rule was that the damages were to be a compensation to the family of the deceased, equivalent to the pecuniary benefits which they might have reasonably expected from the continuance of his life. If, therefore, the person claiming damages was put, by the death of his relative, into possession of a large estate, there was no loss,—he was a gainer by the event; and, similarly, whatever comes into the possession of the family who have suffered by the death of their relative, by reason of his death, must be taken into the account." In Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Jennings, 13 App. Cas. 800, it is said "that all the circumstances which, though insufficient to exclude a statutory claim, may be legitimately pleaded in diminution of it, ought to be submitted to the decision of the jury, whose special function it is to assess damage, with such observations from the presiding judge as may be suggested by the facts in evidence. It appears to their lordships that money provisions made by a husband for the maintenance of his widow, in whatever form, are matters proper to be considered by the jury in estimating her loss; but the extent, if any, to which these ought to be imputed in the reduction of damages must depend upon the nature of the provision and the position and means of the deceased. When the deceased did not earn his own living, but had an annual income from property, one half of which has been settled upon his widow, a jury might reasonably come to the conclusion that, to the extent of that half, the widow was not a loser by his death, and might confine their estimate of her loss to the interest which she might probably have had in the other half." This is from a decision of the 24 L. R. A.

privy council in a case arising under the Canada statute, which is the same as Lord Campbell's Act. But neither the expressions in the case last cited, nor in Braddurn v. Great Western R. Co., supra, are authoritative. The point was not involved in either case, and yet they are entitled to weight, as the opinion of very eminent judges. The court of the exchequer chamber took substantially the same view of the question, as is shown by the case of Pym v. Great Northern R. Co., supra. On the other hand, there are several decisions which hold that proof that a beneficiary has received money from a policy of insurance on the life of the deceased cannot be received for the purpose of reducing the damages. Althorpe v. Wolfe, 22 N. Y. 355; Sherlock v. Alling, 44 Ind. 184; Harding v. Townshend, 43 Vt. 536, 5 Am. Rep. 304; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 29 Gratt. 431, 26 Am. Rep. 384; Carroll v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 88 Mo. 239, 57 Am. Rep. 832; Western & A. R. Co. v. Meigs, 74 Ga. 857. Statutes giving damages for injuries resulting in death necessarily deal with probabilities; so that where there is a policy on the life of the deceased, payable to the beneficiaries under the statute, the probability is, or may be, that, if the deceased had continued to live, beneficiaries would ultimately have received the insurance money. Hence, they have gained nothing by the premature death, except an acceleration of the payment. Perhaps sound principles would require the jury to take into consideration the use of the money during the period of acceleration. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Jennings, supra. But, however that may be, the case is very different where the only aid which the beneficiaries have received from the deceased, during his life, has been a part of the income of his property, and where, upon his death, the title to the corpus of such property absolutely vests in them; and we are therefore of the opinion that, in a case involving similar facts, they should be admitted in evidence, to be considered by the jury. We conclude that the court erred in excluding the will of Mrs. Long, and that for this error the judgment must be reversed.

There are other questions presented by the writ of error, but we need not consider them either at length or in detail. They were correctly disposed of by the court of civil appeals. There is, however, one point which we desire to notice. It is insisted that the court should have charged the jury, in effect, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover only for the loss of such pecuniary benefits to them as would have resulted "from the mental or bodily labor" of the deceased. The object of the refused charge was to exclude from the consideration of the jury prospective benefits which might have accrued to the beneficiaries from that portion of the income of the deceased which proceeded from her property. From what has already been said, it is apparent we think that the charge was correctly refused. The contention of plaintiffs in error seems to be based upon the case of Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Butler, 67 Pa. 335, in which the court, in their opinion, says: "After an attentive examination and review of all the cases which have heretofore been decided, we are of the opinion that the proper measure of damages is the pecuniary loss suffered by the parties entitled to the sum to be received,—in this instance, the children of the decedent,—without any solatium for distress of mind; and that loss is what the deceased would probably have earned by his intellectual and bodily labor, in his business or profession, during the residue of his lifetime, and which would have gone for the benefit of his children, taking into consideration his age, ability and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditure." The rule thus announced is doubtless correct as applied to the facts of the particular case, and it may be applicable generally under the statute of Pennsylvania. It does not apply, under the statute of this state, to a case like the present, in which the prospective aid was mainly, if not wholly, from the income of property, and in which, upon the death, some of the beneficiaries take by bequest all the estate, and others get none.

In conclusion, we will say that while the damages in actions of this nature are necessarily indeterminate, and while much must be left, in almost every case of the kind, to the sound sense of the jury, it does not follow that the plaintiffs need not prove with a reasonable degree of certainty the date from which their compensation is to be assessed, when it is practicable to do so. Where the beneficiaries are adults, and the loss of prospective benefits is based upon assistance in the way of money, or other things of value, received in the lifetime of the deceased, it is certainly within the power of each beneficiary to show by his own testimony, with some degree of accuracy, the amount of the benefits so received; and it would seem that his failure to testify specifically to the facts ought to be deemed a circumstance against him, sufficient to justify the trial court in setting aside the verdict, provided it be apparently excessive.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Messrs. W. Showalter, Herbert Walcott, and Fisher & Townes for defendant in error.

Stanton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was appealed to the supreme court prior to the organization of courts of civil appeals; and, as was proper at the time, the appeal bond was conditioned as the law then required. On organization of courts of civil appeals, the cause, in accordance with the requirements of the law, was transferred for decision to the court of civil appeals having jurisdiction of cases tried in the county in which it was. The judgment of the district court was affirmed by the proper court of civil appeals, and, on application, this court granted a writ of error, under which the cause is now here. Defendant in error moves to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the court of civil appeals had not jurisdiction over the cause, because no bond had been executed conditioned as bonds are now required to be perfect appeals to a court of civil appeals; from which it is argued that this court has not jurisdiction, be cause a court of civil appeals had not jurisdiction to render a judgment from which writ of error would lie. It is contended that this court ceased to have jurisdiction when courts of civil appeals were organized; and that no court of civil appeals could acquire jurisdiction without a new bond, executed in compliance with the law applicable to bonds given in cases originally appealed to such court; and it is further urged that the bond, executed in accordance with the law in force at the time, became inoperative for any purpose when courts of civil appeals were organized. It is further contended that "the lawmaking power could not change the contract of the sureties to the appeal bond, and impair its obligation, by imposing new burdens, and requiring the sureties to perform the judgment of a tribunal other than the one they agreed to be bound by; [that] sureties have the right to stand upon the very contract they have made, and any change therein made without their consent, and certainly if to their prejudice, will discharge them and destroy the bond as a bond." These propositions are asserted in the motion in many forms.

The appeal bond in question was executed after the amendments to the constitution now in force were declared adopted, but before the organization of courts of civil appeals which were required by that amendment to be organized. At the time the appeal bond in question was executed, the statute required such bonds to be conditioned that principal and sureties, "in case the judgment of the appellate court shall be against him, that he shall perform its sentence, judgment or decree, and pay all such damages as said court may award against him." Rev. Stat. art. 1404. The bond was conditioned, "in case the judgment of the supreme court shall be against it, . . . it shall perform its judgment, sentence, or decree, and pay such damages as said court may award against it," etc. This bond was sufficient at the time it was given, and, had the cause been reached and disposed of by this court before courts of civil appeals were organized, would have authorized judgment against principal and sureties in accordance with its terms. The amendments to the constitution, among other things, provided that "until the organization of the courts of civil appeals and criminal appeals, as herein provided for, the jurisdiction, power, and organization and location of the supreme court, the court of civil appeals and the commission of appeals shall continue as they were before the adoption of this amendment." Const. art. 5, § 6.

After the organization of courts of civil appeals, the jurisdiction theretofore exercised by the supreme court was taken from it, and conferred in substance on these courts. While the amendments to the constitution did not, in terms, direct the causes pending in supreme court to be transferred to courts of civil appeals when organized, such was its effect, for the supreme court from that time was deprived of jurisdiction to decide them, and these courts alone were clothed with that power. So standing the jurisdiction of the courts, the legislature directed that "all causes that may be pending in the supreme court of Texas, when the civil courts of appeals shall have been organized, shall be transferred by said supreme court to the court of civil appeals to which it would be returnable under the law organizing such courts, and shall be decided under the same rule as obtained when any such appeal was perfected. . . . That all bonds and obligations theretofore given in said cause to abide the judgment, sentence, or decree of said court, or to pay the costs of said court, shall be deemed and held to apply to said civil court of appeals as if hereafter given under the provisions of this act." Act April 18, 1892, § 4. In providing for writs of error from this court to a court of civil appeals, the statute declares that "a certified copy of . . . the bond given in the lower court, if any," shall accompany the petition; and that, "if plaintiff in error has given no bond, then the supreme court in granting the writ shall specify what bond shall be given, and the plaintiff in error shall file said bond in the trial court to be approved by the clerk of said court, and a certified copy thereof shall be at once transmitted to the supreme court." This is the only instance in which this court is required to have writ of error bond made. If a party who prosecutes an appeal or writ of error to a court of civil appeals executes bond for that purpose on that bond, he can prosecute writ of error to this court (Rev. Stat. art. 1011b), and this court can render such a judgment in that case as the court of civil appeals should have rendered, which may go against sureties as well as principal on appeal or writ of error bond.

In view of this legislation, there can be no doubt of intention to give to courts of civil appeals jurisdiction over causes pending in supreme court when those courts were organized, and to authorize them to render judgments on appeal and writ of error bonds filed in those cases to take them to the supreme court as fully as though such bonds were given to perfect appeals or writs of error to those courts. It would be within the power of the legislature to permit appeals and writs of error to be prosecuted to courts of civil appeals, and writs of error to be prosecuted from those courts to the supreme court, without any bonds whatever, and, under existing legislation, it is clear that the court of civil appeals had jurisdiction over this cause, and that this court has; for, if the bond could not be enforced against principal or sureties, the right to have adjudication by both courts without other bond is given by law. To hold otherwise would be, in effect, to hold that litigants have power to deprive the state of power to regulate its judicial system, and to fix the jurisdiction of its courts. Those decisions which deny the liability of sureties on appeal bonds, when, under a change in the law, jurisdiction is given to a court other than that named in the bond, or having jurisdiction when bond was executed, all concede the jurisdiction of the new or substituted court. Re Garesche, 85 Mo. 469; Oranor v. Reardon, 39

Mo. App. 306; Schuster v. Weiss, 114 Mo. 158, 19 L. R. A. 182. Some of these cases, however, held that in such cases sureties on appeal bonds are not liable. The decisions are based on the general rule that the contract of a surety is not to be extended by implication beyond its terms, but to construe such obligations in connection with laws in force when they are entered into and in view of the fact that every person must know that the power of the people to change the jurisdiction of the courts of the state may be exercised at any time, and cannot be controlled by contracts made or obligations assumed by individuals, does not violate that rule. All instruments creating obligations not based on agreement of parties, but upon statutes, such as appeal bonds, are made in view of and in subordination to the fact, known to all, that the people may change the jurisdiction of existing courts, create others, and confer upon them such jurisdiction over cases arising before such legislation, or then pending, as may seem for the best interests of all, and it ought not to be held that principal or surety to an appeal bond contemplated, in event of such change pending appeal, that their obligation should become inoperative; for the substance and spirit of such an undertaking is that the obligors will discharge the obligation fixed by their bond whenever the duty to discharge it, by satisfying the obligation, is declared by a court having jurisdiction over the cause on appeal, whether jurisdiction to determine the cause existed when the bond was given or was afterwards conferred. What court should decide the cause on appeal was not a matter which parties could control by contract, for neither the one nor the other could thus secure a right which would prevent change in jurisdiction of courts, or creation of new courts with jurisdiction before conferred on others. Some of the cases before referred to seem to hold that such obligations as sureties on appeal bonds assume are contracts within the constitutional safeguards which deny to state legislatures power to pass laws whereby the obligation of contracts will be impaired; but, it seems to us, such is not the character of such obligations, for they are not based on consent of adverse litigants, but are assumed by the makers of such bonds, which are permitted, and thereby right to appeal secured under the provisions of positive law. The assent of persons for whose protection such bonds are executed is not essential to obligation, and their dissent can have no effect on the right of adverse parties and their sureties to assume obligation by compliance with the statute. Obligations which the Constitution of the United States and of this state protect from impairment are such as exist by reason of contract, which never exists without consent or agreement of parties, either express or implied, and it cannot be implied when the party in whose favor the obligation arises has no power to prevent it. Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 186, 3 L. ed. 177; Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 92, 5 L. ed. 570; Garrison v. New York, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 203, 22 L. ed. 614; Lobrano v. Nelligan, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 296. 24 L. R. A.

19 L. ed. 696; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Neabit, 51 U. S. 10 How. 395, 13 L. ed. 449.

It would not be contended that parties, by the execution of appeal bonds and other acts necessary to perfect an appeal, could acquire right to have their causes determined by courts then having jurisdiction over such appeals; for, if such a right could be thus acquired, parties would have power to permit the exercise by the people of a power recognized and secured by the constitutions. None of the decisions assert such a proposition, but all concede that it cannot be maintained when they admit that legislation is valid, as to parties to an action, which takes from a court jurisdiction to decide a case pending before it on appeal, and confers jurisdiction over it upon another court to which the cause is required to be transferred.

That the laws in question are, in a restricted sense, retroactive, is true; but as they affect only the remedy, and deprive neither party of substantial right, they are not violative of the constitution unless they impose obligations not contemplated when the appeal bond was executed. It is clear that it was intended by the parts of the amendments to the constitution and statutes before referred to to confer upon courts of civil appeals jurisdiction to hear and determine causes pending in the supreme court, and undecided when those courts were organized, and to make parties to appeal bonds filed in such causes liable under judgments rendered by those courts or by this court on writ of error, just as they would have been had the causes been decided by the supreme court before the organization of courts of civil appeals; and the only question is whether, under the law applicable to sureties, they can be held so liable. As before said, the undertaking of the parties to the appeal bond must be read in light of laws existing when the bond was executed, and in view of the further fact that parties must be held to have contracted with knowledge of the right of the people to so change the jurisdiction of the courts of the state as to require the appeal to be decided in court or courts other than that having jurisdiction when the bond was executed. The law in force when the bond was executed required it to be conditioned "that such appellant, or plaintiff in error, shall prosecute his appeal or writ of error with effect, and in case the judgment of the appellate court shall be against him, that he shall perform its judgment, sentence or decree, and pay all such damages as said court may award against him." Under this statute, bonds which used the words "supreme court" instead of the words "appellate court," and vice versa, were held sufficient, and, if the words used in the statute had been inserted in the bond in question, there can be no doubt that they would be held to embrace any court which might entertain jurisdiction of the cause on appeal, whether existing at the time the bond was executed, or subsequently created. That the words "supreme court," used in the bond were intended to be used as the equivalents of the words "appellate court," used in the statute, cannot be doubted. The bond in question, however, was executed after all the parties to it knew that the constitution had been so amended as to make it necessary that the cause should be decided by a court of civil appeals if it was not decided by the supreme court before those courts were organized; and that they executed the bond in view of that fact, and in order to secure right to decision of the cause on appeal by any appellate court which might be given jurisdiction to decide it, ought not to be questioned. We do not, however, wish to place the decision of the general question presented on the language of the statute in force when the bond was executed, nor upon the fact that the constitution had been amended before that time, but upon the broader ground that principal and sureties, when assuming such obligations, do so with intent they shall be given effect, and must be understood to agree to comply with their undertakings whenever their obligation to do so is declared by a court having jurisdiction over the case appealed, whether that be the court named in the bond, and having jurisdiction when it was executed, or a court subsequently clothed with such jurisdiction. The legislature has declared such to be their obligation, and there is no objection on constitutional grounds to such legislation, nor can it be said that any burden is thus placed upon sureties which was not fairly in contemplation when they voluntarily assumed the obligation. The motion to dismiss writ of error will be overruled.

On the day of his injury, defendant in error was conductor on a train belonging to plaintiff in error en route to the City of Mexico. The train consisted of nineteen cars, and was composed of both freight and passenger cars, the latter having from 80 to 100 passengers on board. The train being heavy, on reaching a steep mountain grade which extended about ten miles, it became necessary to place an extra engine at the head of the train and another at the rear, in order to propel the train to the top of the mountain. One Hobert was engineer in charge of the rear engine, which seems to have been a heavy and powerful engine, and with him was a Mexican fireman. When the train had ascended the mountain about eight miles, one of the engines in front became disabled, and, after causing the brakes to be set, the conductor went forward, cut off the front engines, and sent them to a station at the top of a grade for assistance. Soon after the train was stopped, the engineer in charge of the rear locomotive left it and came to the front of the train, leaving no person with his engine but the fireman, who knew nothing of its working or mechanism. When that engineer reached the front of the train, the conductor upbraided him for leaving his engine while on that grade, and directed him to return to it; but, about that time, the train began moving down the mountain, and it was observed that his engine was working and pulling the train after it. The conductor at once commenced doubling the brakes, passing over the cars from one to another towards the rear, and, while engaged in this, was thrown from the train, and injured, under such circumstances as to make the railway company liable to him if the engineer, Hobert, was an unsuitable man for the position in which he was placed, provided his absence from his engine was the proximate cause of the movement of the train down the grade. There was evidence tending to show that Hobert was a reckless engineer, and unsuited to the place, and that of this the officers of the railway company were informed when he was last employed over the protest of a trainmaster, who gave information, not only of his general reputation for carelessness, but of a wreck caused by him when formerly in employment of the company. It was shown that great caution on the part of those managing the train while it was on the steep grade was necessary, and that the orders to engineers prohibited their leaving their engines except at stations to receive orders. It further appears that some act of the fireman, during the absence of the engineer, put the engine in backward motion, after which a brakeman who was in the caboose climbed into the engine room, and, by reversing the engine and giving steam, stopped the train, but this was not done until plaintiff was injured and two passengers killed. The action was based on several acts of negligence charged against the company, but the charge of the court withdrew from the jury all of those except the negligence of the company in placing Hobert in charge of the engine, and his negligence in leaving his engine under the circumstances. The court clearly informed the jury what the issues in the case were, and as to the facts that would fix liability on the company, or prevent recovery by plaintiff. With others, the court gave the following instructions: "If the plaintiff has shown that the defendant failed to use ordinary care and diligence in employing the engineer who operated said pusher locomotive as is required under the charge above given; that he was a careless and reckless man, and that the injury complained of was occasioned as the direct or proximate result thereof, and that the same happened without the fault or contributory negligence of the plaintiff, as hereinafter charged, this in law would be such negligence on the part of defendant as would render the company liable, and you should so find for the plaintiff. An injury is the proximate result of an act when, without the act, the injury would not have been inflicted. It is for you to determine, from all the evidence before you, what was the proximate cause of the injury complained of; but unless you find that the defendant was negligent in employing the engineer, Hobert, and that he was careless and reckless, and thereby caused or contributed to the injury complained of, without any fault on the part of plaintiff, then you will find for defendant." It is urged that these charges authorized the jury to find for plaintiff if Hobert was a reckless, careless, and unsafe engineer, and employed by the company without the exercise of care to ascertain his fitness for the place, although the injury may not have resulted from his negligence. Neither of the charges seems fairly susceptible of the construction placed on them by counsel. The first informed the jury that they should find for the plaintiff if, without negligence on his part, he received injuries which were the direct result of the engineer's carelessness, if the company failed to use ordinary care in employing him,—if, in fact, he was unfit for the position. Other parts of the charge informed the jury as to the risks assumed by employes, and as to the facts necessary to entitle one employe to recover for an injury resulting from the negligence of a coemploye. The jury could not have understood that they were instructed to find for plaintiff if the company had failed to use due care in employing the engineer, even if he was careless and reckless, unless they believed from the evidence that plaintiff's injury was the direct result of his careless or reckless act. The last charge above given places the matter beyond controversy, and the entire charge was such that the jury could not have placed that construction on it for which counsel contend. It is true that the court gave a charge, asked by defendant, which, if considered alone, ought not to have been given, and from that counsel contend that the jury must have placed that construction on charges complained of for which they now contend. The charge given at request of defendant could not legitimately have been given such effect, and, considered alone, ought not to have been given in view of the facts of the case.

It is contended that the negligence of the engineer in leaving his engine, under the circumstances, in charge of a fireman who knew nothing of its working or mechanism, contrary to the rules of the company, as matter of law was not the proximate cause of the injury, because the engine was put in motion by the fireman. It frequently becomes difficult to determine the proximate cause of an injury, but it is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury trying a cause, whose finding will not be reversed on grounds purely theoretical. The situation of the train when it was stopped on the mountain side was perilous, and the evidence clearly shows that the movement of the train might have been prevented or stopped after it began if the engineer had been at his post, and thus the injury been avoided; and we are of opinion that the negligence of the engineer having supervision over the fireman as well as the locomotive thus situated may be deemed the efficient cause of the injury, although the engine may have been put in motion by the fireman either inadvertently or intentionally. The rules of the company required the engineer to remain with his engine, evidently for the purpose of protecting it from the interference of the fireman or any other person, as well as to operate it as might become necessary for movement or safety of the train. That the rules of the company required him to remain with his engine evidences the opinion of the officers of the company that the exercise of due care required his presence there for the safety of its property, of employes, and of passengers. "The act of a third person, intervening and contributing a condition necessary to the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrongdoer if such act ought to have been foreseen. The original negligence still remains a culpable and direct cause of the injury. The test is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise. Whether, in any given case, the act charged was negligent, and whether the injury suffered was, within the relation of cause and effect, legally attributable to it, are questions for the jury." Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 139; Gonzales v. Galveston, 84 Tex. 3; Jones v. George, 61 Tex. 848, 48 Am. Rep. 280; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. McKinney, 78 Tex. 298; Weick v. Lander, 75 Ill. 98.

The fireman may have been a competent person to discharge the duties for which he was employed, and if, while in the discharge of those, a fellow servant had been injured by his negligence, the railway company would not have been liable; but he was not employed to operate or have charge of the engine, of the working and mechanism of which he was ignorant. The engineer was employed for the latter purposes, and to emphasize his duty to care for his engine at all times the rules of the company required him to remain with it when on the road and under steam, except at stations when necessary to leave to get orders. Why did the rules of the company require this? The answer must be, in order to operate it when necessary, to care for it, and to prevent all other persons from interfering with it. Whether it ought to have been foreseen that an ignorant fireman might intentionally or inadvertently put it in motion, when under steam, and situated as was it, if he left the post assigned to him by his employer, was a question for the jury. An engine when under steam is too nearly a thing of life to be left in the hands of a person ignorant of its workings and mechanism, and if injury results from such negligence, even though there may have been one intervening act directly contributing to the injury, no court would be justified in holding that, in the ordinary course of events, such intervention ought not to have been anticipated, or at least thought not unlikely to occur. To have given the charges hearing on questions considered, asked by the defendant, would have been to take the case from the jury, which ought not to have been done under the evidence. It was the duty of the company to exercise diligence to ascertain the fitness of Hobert for the important and responsible position in which he was placed, and the failure of a fellow servant of the plaintiff to notify its officers of neglect on his part and of his unfitness for duty after he was employed the second time over the protest of some of its officers, based on the former misconduct that led to his discharge, could not affect the right of plaintiff to recover, and the court did not err in refusing to give the charge asked upon that subject.

There is no error in the judgment of the District Court or of the Court of Civil Appeals, and they will be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

H. J. GRISWOLD et al., Appts.,
v.
ILLINOIS CENTRAL R. CO.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The facts that the public are convenience by the facilities afforded by a warehouse erected by an individual on railroad property, that insurance companies have issued policies on it, and that the statutes make railroad companies liable for fires negligently set by them, do not show such a public interest in the subject-matter of a contract between its owner and the railroad company relieving the latter from liability for fire negligently set by it to the warehouse as to make its enforcement against public policy.
2. A statute prohibiting carriers from contracting to exempt themselves from liability does not apply to a contract by a railroad company with one to whom it grants permission to place a warehouse on its property relieving it from liability for loss by fire negligently set out by it.
3. A railroad company which has contracted for exemption from liability for loss by its negligence of a warehouse erected by a third person with its permission on its land is not required by public policy to reimburse insurers who issued policies on it in case they are required to pay a loss caused by its negligence.

(Robinson and Ktme, JJ., dissent.)

(October 19, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Buchanan County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the value of a certain elevator which was owned by plaintiff Griswold and stood on defendant's land and which was destroyed by fire negligently set out by defendant's servants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. R. W. Barger and E. E. Hasner, for appellants:

Public policy is that principle of the law which holds that no one can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good.

Public policy, in other words, is substantially that right existing in the state and which is conferred upon the state by the individual member of society in consideration of the state's obligations to him, by which the state is made the umpire as to the kinds of contracts its citizens may make.

The contract in this case, by which the defendant seeks to protect itself against its own negligent act tortiously injuring the plaintiff, is against public policy. That the tendency of such contracts if permitted, would be to increase negligence, is too apparent for discussion.

Railway companies are required to equip their engines with the best well-known appliances to prevent the escape of fire therefrom, and a failure to do so is negligence.

NOTE.—The difficulty of the question raised in this case is shown by the fact that the court changed its opinion after reargument. It would hardly be claimed that such a contract between private individuals would be annulled by public policy while on the other hand a carrier who has his patron completely at his mercy is forbidden by public policy to contract for a limitation of liability for losses caused by his negligence. Between these extremes is a vast field of debatable ground, 31 L. R. A.

Common carriers are insurers, and but for their contract would be liable for any accident, even though not the result of their negligence. Messrs. W. J. Knight, Frank Jennings, and Thomas F. Wright, for appellee:

It is not true that one party cannot agree with another, to indemnify and save such other party harmless, from damage caused by his want of care or negligence. In all contracts of insurance, where it is not otherwise specially provided, the insurer, in legal effect, agrees to indemnify and save harmless the assured, from damage caused by the assured's want of care and negligence of his servants.

The principle decided in Warren v. K. & D. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 484, seems decisive of this case against appellants.

Robinson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts disclosed by the pleadings, which are material for consideration on this appeal, are substantially as follows: On the 30th day of April, 1890, the plaintiff Griswold owned a two and one half story elevator building, warehouse, and corncrib attached, together with engine and boiler connections and feed mill therein, all of which were situated on the depot grounds of defendant immediately north of its track, in the village of Winthrop. In the morning of the day named the property described was totally destroyed by fire, which was kindled by sparks and cinders from a locomotive engine of defendant while passing on its track. The sparks and cinders escaped from the engine in consequence of defects in its construction and appliances, and in consequence of the negligent manner in which it was operated. The property destroyed was of the value of $6,000, and was at the time insured by the plaintiffs, the Iowa State Insurance Company, the Commercial Union Assurance Company, Limited, the St. Paul German Insurance Company, and the Farmers' Fire Insurance Company, in the sum of $1,000 each, or for the aggregate amount of $4,000. After the property was destroyed, each insurance company paid the amount of loss for which it was responsible, and claiming that, by reason of such payments, they became subrogated to the rights of Griswold to the extent of the amounts so paid, they join him in demanding judgment against defendant for the value of the property destroyed. Griswold occupied the premises on which the property stood by virtue of a lease to him from defendant, which contained the following provisions: "And the lessee, in consideration of the premises, hereby covenants and agrees with the lessor, its successors and assigns, to pay the said lessor, as rent for said described premises, the sum of one dollar, to be paid at the time and in the manner following, to wit, on the delivery of this lease: and the lessee further covenants and agrees with the lessor that he will, from the date of this indenture, put to use and maintain a good, substantial elevator, coal sheds and lumber yard on the above described premises; and further agrees to protect and save harmless said lessor from all liability for damage by fire, which in the operation of lessor's railroad, or from cars or engines lawfully on its tracks, may accidentally or negligently be communicated to any property or structure on said described premises. And the said lessee hereby agrees to ship all grain, coal, and lumber he can control by the Illinois Central Railroad; and the said lessee further covenants and agrees with the said lessor that he will transact the business for which said buildings are erected and designed at fair and reasonable rates and in a prompt and careful manner, so that neither the company nor the public will be prejudiced by reason of the said lessee dealing unfairly or negligently in their behalf, or in the transaction of the business connected with the grain, coal, and lumber building so erected as aforesaid." The defendant claims that plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, for the reason that Griswold undertook, by the terms of the lease, to protect and save it harmless from such losses as that in question.

The ground of the demurrer is as follows: "The petition and answer show that the action is commenced by the owner and insurer of an elevator built upon defendant's land alongside of its track, for the purpose of handling grain, and that said elevator was burned through the negligence of defendant, its agents and employes. The plaintiffs, therefore, say it is against public policy, and contrary to the statutes of Iowa, for the defendant to attempt to restrict by contract its liability for the negligence of its agents, employes, and servants; and that said defense, so far as it is based upon exemptions from liability by reason of this contract or lease, is not good, as such contract of exemption is void." No special claims are made in behalf of the insurance companies; therefore their interests, and that of Griswold, for the purposes of this appeal, will be treated as governed by the same rules.

1. Section 1289 of the Code provides that "any corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating of any such railway. . . ." It was said in West v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 77 Iowa, 654, that this statute imposes an absolute liability upon railroad corporations without regard to the contributory negligence of the person injured, for damages resulting from fires set out or caused by negligently operating their railways. The facts admitted in this case show that the fire in question was caused by defendant in operating its railway, and that the fire was the result of negligence on its part. Whether a railway company may limit its liability for a fire which it causes, without fault on its part, is a question not involved in this case; but we are required to determine whether a railway company may, by a contract entered into before the act, limit its liability for a fire which is caused by negligence on its part in operating its railway.

Section 1808 of the Code provides, in effect, that a common carrier, or carrier of passengers, cannot exempt itself from liability as such carrier by contract. Although there is some conflict in the authorities, yet it is the general rule, in the absence of statutory regulations, that railway companies cannot restrict their liability for negligence, in transporting passengers or freight, by contracts made in advance of the carriage; and the same is true in regard to the power of telegraph companies to limit their liability for negligence in transmitting dispatches. It is said in Cooley, Torts, 697, with reference to agreements of that kind, that "the cases of carriers and telegraph companies have been specially mentioned because it is chiefly in these cases that such contracts are met with. But, although the reasons which forbid such contracts have special force in the business of carrying persons and goods, or of sending messages, they apply universally, and should be held to defeat all contracts by which a party undertakes to put another at the mercy of his own faulty conduct."

In Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 86 Va. 975, the administrator sought to recover damages for the death of his intestate, which was claimed to have been caused by the negligence of the railway company. The decedent had been a member of a firm of quarrymen, which agreed with the railway company to remove a certain granite bluff from its right of way. He was killed by a train of the company while he was engaged in doing the work required by the agreement. There was evidence which tended to show that the accident was caused by negligence on the part of the company. It claimed exemption from liability, however, on the ground that the agreement provided that it should "in no way be held responsible for any injuries to or death of any of the members of the said firm, or of any of its agents or employes, sustained from said work, should such death or injury occur, from any cause whatsoever." The court, in commenting on this provision of the agreement, said: "To uphold the stipulation in question would be to hold that it was competent for one party to put the other parties to the contract at the mercy of its own misconduct, which can never be lawfully done, where an enlightened system of jurisprudence prevails. Public policy forbids it, and contracts against public policy are void. Nothing is better settled, certainly in this court, than that a common carrier cannot, by contract, exempt himself from responsibility for his own or his servant's negligence in the carriage of goods or passengers for hire. This is so, independently of section 1296 of the Code, and the principle which invalidates a stipulation for exemption from liability for one's own negligence is not confined to the contracts of carriers as such. It applies universally.

Railway corporations are quasi public agencies, and perform a public duty. They are agencies created by the state with certain privileges, and subject to certain obligations. A contract that they will not discharge their obligations is a breach of a public duty, and cannot be enforced. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 11 Kan. 609, 15 Am. Rep. 357. An agreement by which a railway corporation undertakes, without the consent of the state, to relieve itself of a burden which it imposed upon it by law, is void, as against public policy. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950.
